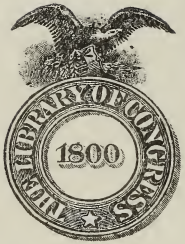
BF
1701
.C6



Class BF 1701
Book .C6

90
169

Significance of Birthdays

SIGNIFICANCE OF BIRTHDAYS

By W. J. COLVILLE

MACOY PUBLISHING AND MASONIC SUPPLY CO.,
:: :: NEW YORK :: ::

BF1701
C6

COPYRIGHT
1911 BY MACOY PUBLISHING
AND
MASONIC SUPPLY CO
NEW YORK

TRANSFERRED FROM READING ROOM
DEC 16 1920

LIST OF CONTENTS.

	Page
The First Sign, Aries	16
The Second Sign, Taurus	30
The Third Sign, Gemini	41
The Fourth Sign, Cancer	51
The Fifth Sign, Leo	61
The Sixth Sign, Virgo	69
The Seventh Sign, Libra	79
The Eighth Sign, Scorpio	90
The Ninth Sign, Sagittarius	102
The Tenth Sign, Capricornus	111
The Eleventh Sign, Aquarius	123
The Twelfth Sign, Pisces	132
The Four Triplicities, General Summary	141
Significance Names and Numbers	153
List of Kindred Books	163

Gems of the Months.

Garnet,	January,	Fidelity.
Amethyst,	February,	Sincerity.
Bloodstone,	March,	Wisdom.
Diamond,	April,	Innocence.
Emerald,	May,	Happiness.
Agate,	June,	Prosperity.
Ruby,	July,	Constancy.
Sardonyx,	August,	Loneliness.
Sapphire,	September,	Kindness.
Opal,	October,	Changeable.
Topaz,	November,	Friendship.
Turquoise,	December,	Success.

The Significance of Birthdays

or

Our Place in the Universal Zodiac.

"The wise man rules his stars, the foolish man obeys them," is a grand and truthful saying endorsed by all really enlightened astrologers. Just as there are two systems of astronomy—the heliocentric and the geocentric, so are there two systems of astrology; and what is astrology, after all, but the psychic side of stellar science; astronomy as such dealing only with its physical aspects. We teach that every world is alive, that intelligence is universal, that so-called dead, inert or insentient matter has no demonstrable existence, for life is everywhere and every form in nature is in some degree an expression of omnipresent intelligence.

When some students asked us, after a lecture on astrology, how "those material planets" could exert any influence on intelligent human beings, we requested them to consider whether they were scientifically or philosophically justified in giving utterance to such an expression concerning the starry orbs. Every world that glows and moves in space is a manifestation, more or less perfect, of some mental and spiritual energy; and as there is no absolute inertia anywhere, the poetical and picturesque conceptions of many romantic orientals are far nearer the sober facts of modern scientific discovery, than are the cold, barren, materialistic hypotheses of those too agnostic dogmatists in the realm of physics, who decide without reason that conscienceless, sensationless matter holds sway throughout immensity.

All influences are reciprocal. No one can be influenced by anything that has no point of contact with him by reason of some corresponding affiliation with something within him. So soon as this postulate is accepted, the study of astrology and all connected therewith is wonderfully simplified; and the entire theme is rescued from the embrace of empiricism and fatalism, and placed on a rational and practical basis. While there is unquestionably a considerable percentage of truth in the information contained in the almanacs and guide books of Zadkiel, Raphael and other astrologers who publish manuals for the people, all their productions incorporate a fundamental and most injurious error whose influence upon sensitive and credulous people is baleful in the extreme. This error consists in the constantly reiterated statement that there are good and bad, benefic and malefic influences continually at work upon us, and that we are so subject to these by turn, that we are at best but little more than pieces of automatic mechanism operated by agencies entirely beyond our own control.

Whatever may be thought of the teaching conveyed through our lessons, of one thing we are certain; and that is that we are teaching a view of astrology quite at variance with the fatalism we rebuke; our entire aim being to induce people to arise in their might and declare their individual liberty. We esteem even so modest a work as our present attempt a decided step toward the establishment of a school of philosophy whose ground-work is in the glorious asseveration that every human being holds the key to his own destiny within himself; and that upon an ever increasing development of individuality depends all progress for the human race.

"One star differs from another star in glory;" and also in magnitude; but one star is not evil while another is good. We must now introduce our keynote motto: We will agree to differ, but never disagree. On the basis of this agreement we will proceed to review the astrological position, and see if we cannot learn to know ourselves and neighbors better by seeking to discover in what particular section of the great human whole we individually belong.

It can scarcely be questioned by those who have conducted any considerable research into the wise teachings of the most illustrious of ancient seers and sages, that in Egypt, Persia, Chaldea, India, and other celebrated historic lands there existed and throve in the long ago, a pure heliocentric science which combined astrology with astronomy, and taught that man was no puppet, but the ordainer of his own fate; the master of his own destiny. Such expressions as "every man has power to will his own destiny," met with occasionally in the novels of Marie Corelli and other popular authors, may be regarded as heirloom sentences which have come down to the present day from distinguished centres of ancient illumination; they also embody the convictions of most truly helpful modern thinkers who, imbued with the best thoughts of the present age, are rapidly shaking off the shackles of medieval servitude and daring to pronounce themselves "deific babes," rather than wretched worms and abject sinners. Hermes Trismegistus and all the greatest teachers of ancient Egypt taught much concerning the correspondence of humanity with the heavens. The Archetypal Man, the Greatest Man or Maximus Homo, were favorite expressions with ancient sages, and since the recent wide dissemination of the writings of Emanuel Swedenborg through Europe and America, these expressions have become comparatively familiar to modern students and scribes. Every human entity or ego contains all possibilities latent or dormant within; therefore it is reasonable to infer that it is within the range of inherent possibility for every one to develop what any one has already unfolded. But though this proposition be accepted there is here and now a law of use and order which it is well for every one of us to study, as at the present moment it is highly desirable that we all find our respective positions in the Grand Man of the whole, and do that particular work which we can best perform, and do it in such surroundings as are most conducive to its perfect execution. In these lessons we are not seeking to dogmatize as to where we shall be ten thousand years hence, or what we shall be doing then, for though our teachings are in some senses idealistic and transcendental, they are also intended to be intensely practical. Therefore, though our theme is exalted and expansive, we shall hug the shore pretty closely at present, only occasionally taking a dive out into the deep waters of our future probable achievements and attainments.

We are here and now denizens of the planet Terra, endowed with distinctive individual hopes, faculties and aspirations which are in our eyes evidences of our certain capacities. We desire what we desire because we are what we are. Our aspirations grow out of our capacities; our indwelling abilities are ever seeking expression in our longings; therefore, do we regard as sacred the yearnings of every soul.

Expansion, not repression, is a theme that needs pursuing. Take a family of from two to six children, or a class of from ten to fifty, and what wide dissimilarity do we discern! No two children or adults are any more alike in desires and felt capacities than different varieties of trees, birds, flowers, animals and fishes are alike, yet all have certain well-defined abilities and necessities. Outside of food, shelter, air, exercise, and other universal necessaries how widely divergent are the requirements of a family or group; yet it has long been the custom to force, regardless of any adaptability, the proverbial round child into a square hole, and, vice versa. Caste or class distinctions have had very much to do with this fearfully unnatural state of affairs, and wherever there are sharply defined social classes, it is impossible, without razing the barriers which divide one caste from another, to consult natural disposition.

Only a few score of years ago in Great Britain there were but five avenues of occupation open to a gentleman's son, viz.: the church, medicine, the law, the army and the navy, while all girls were brought up to regard marriage in their own set and genteel dependence the only lawful positions for females to occupy. In Germany and many other lands, occupations were hereditary; the very names of Miller, Baker, and many others proving that from generation to generation, regardless of constitutional aptitude or individual preference, sons followed their fathers' trades.

In this more stirring and inquiring day such a condition of society is fast becoming insufferable and impossible; but not yet have parents and educators realized to anything like a sufficient extent the actual requirements of the approaching commonwealth. A new and infinitely higher social and industrial condition is evolving through the recognition of the inalienable right of every man to be himself and every woman herself, an original, not a copy.

The influence of Emerson's essays is being increasingly felt every year, and when the sublime ethics embodied in those masterly pleas for individual liberty shall be universally acknowledged, society will be speedily emancipated and reconstructed on a natural and enduring foundation of uncompromising equity. In the twelve lessons which follow this introductory discourse we shall take up the twelve signs of the Zodiac seriatim. As one by one we present twelve distinct varieties of human nature, and also consider blending types, we trust that many of our readers may be helped to understand themselves and their companions better.

We aim to take a simply philosophic attitude with regard to these manifold types of human character; to pass them in review; to exhibit them at their best; to interpret them to themselves and to others, neither to eulogize nor to condemn. Before introducing these twelve consecutive discourses we will, ere we conclude this introductory essay, give the generally accepted physiological relation of the twelve signs of the Zodiac to the Human Body.

Aries, the ram, whose period is from the Vernal Equinox, (March 20) to April 20, is considered the head of the Grand Man; therefore the Aries type of person is apt to be heady in the commanding sense, i. e., given to leadership and enterprise. The next sign, Taurus, the bull, April 20 to May 21, corresponds to the neck and throat. Gemini, the twins, May 21 to June 21, signifies arms and shoulders. Cancer, the crab, June 21 to July 21, breast and stomach. Leo, the lion, July 21 to August 22, spine and heart. Virgo, the virgin, August 22 to September 23, solar plexus and internal organs. Libra, the balance, September 23 to October 22, kidneys and loins. Scorpio, the scorpion, October 22 to November 21, organs of reproduction. Sagittarius, the archer, November 21 to December 21, hips and thighs. Capricorn, the goat, December 21 to January 21, the knees. Aquarius, the water bearer, January 21 to February 21, calves and ankles. Pisces, the fishes, February 21 to March 20, the feet.

It is very interesting to test these comparisons by collecting birthday information, as thereby much interesting and important confirmation of the general theory can easily be obtained. It is also instructive and entertaining to watch the blended characteristics of two, often very opposite signs, which is a conspicuous feature of many persons whose birthday occurs between the 20th and 23rd of any month, or, as astrologers say, "on a cusp." These blendings of types often endow natives with extraordinary versatility, sometimes with embarrassing eccentricity.

March 20 to Apr 20

The First Sign—Aries

As plainly stated in our introductory essay, we regard all the signs of the Zodiac as equally good, though we fully endorse the statement that they widely differ, one from the other. In the 49th chapter of Genesis, which contains the account of Jacob blessing his twelve sons, we find twelve distinct varieties of character vividly portrayed, in connection with description of occupation and prediction concerning future career. The first son mentioned is Reuben, the first-born, whose character is singularly delineated as very complex. Reuben is described as the excellency of dignity and strength, and at the same time unstable as water, and consequently unlikely to succeed.

Without attempting any elaborate Biblical interpretation, we will simply comment as practically as possible on the strange combination of elements which are at once a source of power and weakness in the same person; and we will also venture to affirm that a better rendering of the spirit of the original text would make it read somewhat as follows: "Though thou art the beginning of strength, the excellency of dignity and power, if thou dost not vanquish thy unstable tendency, thou shalt not excel." Warnings are not arbitrary prognostications, and this fact modern prophets need to ponder well. Every type of disposition manifests some especial strength and some distinctive weakness. If the strong points in a character are diligently cultivated, the weaknesses subside; but if the weaknesses are indulged, then the things which make for greatness are forced into abeyance and lie dormant, though they are never absolutely eradicated or destroyed.

In these days when phrenology, physiognomy, and chirology are to the front, enlisting much attention, it behooves every teacher of Mental Science to intelligently discriminate between the useful and the disastrous tendencies of such studies. These sciences are all genuine and serviceable, when we regard them as indicatory, but not arbitrary delineators of character.

Heads, faces, hands, and lines in any part of the body, when intelligently studied, reveal temperament, indicate special directions of genius, and also show at what particular stage of development a person now stands; but the entire body can be completely, and even rapidly, made over by the renewing, reforming action of altered thought; therefore there are no insuperable obstacles in the way of either mental or physical regeneration.

Two facts need to be constantly borne in mind by all who study these lessons. First, our characters are born with us, and need to be studied so that we may learn to successfully co-operate in useful undertakings for the general good. Second, all undesirable traits are changeable malformations or inversions, and can be successfully overcome by an intelligent, persistent metaphysical process.

Now to consider the Aries type in detail (birthday between March 20 and April 20, of any year): Broadly speaking, this type of character is prophetic, energetic, prescient, fond of novelties, always looking forward and not backward, with a decided tendency toward extreme ideality. Persons who are confirmed in this sign are natural pioneers and leaders of thought and action, but as a rule they are far better adapted to direct the work of others than to execute the designs themselves. Architects and devisers of new styles in everything are numerous in this sign, and so are people who have the reputation for being headstrong, self-opinionated and hard to subdue under restraint of accepted usage and established precedent. Persons whose home is in this section of the Zodiac, or who occupy this province in the Grand Man are always enterprising and given to exploration in some field. If we consider an ordinary or merely frivolous example of this nature, we shall find the inventive faculty exercised in planning new amusements, devising new pastimes and setting new fashions to be observed in social entertainment and exhibited on dress parade in Vanity Fair. When the Aries person is intellectually unfolded then the same enterprising disposition is manifested in vastly superior ways, for such an one is given to prospect new fields of mental activity, and declare to the world prophetically the approaching advent of some revolutionary change in the kingdom of thought.

When the moral nature in this sign is very largely unfolded the person is adapted to serve as a progressive ethical teacher; one who can brush away the cobwebs of antiquated errors, and show to the people a far more excellent manner of life. When the psychical element is in the ascendancy, great psychometric and clairvoyant ability is shown, and the far-reaching penetration of such a mind can be most advantageously employed in giving good and needed counsel regarding coming events and, as yet, undreamed of situations.

It is easy enough to see that if this general delineation is to any extent accurate, there are faults and weaknesses and even liabilities to disease common to this class of temperaments, which can be understood and rectified by any intelligent, persistent practitioner of Mental Science. As the strength of Aries is in all that pertains to the intellect and to quick forward vision, as well as to sensitive hearing, taste and smell, the extreme sensitiveness which is usually characteristic of so highly strung or keyed a nature may easily become a source of danger if the person be imperfectly balanced or has not reached a state of equipoise, which is invariably necessary to health and prosperity.

The disorders common to the Aries type are unpleasant noises in the head and ears; a too great rush of blood to the brain; sleeplessness and all other symptoms peculiar to hyper-sensitive constitutions. But because there are tendencies to these specific weaknesses no one need succumb to them; they can all be vanquished when the right mental attitude is taken and maintained.

In considering Aries as the head and face it is well to remark that as four out of the five universally acknowledged bodily senses are situated in the head and face exclusively, only one (touch) being extended over the body, the fullest expression of Aries would be in a person whose senses generally are unusually keen and ever on the alert; and if Aries be represented in one-twelfth part of the human family, it is not at all too much to say that eleven-twelfths of the people are not calculated to fill leading positions; and not being adapted to such offices in a normal state of society they will not seek them, for their desires will not prompt them in that direction. It is a fact that cannot be disputed that the number who are really ambitious to fill conspicuous places and lead the thought of others, is comparatively small. Most men, as well as most women, prefer a comparatively obscure to a conspicuously public career; and far fewer men than at present appear anxious for social prominence, would seek it if the artificial pretense and unmerited emoluments, now often attached to it, were withdrawn.

What we mean by a desire for a special field of occupation is a desire for the work itself, not for the fancied advantages which may accrue from engaging in it; and it is on the basis of this true desire that we are seeking to upbuild a new educational system, natural instead of artificial.

Froebel, the father of the kindergarten system in Germany, said that never more than fifteen scholars should be allotted to one teacher; and we would offer an amendment to even that resolution, by urging that so thorough a scrutiny should be made of all the children submitted to a board of examiners for classification in the schools that only children who can profit by the same discipline and show signs of adaption to the same pursuits, should be called upon to study together. This provision grows far more imperative as age advances and the need for a choice of profession draws near.

Aries children are very often a source of great discomfort in homes and schools where they are not understood, and especially where repression rather than expression is the end desired. Such children are restless, prying, inquisitive, always questioning and very seldom contented to "let well enough alone." Such enterprising natures exhibit a much larger development of the perceptive than of the reflective faculties; therefore, though they may be genuine seers and the subjects of reliable visions, they are not prepared to stand alone and carry out their schemes unaided. As these children are often cruelly repressed and made to suffer greatly, both in mind and body, from the ignorance of those who are over them, we deem it a humanitarian effort to seek to explain them to others; for not infrequently they fail to understand their own natures and cannot interpret the emotions which sway them.

Very sensitive natures have usually a tendency to fly off at tangents. Genius frequently accompanies, or is accompanied by, pronounced eccentricity. No one doubts the genius of Lord Byron or that of Edgar Allan Poe, yet no one can pronounce either of these brilliant poets a well balanced man. To see something ahead, not quite plainly; to know that it is coming, without being able to calculate the time of its advent; to be fully aware of the part you are yourself called to play in connection with its approach, and yet to lack the external means for carrying out your purpose, is always trying, and to an intense, impetuous nature, it is exasperating in the extreme. Idealists and visionaries are full of good schemes and noble projects; they usually stand for freedom and equity as against tyranny and antiquated misbeliefs; but they are not, as a rule, practical in the commonplace sense of that word.

All artistic occupations seem favorable to the Aries type; and children who are permitted to carry out their artistic promptings undisturbed will often give satisfactory evidence to all interested in their welfare, that though they would be illy adapted for farming or mechanical pursuits, they can grow up to render priceless service to the most uncompromising utilitarians by prospecting ahead and planning the way for coming inventions of great practical utility.

Two great questions, why? and how? seem ever on the lips of the Aries child, who often delights to pull a watch to pieces to see what makes it go. At this point constructiveness and destructiveness seem very closely allied, as destructive measures are often adopted to secure ends of new construction. The analytical faculty when not held in leash by other tendencies often leads to the cruelties and atrocities of the vivisectionist's torture chamber, and even to the stupendous error of the famous painter who slew his model in the interest of realistic art so as to faithfully depict upon canvas the actual expression caught from a human being expiring in agony.

As our philosophic task is simply to examine and compare and trace tendencies to their source, we find no difficulty in this dispassionate review of twelve great varieties of human expression, when called upon to adhere closely to the sovereign motto of Mental Scientists, "All is Good."

All is good, but order is heaven's first law; and when we are in disorder it is as though we mistook ink for coffee or even undertook to eat wearing apparel and dress ourselves in food stuffs. Everything has its use, place and time, and this is all that the wise astrologer ever seeks to inculcate beyond teaching people as far as possible to practically apply an optimistic view of life to every undertaking.

As the Aries type of mind is very inquiring it is apt to be skeptical, even though given to a love and pursuit of the marvellous; and here do we strike a very remarkable combination which is apparently oftentimes extremely inconsistent. Skepticism and credulity go hand in hand, as they are both extreme, and extremes can always meet. The best example of Aries is never without something of the butting quality of the ram, which—endowed with horns—is admirably qualified to push obstacles from the path, when they threaten to impede progress. There is very little cautiousness ordinarily displayed in this sign; intrepidity is far more common. The danger is in the direction of leaping before looking; or of displaying zeal untempered with discretion.

A companion, teacher, or adviser needed by a distinctly Aries person is a sympathetic, intelligent man, woman or child, who can see the beauty of ideals and appreciate venturesomeness and yet be sufficiently matter-of-fact to discourage rash action by counseling a little more consideration before an irrevocable step is taken. There are many people who have enough of the Aries quality to make them enterprising and energetic, who are yet sufficiently modified by counteracting influences to avoid running to extremes or acting too precipitately in any circumstances.

If the date of birth is immediately before or after March 20, the characteristics of Pisces will probably be intermingled; and these are of a nature to afford firm anchorage to the past before starting out on new voyages of discovery. If the birthday is about the 20th of April or a little before that date, then the patient, plodding, persevering, executive qualities of Taurus make an excellent contribution toward balancing the tendency to flightiness which is always the bane of Aries. No words are more truly descriptive of the complete Aries type than heady and headstrong; but be it always remembered that in so far as any characteristic exclusively manifested produces aberration, some counteracting tendencies which lie dormant within every one of us can be awakened through the steady action of desire, and concentrated expectancy symphonizing with desire.

Before turning our attention to the subject of the next lesson (Taurus) it will be admissible to say a few words on the various planets which all astrologers admit exert a decided influence in addition to the houses or signs.

Mercury rising at birth denotes quickness of motion, desire for travel and reasonable likelihood of success in commercial or mercantile pursuits. Mercury in mythology, represented with wings at his heels; ever associated with quicksilver, proverbial for its volatility; aptly designated the swift messenger of the gods, describes an extremely enterprising individual. Mercury in Aries would describe the most impulsive, excitable creature imaginable; one who would never like to keep still two minutes together; one who would thrive upon constant activity and be quite unhappy and disconsolate unless things all about him were in a continual buzz and stir. We all know such people, and though the vibrations they are perpetually throwing out are intensely wearing upon some natures, they make excellent healers in cases where gout, rheumatism and other chronic states of congestion constitute the malady. The work of such people lies with those who are subject to cold extremities; whose hands and feet are clammy; whose blood circulates sluggishly; whose mental action is torpid, and who need a general waking up. But to introduce such feverish, excitable persons to those whose ailments are of a febrile nature would be to make the greatest mistake imaginable.

Venus always denotes love of the beautiful; all the fine arts, music, painting, sculpture and all decorative work may be said to be under the patronage of this lovely goddess, to employ the mythologic phrase. Venus in Aries is very different from Mercury in the same sign, though there is a similarity in the temperament of all Aries people; but whereas the Mercurian influence would lead toward commercial activity and money making, the influence of Venus would tend to a cultivation of distinctively artistic traits; though of course it would be quite natural and legitimate for a person thus endowed to earn a good living as some sort of an artist. Mars we regard as the intellectual planet per se, and to the influence of Mars we trace scientific proclivities of the most marked type. Aries people who are strongly influenced by Mars may or may not be combative in the pugilistic sense; (they never are unless their development is very inferior;) but they are invariably given to the prosecution of scientific researches; their intellectual development is often phenomenally great.

Jupiter, which denotes sphericity, a well rounded electro-magnetic temperament in which intellect and emotion are pleasantly united, gives, if rising at the birth of an Aries child, that good-natured, happy disposition, which, when united with the enterprise and inquisitiveness which Aries always exhibits, tones down asperities, mellows and sweetens the nature and proves an efficient safeguard against the many dangers which beset the path of the over-impulsive and unwary. Saturn gives always a tone mysterious, and inclines the nature toward taciturnity, while Mercury is ever given to loquacity. Saturn's reputed evil influence is only attributable to the difficulty which most people experience in appreciating, much less comprehending, the occult; and though the universal testimony concerning Saturn is that it makes against, rather than for, material prosperity, its influence conduces to patient studies which ultimately lead to intelectual renown and victory. Aries people with strong Saturnine tendency are silently enterprising, and make excellent students of occult arts and lore.

Herschel or Uranus is always peculiar, and when it is in the ascendant in Aries, the eccentricities of the individual are extraordinarily conspicuous. Neptune is also regarded as exerting an influence singularly remote from the ordinary, and may fairly be looked upon as standing for purely spiritual directions of mind and feeling which lie quite outside the region of normal mundane speculation.

As typical instances of the Aries character, astrologers have cited such notable men as William the First of Germany, Bismark, and Napoleon the Third of France, whose careers have certainly been marked by enterprise and ambition and attended by many trying and peculiar circumstances.

The student will kindly bear in mind that the subject in detail can only be thoroughly understood by protracted study.

The Second Sign---Taurus

Taurus, the bull, whose period is from April 21 to May 21, connects Aries, the head, with Gemini, the arms and shoulders of the Grand Man, and stands for all that sort of usefulness which may reasonably be expected from a neck or bridge connecting two important sections of a concrete and coupled anatomy. The distinctly Taurus type of man or woman often literally possesses a strong, thick neck, and is in many ways far better adapted to act as a servant than as a master in the conduct of any enterprise. But remember, we use the word servant in the broad, inclusive sense; we intend to convey no thought pertaining to servile or demeaning positions. As the motto of the Knights Templar and of the Prince of Wales is the German "Ich dien" (I serve), and there can hardly be a higher or lordlier position than that of the heir-apparent to a throne except the very seat upon the throne itself; so when the president of a republic is regarded as the chief magistrate appointed by the voting people to execute their will, the kind of servant indicated by the sign Taurus is by no means one who fills a so-called menial position. It is, however, a notable fact that men who are chosen to fill the highest offices in the gift of a nation are rarely men of great originality of thought or action. With but few extraordinary exceptions, the highest places in the public gift are occupied by men whose party has placed them where they stand, rather than their individuality.

Aries sends few people to stations where subjectivity to the will of others is considered a desideratum; and Aries people are, for the most part, so individualistic and eccentric that they are in a decided, though often a very cultured and intelligent, minority. Aries people are, moreover, given to building castles in the air; there are many architects among them; but the solid, substantial, practical builders are among the bulls who keep close to earth, to cultivate its natural resources, direct its finance, and carry into actual execution the romantic dreams of the impulsive members of the province of Aries.

General Grant and Louis Kossuth are both cited as conspicuous examples of the Taurus type, which is strong, plodding, persistent, capable and executive.

Though no two signs can be more opposite in their characteristics and tendencies than Aries and Taurus, they are opposites, but not contradictories. By this we mean that two persons, the one confirmed strongly in Aries, and the other in Taurus, though extremely dissimilar in tastes and feelings, can, if both are intelligent, soon learn not only to appreciate each other's excellencies, and live side by side in peace and good will, but so far co-operate that one finds himself really essential to the welfare of the other in the conduct of a joint enterprise, the success of which depends upon diverse but harmonized activities.

To use a musical metaphor, Aries and Taurus may be unlike as two such instruments as an organ and a cornet, or a piano and a violin, or dissimilar as two such voices as a high soprano and a deep contralto; yet in both instrumental and vocal rendition, the two unlike instruments can be played delightfully together, and the two very dissimilar voices can blend in a charming duet.

Two rules need always to be remembered, viz.: that persons who work best together are either closely allied in feeling and attainments, or else extremely different; also that when any two well-meaning people do not get along together, a third person, who is a sincere mutual friend, can act as a solvent oftentimes, and so harmonize them that they come to resemble oil and water united by the action of an efficient chemical, which closely resembles neither one nor the other, but can unite the twain until they become one to all intents and purposes.

To typically illustrate some experiences with decided Aries and Taurus people who are drawn together and work in concert, we will picture a committee meeting where Mr. and Mrs. Ram and Mr. and Mrs. Bull have rightfully equal voice and interest. Our good friends, the Rams, are extremely progressive. Their eyes are always fixed on a goal ahead. They have little or no respect for ancient customs and accepted usages. To them the sentiment embodied in the phrase "what was good enough for my grandfather is good enough for me," is detestable, as nothing in their eyes is so unpalatable as stagnation. Keen-sighted, with an abundance of foresight, very ardent in their desires to introduce innovations, they are rather given to follow in the track of those Athenians mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, 17th chapter, who spent their entire time in the search for novelties, or in the consideration of new things. Aries people are always apt to love new things because they are new, without always sifting them to their foundations to discover how valuable or solid may be the foundation on which they rest. But our ideal Mr. and Mrs. Ram are very intelligent as well as progressive people, and not at all disposed to be willfully reckless. They are indeed veritable prophets. They can and do see ahead farther than other members of the committee of which they form a part; but though they see clearly what ought to be done, they are not ways-and-means people; therefore, were it not for their good, practical neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. Bull, they would not get their point carried, or their schemes reduced to practice.

Taurus sits still, patiently listening and calmly considering the feasibility of the reformatory movements proposed by Aries; and when this sign rises to its feet and proposes actually to take certain definite steps to accomplish what Aries has suggested and foreseen as highly desirable—without, however, seeing how to bring it about—everybody begins to realize that there are builders as well as architects on the board of directors of the association.

Taurus is not prescient or inventive. It does not follow Paul's advice to forget the things behind and press forward to the prize ahead; but though lacking in originality and suggestive enterprise, were it not for Taurus, fine schemes would remain on paper; excellent theories would abound, but they would not be reduced to practice.

Aries is the sign of theorists and idealists. Taurus is the sign of practitioners and realists; while those who are on the cusp combining the leading attributes of both, are those rara aves who are both idealistic and realistic in marked degree.

We will now instance a happily married couple husband Aries, wife Taurus. The man in this case is a singularly high-strung, nervous fellow, very much given to pushing business and going forward with enterprises which his sanguine temperament assures him will be successful, though he can never explain to himself or any one else where the money is coming from or how the scheme will prosper. His wife is a quiet, thoughtful woman, a good home maker and an excellent mother, as unlike her spouse as can be; but she loves him, respects him, believes in him and aids him. When he is full of some rather wild ambition he talks it all over with her, and though she is no match for him in ingenuity and eloquence she nevertheless shows him just how to set to work to put machinery in motion to mature his cherished plan. He may at first chafe a little at her slow, methodical suggestions. He may somewhat rebel at nature's leisurely evolutionary processes, but he is the seed sower and she is the one who waters the earth after the seed is in the ground, and carefully nurtures and protects it during the germinative period.

When we read in the New Testament that Paul planted and Apollos watered, and then came the increase; we have it suggested to us that two friends, fellow-workers, one of the Aries and the other of the Taurus type, combined their impulse and executive force and secured, through the working of the unchanging law of the universe, a plentiful crop of satisfactory results. Of course it is just as likely that the wife may be Aries and the husband Taurus, as vice versa; but in that case, if they understood and appreciated each other, the result would be exactly the same as though it were the other way.

An Aries child is usually restless, volatile, and given to incessant motion; thinks quickly, eats, walks and does everything hurriedly; but a Taurus child is often thought to be heavy and not so bright. Though the ideas grasped and externalized by the Taurus type of mind are often deeply profound, it is useless to expect very swift action when dealing with individuals in this section of the Zodiac.

The ram has always been represented as slain, from the foundation of the world, and offered up in sacrifice upon the equinoctial crossing. Aries is the sign of pioneer martyrs, those who pave the way for great achievements on the basis of their discoveries and declarations, after they have passed from mortal sight. Taurus people are apt to enjoy very comfortable worldly conditions. They are frequently money-getters and money-keepers. Bankers, brokers, and those who speculate profitably and take charge of accumulated savings are frequently found in Taurus. Aries often makes an excellent presiding officer, an attractive and eloquent acting chairman; but Taurus is selected as treasurer of the corporation. When the sacred Apis, the white bull, was worshiped and led in solemn procession on festal days in ancient Egypt, there was a great deal of astrological knowledge displayed in such ceremonies; and the present use of the word bull on the stock exchange harmonizes quite well with the Taurus disposition. The bull is not a ferocious animal unless aroused, but when angry he can fight furiously; and this is generally true of Taurus people. Their reserve force and stored energy are great. They are very tenacious, and can afford to bide their time and await the favorable moment for action. As friends they are usually reliable, and may be depended upon in times of real necessity; and so wealthy are they in interior resources, that out of their abundance of latent strength they can give out sustaining vigor and truly helpful sympathy without suffering any sense of depletion themselves.

Aries people incline to the theory of Mental Science. They are good theoretical demonstrators, and in cases where a patient needs quickening and rousing to action, their mental treatments are frequently extremely efficacious. Taurus people are naturally disposed to giving magnetic treatment. They make excellent masseurs, and as attendants upon weak, nervous, timid persons, they have few equals and no superiors. Being very practical, they usually want to see just how a thing is to be done before they will take hold of it. They are often a little over-cautious and sometimes rather too leisurely in action; but they are sure, and can be safely relied upon. As Aries people, when afflicted, are chiefly prone to disorders of the head, Taurus people who have not learned to conquer undesirable tendencies, are most prone to troubles in the neck, and often, if they are conservative and stolid, they suffer severely in that direction. Nothing can be truer than the words of Ella Wheeler Wilcox, "There is nothing we cannot overcome." But those beautiful optimistic words of a gifted poetess would be meaningless if there were no tendencies to be mastered. "He that overcometh shall inherit all things;" but this statement also would mean nothing if there were no trials to encounter, efforts to make and victories to win.

The student will plainly perceive that our teaching is that every type of character has its special excellencies and its peculiar temptations. Individualization is the sole and sovereign antidote to every conceivable weakness, no matter whether it be inherited or subsequently acquired. No abnormal state is natural, and no disease is unconquerable. But in order to understand ourselves and others it is highly desirable that we take temperament into consideration, for by so doing we shall greatly enlarge the circuit of our usefulness and qualify ourselves to do a much greater work in truly teaching and healing the multitude than we could otherwise accomplish.

If a horoscope is cast and the planets are regarded as well as the sign, then the varieties within the Taurus type can easily be explained, as follows: Mercury rising will cause a Taurus person to be singularly active and energetic, but the executive and fecundative quality of Taurus will only be affected thereby so far as direction is concerned. The essential capability will remain just the same, only the native will be more impulsive in his executiveness than are those whose planetary connections are different.

If Venus be in the ascendant, then the executive faculty will take an artistic turn.

If Mars be most prominent, then the execution will probably be distinctly scientific, and to an extent iconoclastic.

Jupiter, which is always amiable, expansive and comprehensive, would endow a Taurus person with a singular amount of natural good-nature, and incline to a very consoling, happy, contented disposition.

Saturn, always problematical and occult, would make the Taurus type extremely silent and meditative, causing a child to prefer a silent corner with a book, to the busy playground and his convivial playmates.

Uranus, always peculiar, would give the Taurus native a decided tendency to work alone, persistently, at some strange work which he would probably carefully secrete and carry forward surreptitiously.

Neptune in Taurus would give a tendency to spirituality reduced to a science, and we can hardly think of any more practical type of religionist than such an one, who would care more for good deeds than well-sounding creeds, and would, therefore, be a very desirable member of society in all respects.

To sum up Taurus, we need only add that he does a great deal of the practical work of the world, and is greatly needed as a companion and co-worker with Aries, who precedes him. No better characterization of the two can be given than to say that the former is the architect and the latter the builder; Aries, the theorist; Taurus, the executant.

People born between Apr. 21 and May 21

Dr. Jenner
Shakespeare Cromwell
Balzac
Froebel
Faber
James
Gibbon
Turner
Browning
Wesley Huxley
Barrie
Kossuth

Mann
Spencer
Gottschalk
Kant
Hume
~~Cooper~~
U. S. Grant
Seward
Marie

Mercury rules Gemini
Gemini is said to rule the Hunter
May 20 to June 20

The Third Sign---Gemini, the Twins

After passing from Aries through Taurus we come to the most versatile sign in the entire Zodiac. Those persons who are decidedly of the Gemini type can never content themselves with a single occupation or pursuit. They have always two and often several strings to their bow. While for the majority of persons a single occupation may suffice, two trades are necessary to those who embody the characteristics of the Twins, which are distinct though not separate. It being no part of our philosophy to look upon any type of nature as undesirable, though no two decided types can possibly be alike, we teach consistently with the sum of our philosophy that the characteristic versatility and even volatility of Gemini people is a sign in their favor, as it enables them to execute many designs; to carry many purposes into effect; to avoid ruts, and to attain a surprising degree of command over environments, by quickly adapting themselves to differing situations.

As Gemini stands for the shoulders, arms and hands of the Grand Man, it naturally expresses duality. There is but one head and but one neck to the body, though the head is divided into many sections; but shoulders, arms and hands are distinctly right and left. There are two of each, and certainly the hands and arms can act apart, and can even act in defiance of each other. The two sides of the human organism denote respectively intellect and affection. When emotion and reason are completely blended, so that they always act together, we witness so happy a combination of forces and activities that the individual thus spiritually married within himself is a pattern of equanimity, and is a singularly successful healer as well as teacher; but when a person of the Castor and Pollux type expresses divergence and conflict, then as a house divided against itself such an one is very likely to suffer from much desolation.

No type of person needs so much drilling on the subject of unity and co-operation as do those in Gemini, whose period is from about May 20 to June 20. Instructions on how to blend the understanding and the will, to unite desire and expectation, are peculiarly valuable and most necessary to persons of this stamp; and Gemini people readily take to new ideas, and are not usually limited or creed-bound, but disposed to launch out into fields of investigation, if only to gratify their love of change; they make excellent pupils, though they are not always very constant. The special tendency which needs disciplining and regulating in such people is their tendency to fly off at tangents, to leave things incomplete as they rush forward to some new task. The studios of Gemini people are often completely littered with unfinished books, paintings, statues and other artistic works, which they have begun but never finished. When this erratic tendency is properly regulated Gemini people are charming, by reason of the diversity of their accomplishments and the number of the positions they can fill. As a rule they are excellent people to call upon in an emergency, as they usually know how to act in situations widely different from the positions they generally occupy. They often work in stores as clerks and book-keepers, and still they are quite talented artists or well up in some branch of professional knowledge.

Superficial observers often scold Gemini children for their lack of steady perseverance in a single task; but profounder students of human nature make instant friends with them through sympathetic appreciation of their needs. There are children who can devote three, four or even five consecutive hours day after day to a regular routine course of studies and enjoy it; for mental pursuits are so adapted to their constitution that they need but little physical exercise beyond what they get going to school and returning home, and moving about in the ordinary discharge of a sedentary occupation. Others again detest the confinement of any school room where the head is taxed and the hands and feet are not given much opportunity for motion. In the former case an intellectual course of activity harmonizes with the needs of student; in the latter, out-door work involving pedestrian exercise is the desideratum.

Gemini children and adults cannot be satisfied with one or the other, for they need a combination of both; thus if some of the excellent suggestions contained in Dr. J. R. Buchanan's "New Education" were faithfully carried out, Gemini children would not complain as they do, and grown people would not find their stereotyped rounds of engagements as irksome as they often are. If all persons understood their own needs sufficiently to voice them and minister to them, there would be very few invalids and very few sad people upon earth, but as long as ignorance prevails, wants will be disregarded or uncomprehended. Consequently sufferings will continue to urge us forward to the acquisition of more knowledge so that we may better our condition.

A Gemini person must have change of thought, of scene, of occupation, and the less unfolded he is on the higher planes of his nature, the more he requires external variety.

Ralph Waldo Emerson and Margaret Fuller Ossoli, may be cited as extremely advanced illustrations of the Gemini character; but such rare and high specimens are models rather than samples in the case. These models, however, display the characteristics of this dual sign very prominently and unmistakably, but so metaphysically as to cause them to be beacon lights, as they certainly are, to lead others forward to the heights they have already scaled. Emerson is one of the strongest literary magnets in the reading world to-day, and for versatility we know of scarcely any other author who can rank with him. Mentally Emerson travelled everywhere. Therefore it was not necessary for him to take his body over the globe. Gemini people are globe trotters till they have found the centre of attraction within. Then they can stay at home and be the Mahomet who can call the mountain to himself, not needing any longer to make a pilgrimage to the mountain in order to breathe its bracing air and feel the invigorating influence thrown out by its massive, majestic proportions.

Queen Victoria is a great historic example of the Gemini type. One who deeply studies England's famous queen will discern that in that remarkable woman were embodied many decidedly opposite qualities. Without the least disrespect it may be said that Victoria's reign was one of the most brilliant and eventful, and at the same time inconsistent, reigns in history.

The Gemini type of mind is always astonishing those who seek to fathom it with perplexing paradoxes, which appear like, but are not, contradictions. A person who is both generous and parsimonious, or bold and timid, or conservative and progressive, is an enigma. Still these opposite tendencies need not be contradictory, as they are only expressions of a nature rich in manifold possibilities. A man of one idea, one who rides a hobby, is not difficult to summarize; but a nature which shows forth diametrically opposite traits, and yet does not plead guilty to the charge of inconsistency, is surely a study for the anthropologist.

Astrology can be turned to the best possible account and do an unlimited amount of good, if people who are looking into it, will first read their own and others' birth signs in a way calculated to interpret human nature to itself without allowing themselves to be influenced even in the slightest degree by a doctrine of blind fatalism, which is of all false dogmas the most depressing and injurious ever invented by human ignorance and superstition.

In reading character, as well as in reading horoscopes, with a view to discovering character, it is all essential that the student should never lose sight of the facts that faults and ailments are only aberrations or inversions, negative results of ignorance. The greater force of character any one possesses, the greater necessarily is his power. Power must be understood and wisely directed, or it may be exhibited in a most disorderly and destructive manner.

Gemini people are almost always impulsive and quick-witted, as well as versatile. They like to have many things going at once. Therefore, if they allow themselves to run wild, and do not discipline their instinct for change and versatility, they drift into the confusion of a studio filled with unfinished pictures, or a writer's sanctum strewn with literary efforts in all stages of incompleteness, with not a finished production among the lot.

The proper corrective for this chaotic and often wasteful method of procedure is to intelligently admit that the chief peculiarity of the Gemini type is not only love of change, but positive need for diversity of occupation. In order to satisfy the legitimate demands of such a nature, let the day's work be divided into sections, entailing as much diversity in employment as possible. At school Gemini children often greatly enjoy studying arithmetic one hour, then French the next hour, and music the third hour. Or they will gladly turn from a Greek lesson to a cooking class. They will work industriously and continuously, provided they are not made to suffer monotony. They need recreation to a great extent. Indoor and out-door sports and exercises should be alternated in their case as frequently as possible.

Many people who are confirmed in this sign can appreciate church, lecture hall, concert room, theatre, social gathering, club, hotel and private residence; but any monotonous harping upon one string is detestable to them. They usually like to take in everything that is going. They are the very reverse of puritanical in their thoughts and feelings, and often shock Mrs. Grundy and the "unco' guid" by the apparent levity with which they are apt to treat even the most serious subjects. As writers, teachers and healers they have a wonderful faculty for reaching a great variety of persons, as they can readily adapt themselves to very opposite states of mind. Gemini people are more often sparkling and brilliant than profound; but as they are generally witty and originative, they afford much instruction, as well as amusement, when they are at their best.

It is easy to see that the disorders to which such people are most likely to be subject are those of a distinctly nervous type. Consequently they cannot easily stand much worry or anxiety, and require a large amount of sleep. Ten hours out of the twenty-four may well be apportioned to sleep with persons of this temperament, if Mercury was rising at their time of birth. If Saturn was the ascendant planet, then eight hours may suffice.

As we have given in the two preceding lessons the general aspects of the planets, and what they indicate, and we have no wish to be tautological, we will leave it to the reader at this time to make planetary applications in the light of the general outlines suggested in those two lessons.

Remember that the rising planet never changes, but it does modify and supplement the distinctive influence of the sign.

And now a word on the physiological correspondence. As previously stated, Aries is the head and Taurus the neck of the Grand Man, and the functions of head and neck are decidedly distinct, though thoroughly co-operative. The one leads and the other follows. The position of Gemini, as shoulders, arms and hands, denotes capacity for attending to details and accomplishing much through manual effort. All Gemini people love to work with their hands, but it depends much upon their culture, refinement and education as to the special form of manual occupation which is best adapted to them. The rougher type of Gemini people will be busily engaged in such handicraft as requires the display of comparatively little intelligence and scarcely any artistic development; while those on a higher plane will execute beautiful work, many in this sign being exceedingly accomplished painters, sculptors and performers on musical instruments. As it is possible for two hands to be arrayed against each other, though it is orderly and natural for them to work perfectly together, Gemini people must seek before all things to become houses united within themselves; and when they are so, they are usefully executive in high degree.

Gemini people
Wagner
Ibsen
Grieg
Offenbach
Schumann
Milton
Mesmer
Whitman
Hood
Hardy
Nathan Hale
Nathaniel Greene
Thomas Moore
Pope
Brigham Young
Plato

The Fourth Sign---Cancer, the Crab.

In dealing with this, the most paradoxical of the twelve signs, we shall endeavor to elucidate, as far as possible, the seeming discrepancies in character and conduct, which are so obviously in evidence among people whose place is to be found in this province of the Zodiac. The period of Cancer is from about June 21 to July 21, when Leo commences his reign. The time of the summer solstice is the time when the days begin to shorten and the nights to lengthen, just as the winter solstice occurs when the nights begin to shorten and the days to lengthen. It has been well said many times that man's progress, like that of the planets, is always a spiral pathway, not straight forward without breaks or interruptions Nature brings us alternating seasons of heat and cold, moist and dry, light and dark, seed sowing and harvesting; and as we live in harmony with nature all about us declaring that all is good, and that no experience bodes evil; we grow to love the changing seasons and to rejoice in what seems to be a backward, while it is in reality a forward, move.

Cancer, to our way of thinking, stands for the conservative element in the world, for slow motion, but always sure, though slow. Cancer people are, for the most part, wedded to antiquities. They pay very high, often inordinate respect, to old families, because they have a long pedigree and well defined family tree, without asking how meritorious the present members of such families may be. Cancer loves to put the question, "Who was your grandfather?" This tendency is certainly in many cases retrogressive, rather than progressive. At the same time, it must be acknowledged that Cancer is not alone in this characteristic. Virgo, too, shares with Cancer an exceeding veneration for "blue blood;" and we cannot deny that there is a certain advantage in good heredity. But we must remember that while all undesirable hereditary acquisitions can be thrown aside, and all harmful tendencies conquered, if we will but try; we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that heredity has a place and does exert an influence, in shaping a disposition. Mental Science teaches the way out of all difficulties and dangers, but Mental Scientists are not, therefore, required to deny the existence of the disadvantageous conditions they successfully work to overcome. While the habit of retrospection, which is a conspicuous trait of the Cancer temperament, is far too often misused to serve the ends of a false and pessimistic philosophy, it is quite possible to so discipline and employ this tendency as to make it very useful in considering a history of all past triumphs and successes. And in this discipline Cancer should score a glorious triumph indeed, for Cancer, the breast is essentially the sign and seat of the material, protecting, sympathetic love, and here lies Cancer's redemption from its bonds of custom and ancient traditions. When, in Cancer people, this intense love of children, of home, of the beautiful, is developed and broadened into the love of the whole human race, recognizing the true brotherhood of man; into the love of universal peace, from the belief that "the heart of the world is one"; when they turn from the love of the beautiful that leads them to deck their persons and their homes in purple and fine linen, to the love of the spirit clothed in the shining garments of righteousness and the temple of the spirit made beautiful within; then we find one of the most forceful characters for good in the whole Zodiac.

Thus, in Masonic Societies, in lodges of Odd Fellows, in labor unions and other great movements toward universal understanding, we find large numbers of these spiritually awakened Cancer people, looking toward a perfect expression of the higher life, manifested in physical betterment, and spiritual brotherhood.

An exceeding fondness for display often characterizes the taste of undeveloped people in this sign and is largely due to their love of approbation, which is stronger than their self-esteem; and though these two qualities are often confounded, no two in the entire range of human faculties are farther apart, so far as the influence they exert is concerned, though we may find them near together on a phrenological chart. Self-esteem tends in the direction of fearless self-assertion. It is a leading trait of the most energetic and very boldest among pioneers who have espoused and are determined to champion a new cause, no matter how unpopular it may yet continue to be. Approbativeness goes with a timid, shrinking, ultra-sensitive, and sometimes vain nature. Vanity and self-conceit are not the same, although these again are usually frequently confounded. Conservative people are devout worshipers at Mrs. Grundy's most foolish shrine. They dread innovations for fear of being ridiculed or of not standing well with the world at large. They dote on candle, incense, rubrics and ancient usages, and mediaeval rites and customs are fascinating to them.

Thus Cancer people are very useful as historians and archaeologists, and as they love to delve among ancient ruins and rummage through old book-cases, they certainly contribute a great deal to our stock of knowledge.

Cancer is the sign of memory, as Aries is of ideality. The idealist is constitutionally given to looking ahead, while the memorist is ever looking backward. Memory alone is, in our judgment, a singularly overated faculty, and instead of trying to cultivate memory to excess, and always depending upon it, we should strive for penetrativeness, foresight and many other gifts and graces of which the worshipers of memory take little or no account. We think every experienced mental healer will bear us out in our statement that the injunction, "You must forget it," needs to be used far oftener in mental practice when one is conversing with a patient, than "You must be sure and not forget it." Cancer people have usually extremely retentive memories; and if they can only undertake to discipline these memories, they can convert the cause of their chief failing to a means of real and steady growth. Remembrances of victories are good, while all recollections of defeat are depressing. Memorial tablets must become so subservient to the will, that we can write upon them and efface from them whatsoever we choose. A good memory is not the ultima thule of human attainment; and a correct, precise verbal memory, which can recall every detail of past experience at a moment's notice, is by no means so helpful as most people think, until it has been thoroughly disciplined and completely subdued to the awakened will. The remembrance of former greatness is often depressing, and leads to sighing over lost opportunities, when strength is needed here and now to buckle on the armor of resistance to fear and to leap forward, to conquer in the future.

The Chinese Empire is in the sign Cancer. The Mongolian race is especially an example of the nature of the crab in the Zodiac. Confucius, great moralist and profound teacher of high ethics though he was, cannot be compared with Moses as a type of progress Moses was always urging the people to forget the flesh-pots of Egypt; not to loiter in the desert, but to march forward to an untried Canaan. Confucius was ever insisting upon veneration for ancestors and formal obedience to old customs. Etiquette plays an immense part in the Confucian system, and much of it has become senseless, cumbersome and in no way calculated to advance the interests of those who rigorously observe it.

Undeveloped Cancer people in any part of the world are too much given to pay court to mere externals. They are, as a rule, extremely conventional; they love old books, old pantings, old china, old buildings, and every kind of ancient usage. A full-blooded thoroughbred Cancer person adores antiquity; is much given to ritual observances, no mat ter whether in church or home; thinks much and speaks frequently of established use and precedent, and is very fearful of kicking over the traces, and marching out into any field where Mrs. Grundy will not lead the way. In a very progressive family or community, such a person, because highly sensitive, will be considerably affected by the atmosphere of the place or circle in which he moves, and may, of the place or circle in which he moves, and may, therefore, become progressive through his surroundings, casting aside the usual tendency to cling to what is old; to remember the pious ancestors' doctrine, to walk in their footsteps, exclaiming, "My grandfather was an excellent man, and what was good enough for him, is, and ought to be, good enough for me."

As it is the pleasing task of the philosopher to review, rather than to criticize; to explain, but not to condemn; a philosophic attitude toward Cancer persons compels us to respect their bias to a certain extent, while attempting all the time to help them to gain emancipation from the depressing thraldom to which they are often quite disposed to yield. Rheumatism, congestion, constipation, defective circulation and a host of allied ailments, correspond exactly to fettered mental states; and all chronic ailments are aggravated by an intense idolatry of memory. The recollection of former days; the tendency to live over again in past scenes, where boyhood or girlhood may have been spent; the disposition to regret the past and to encourage the belief that old days were better than the present time; these and all similar mental tendencies are the foods upon which chronic ailments thrive and fatten.

Cancer people frequently imagine they used to be much better off than they are now; and permit their minds to dwell upon insults and injuries, and though they are frequently anything but resentful in the violent sense, they labor under a sense of hurt or injury. Their feelings are easily wounded, and their troublesome memories do not let them forget a past annoyance.

In the education of Cancer children it is highly necessary to stimulate their interest in present day affairs, and to help them to realize the beauty of the natural objects all about them, and to appreciate the good time they are now enjoying. As the Cancer type of intellect is, unless diverted from its contemplation of the past, apt to be altogether too retrospective and gloomy, wise parents and teachers who are quick observers of the necessities of the children in their care will not fail to encourage, as far as possible, in young people of this type, all those out-door games and pleasant social gatherings which effectually counteract a tendency to moodiness and melancholy.

Cancer people are usually highly conscientious. They have often a fastidious sense of rectitude which they carry to extremes, and which makes them misunderstood as well as causing offence, and often pain, to the people among whom they move. The word "thin-skinned" frequently applies to much persons, and so does the term "hyper-sensitive;" and it cannot be denied, and should not be overlooked, that the very people who suffer most from fancied insults themselves, are the readiest of all to quickly condemn their neighbors.

An amusing aspect of Cancer is extreme parsimoniousness, though this is not always a conspicuous feature on the material plane. A housekeeper of the Cancer type, who has no aspirations beyond housekeeping, is very apt to save scraps, candle ends, waste paper and all sorts of little things which may be converted into money. Cancer people are exdeed they rejoice greatly in petty economies. This trait is not a fault, though if too greatly encouraged, it leads them to miserliness.

On the intellectual or artistic plane of development, Cancer people may exhibit none of the small domestic economies we have referred to; but the attributes of the sign are present with them in a tendency to conserve old books and pamphlets; to save old letters; to dry flowers, and treasure keepsakes, or to accumulate musty pictures and revel in curios and antiquated knick-knacks. From this delineation the reader may be led to study how culture and education can best develop a type, which through its really intense and beautiful maternal nature can easily be awakened to a wider view of life, and as all types are good, though all differ, we do not need to change, but only to improve and beautify what is already present. Stirpiculture equally with agriculture and horticulture does not attempt to change type, but only to improve species. Ethical culture must aim to do the same with humanity. The world needs conservatives as well as progressionists. Society needs historians, and those who can draw useful lessons from the past for present guidance. Therefore, though we have shown the shadowy background, as well as the beauteous foreground of a picture in this essay, our intention has been to be only analytical, and not in the least condemnatory. We believe fully in the equal divinity of the twelve signs of the Zodiac, as represented in human life; and we are sure when the glowing imagery of the book of Revelation is understood, we shall find in that mysterious Apocalypse a key to human nature, both synthetic and analytic.

If Cancer people can make friends with those of the Leo type, or with those in Libra, or even with Aries, they will find their extreme tendencies happily modified, and they in turn will usefully moderate the reckless zeal and exuberant rashness of some whose temperaments are the very opposite of their own, for Cancer really advances, though its behavior sometimes makes it appear that it is retrograding.

The Fifth Sign---Leo the Lion.

As Leo, whose period is from about July 22, to August 22, has always been regarded as the heart of the macrocosm or archetypal man, we may take as an appropriate motto for our present lesson the well quotation from the book of Proverbs, "Keep the heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." As each sign has its specific character, and signs which follow each other are usually in direct contrast, we find that Leo people are as unlike those whose place is in Cancer as it is possible for two sets of individuals to be. Cancer is slow, conservative and apt to be selfish. Cancer people are usually given to saving their strength and husbanding their energy for fear of becoming exhausted. Cancer is called a watery sign, and is, therefore, apt to be coldly intellectual, fish-like, shell-fish like; and is it not curious to note when these words are placed in juxtaposition how singularly alike are selfish and shell-fish? Both words suggest retirement into one's own personal sphere, lack of communion and lack of sympathy with the world outside. Though when lifted to a higher plane the selfish or shell-fish (crab-like) character becomes only well protected, shielded from attacks of all kinds, through an unusually perfect development of individual aura. So beautiful can the originally selfish, shut-in nature become as it grows benevolent, that at length it may be compared to a sweet moss-rose protected by a soft, velvety covering and having no need of thorns. Cancer people at their highest and best are retiring and given to a study of occult mysteries as becomes those whose province is the breast of the Grand Man.

Leo people are forceful, energetic, impulsive, outspoken, distributive, highly magnetic, lavish in the expenditure of their vitality, in all respects the very opposite of Cancer. Leo is called a fiery sign, and is, therefore, placed in the same triplicity with Aries and Sagittarius.

We note often that Cancer people are great students, and by virtue of their studiousness they often impress the public through valuable literary efforts. Leo persons are individually attractive, and draw to themselves admiring throngs if they are in any public capacity. In this sign we find many effective presiding officers, as well as natural orators, actors and others whose career necessitates public personal appeal to the multitude. Every one who ever heard and saw Henry Ward Beecher knows how much of his popularity was due to his personality. He was a loving, lovable man. He had a great, warm, tender heart, running over with affection, in consequence of which, people ran to him not only to listen to his words, but to bask in the sunshine of his presence. Emerson said and wrote many more wonderful things than did Beecher; but Emerson's popularity is still growing among intellectual people, and he was not highly esteemed by the masses while on earth. His nature and style might be called Platonic and academic, while Beecher's was intensely popular. And so it was to a large degree with Phillips Brooks. Many preachers have delivered sermons, which, when published, were quite as full of thought, and quite as rich in beauty of illustration; yet the multitude was not drawn to the man as crowds were drawn to Brooks and Beecher.

Then consider Ingersoll, who could always crowd a spacious theatre to hear a lecture at theatre prices, from gallery to orchestra chairs. Ingersoll did not say, as a rule, any very remarkable things. His lectures on Abraham Lincoln and Thomas Paine were brilliant and historical; but his Ghosts, Skulls, Mistakes of Moses, Gods, and many others, contain nothing particularly enlightening. Still the same people went to hear the same lecture time after time because Ingersoll delivered it. Were it only the subject matter they were after, they would be equally content if they could buy the pamphlet and read it or hear it read to them at home.

When in ancient Greece oratory was at its height, and poets read their own poems to enamored audiences, composed of the wealthiest and most cultured citizens of Athens and distinguished visitors from far and near, the Leo type of humanity was very much esteemed and very much in evidence. Leo people are remarkably successful healers when they see their patients, talk with them and touch them. They usually believe a great deal in personal influence and in the virtue of the magnetic touch, which they are well able to bestow. We all know men and women whose personal influence is very much greater than simply what they say. A Cancer person may do all his business successfully through the postoffice, but Leo people need to be seen as well as heard from to be appreciated; unless, indeed, they have attained the unusual height of those exalted metaphysicians, who have so far conquered the limitations of the geographical, that they can send their rich, warm, powerful thoughts skimming over unseen wires and accomplish results without any reference to place of body.

The average Leo person is good looking, even commanding in appearance, and generally dresses well, not foolishly following prevailing fashions; but gratifying personal taste in the matter, and expressing love of beauty in externals, as correspondences to thoughts within. There is as much difference between the typical Leo and the typical Cancer cast of mind and general appearance as we have seen exhibited by Cardinal Manning (Cancer) and Col. Ingersoll (Leo). We do not mean that Cancer people are necessarily theologians, or that Leo people are usually agnostics; but these two very widely known men exhibit the extremes of two opposite types. Cardinal Manning was attracted to antiquity, tradition, ceremony, authority and all that tends to conserve an ancient and illustrious regime. In person he was spare and in mode of life ascetic. Ingersoll, on the other hand, was ready to kick over all traces and revel in the exuberance of an almost boundless vitality. Manning's power lay almost entirely in his thoughts; Ingersoll's strength lay largely in his personal magnetism. Even his bitterest opponents can hardly deny that he had a warm, loving heart and was an excellent friend, husband, father and neighbor.

Leo is so prone to act from the centres of emotion, that the heart controls everything with Leo people; and it was Ingersoll's heart more than his head that revolted against the barbarous doctrines of old Calvinism. "All the world loves a lover" is a good old saying in which there is a great deal of truth. Why should the world love the lover but because love is so distributive that it makes itself felt wherever it exists? Everybody likes to love some one and to be loved in return by somebody; but Leo people are especially dependent upon affection, and cannot exist without it. They generally get a good deal of affection showered upon them, because, being so full of it and so free with it, they become powerful magnets to attract it.

Leo children are warm, impulsive and effusive. They easily make friends and are generally great favorites at school. They are often masterful and inclined to be dictatorial, but they generally get their own way without much effort because of their pleasant manners, genial disposition and prepossessing appearance. The Leo child is often the beauty and generally the pet of the family. In business, people in this sign are quickly promoted. They receive and grant favors readily and often get on in life in consequence of their exceeding popularity. They can be terrible in anger if greatly aroused; but like large, fine dogs they are, as a rule, good natured and even tempered; though high-spirited. Self esteem is large with them, and they are not deficient in approbativeness. Mirthfulness is also often a prominent organ in their brains. They are not always very industrious, often loving pleasure and ease and being willing to receive attention and let others wait upon them. They are so clearly designed by nature to rule rather than to be ruled, that any attempt to quell their ardent impulses by coercive restraint is resented forcibly by them. We find much will in this sign, as will and love always go together. A very loveful person must be willful, for lovefulness and willfulness are very near of kin. The former word is rarely used, and the latter is mercilessly abused and misapplied; but when both these two good words are used in their true sense they are found to be very nearly synonymous. All will, desire, affection, love, must spring from that element in our nature which directly acts upon the heart. All emotions act first through the brain, and thence upon the part of the body which directly corresponds to that particular section of the brain acted upon. In a Leo head, amativeness and philoprogenitiveness are usually full, so that love of home and family and of children in general will be characteristic. Leo people seldom like to live alone and they rarely succeed in business by themselves. They are frequently very generous and sublimely philanthropic, taking real delight in helping and healing the distressed. As healers they are "A1." No sign contains so many natural healers as Leo, which produces a wealth of people, who, almost from their cradles, benefit the sick and cheer the sad by their simple presence.

Leo people when subject to maladies through lack of knowing how to govern their propensities aright, are inclined to palpitation of the heart, obesity, shortness of breath and the difficulties common to persons of generous build and full habit. Alimentiveness is often large with them, so they enjoy the pleasures of the table and are sometimes given to undue conviviality.

In this sign will be found a great many popular club men, social leaders of both sexes, and women who get up fairs, bazaars and all sorts of entertainments for charity. Such people are friends to cooking schools, soup kitchens and all places where "Lady Bountiful" finds a field for the exercise of her generosity. The Leo type is often indiscriminate; it is apt to hate red tape, and it does not approve of associated charities and systematized efforts which are often cold and perfunctory in the name of the warmest of the graces. Impulse is so strong in Leo and frequently so kind and generous that official proceedings and the slow movement of large organizations are spurned with contempt as well as disrelish.

On the whole this sign may fairly be styled the warmest, handsomest and most lavish of the twelve. It holds many of the greatest artists and most successful doctors of all schools. Heartiness is the right word to use when summing up its most conspicuous evidences.

Aug 22 to Sept 22

The Sixth Sign---Virgo, the Virgin.

Virgo, whose period is from about August 22 to September 23, is the solar plexus or vital centre of the Grand Man, and includes the womb or matrix of the social organism. As Leo (the heart) is warm, impulsive, gushing, exuberant, magnetic, rejoicing in the fullest consciousness of opulent strength, given to free distribution of energy, and in every way disposed to impart knowledge, vitality and whatever else is communicable, Virgo is inclined to be motherly, conserving force for the upbuilding of offspring. Leo stands for love, will, desire, and all that pertains to the affections. Virgo is the symbol of wisdom, knowledge, understanding, and generally displays its chief characteristic in a natural instinctive perception or discernment.

Wisdom in the book of Proverbs, and elsewhere in and out of the Bible, is spoken of as feminine. Wisdom is said to build her house on seven pillars (vide Prov. ix, I). Sophia (wisdom) is a Greek noun of feminine gender; so, when, in the eighth chapter of Proverbs, she is said to have been with Him from the beginning, the masculine element there referred to is the root of will, the true word or logos which, jointly with understanding, creates all things and brings all things to pass.

When the ancient Egyptians placed the emblem of the Sphinx in the vicinity of the Great Pyramid at Gizeh and many lesser pyramids, they unquestionably intended to convey the idea of Leo-Virgo, which is the union of will and understanding.

Children born on the cusp, between August 20 and 23, are often found to be, by natural tendency, remarkably well balanced. They have, as a rule, a very fine perception of how to adjust and balance to a nicety. They are not apt to be carried away by their affectional impulses, as many Leo people are, nor are they so very calculating and intellectual as many who are fully in Virgo.

Virgo is a constructive, home-making sign, and though it is said to belong to the earthly triplicity, this does not mean that it conduces to sensuality, but rather that its tendency is toward perfect ultimation, or a complete externalization of thought. In Virgo we find many seers and prophets. A large proportion of those gifted with clairvoyance, or second sight, are found in this department of the maximus homo; and it may be fairly stated that of all the signs this is the one which gives evidence of the greatest recuperative power. The typical Virgo person is not seemingly very robust, is not muscular in large degree, and not generally particularly impressive on first acquaintance; but there is an immense fund of reserve energy stored up in the secret recesses of such a nature.

The contrast presented between Leo and Virgo is particularly marked. Leo wins friends and holds them by magnetic charm and personal attractiveness. Virgo, on the other hand, wins its way by appealing to the understanding. Leo is the sign of a very large percentage of magnetic healers and persons who are eminently successful in any capacity where the personal equation is of large account. Virgo is the sign of many deep philosophers and reasoners, and is the province of a great array of naturally endowed teachers of all descriptions.

A very conspicuous example of Virgo was Goethe, the world-renowned poet and philosopher, the friend of Schiller, from whom, however, he widely differed in many important particulars. Goethe is one of the subtlest and most analytical of modern writers, and nowhere does he display his Virgo qualities more than in his delineations of Faust and Mephistopheles.

All great creative artists deal with their own experiences and record their individual victories and temptations in what they write or print or sculpture or sing; but though this is a universal fact, there are but few, comparatively, who can dissect themselves as clearly as they can read others. To Virgo people more than to any others belongs the power of self-comprehension. Synthesis characterizes Leo; analysis, Virgo. Leo people take a general view of things. They are satisfied, as a rule, with what pleases or delights them. Virgo is never contented without looking deeply into the whys and wherefores, tracing causes to effects and effects to causes. Mental and moral dissection is very gratifying to the distinct Virgo type, of whom it may be said, that never are its representatives so happy or so congenially employed as when they are picking something to pieces, with a view to understanding its mechanism and the mainspring of its movement.

In this sign there are many chemists and some alchemists; many who are given to occult studies, and who succeed in psychological review; and though occasionally there may be outbursts of temper, the Virgo person is rarely a fighter, as he is too intellectual to desire anything short of arbitration in place of warfare.

In the work of teaching and healing we find but few, as a rule, who are eminently successful in both public and private lines of work, and still fewer who blend with approximate perfectness the disposition to state principles clearly and generally, with that warm affectionate sympathy which draws one to another, as we are attracted to a cheery fire on a cold night. While Leo people draw others to themselves, and make many warm personal friends who are attached to their personalities, Virgo draws to what is taught, to the principles set forth, rather than to the one who sets them forth.

A great many distinguished casuists and many highly successful lawyers are in Virgo; and among able barristers it is well known that eloquence is common. For lucidity of statement, purity of diction, grammatical accuracy, correct spelling, and many other graces of this sort, Virgo bears the palm; and it is also a sign in which we find much artistic ability and great love of order and beauty.

The feminine qualities of Virgo are shown in a disposition to retain, mature and reproduce in new forms whatever intelligence has been received. Virgo people are not, as a rule, very swift in motion, nor are they particularly industrious on the outward plane; but as their minds are usually active, they are by no means idle.

In this sign there is often found a great appreciation of the psychic realm. Virgo people are not, as a class, superstitious, nor are they very pious; they incline to idealistic rationalism. All that is transcendental and æsthetic appeals to them; they are fond of music and ceremonial, and are disposed to dwell much in the realm of symbols and metaphors; but their regard for forms is not superficial, as they see through them to the things signified.

Many people in Virgo make excellent debaters, and they are very difficult to vanquish in argument, as they are exceptionally logical, and never feel themselves finally defeated. Their great characteristic is the ability to rise like india-rubber, so that momentary defeats, however crushing, do not dishearten them. After the greatest overthrow they are soon ready to start afresh and commence a new work with all the ardor of an original enthusiasm.

Persistency belongs to this sign and, practically, regardlessness of time. If a true Virgo person loses health, apparently he soon recovers it; and if he loses one fortune, he makes another.

Virgo presents the paradox of strength within and fragility without, and of deep stores of knowledge hidden below an appearance of indifference and, possibly, ignorance. Its people, though very capable of endurance, are extremely sensitive, little things highly pleasing or greatly annoying them; and while they seem much influenced by trivial occurrences, the fact is that they are so introspective and analytical, that they follow a small clue and see the greatness of the admission which must logically be made if the entering wedge is granted.

Virgo people are extremely critical of themselves as well as of others; whenever they are good-natured and well-disposed, they make first-rate book reviewers and synoptical reporters. Having a keen eye to incident and a rare faculty for following a slight hint to a remote conclusion, they make good counselors and advisers, and are usually much pleased to be made the recipients of confidences, which they seldom betray.

There is a fine, though peculiar, sense of honor about Virgo people. They have often very little regard for the mere feelings of the people about them; and if they discover disagreeable facts, they may make unpleasant use of them, as they are often fond of gossip and are very inquisitive; but tell them in confidence something you wish kept secret, and they will sacredly respect your trust, and continue loyal to their word, which is truly their bond.

Such people are very fond of attention paid to their attainments. They do not value personal services or affectionate attentions very highly, but they insist upon being treated with respect. If you wish to make a real friend of a Virgo person, the best way to do it is to pay court to his intelligence, as pride of intellect is really the besetting weakness, and, at the same time, a characteristic strength of those in this sign. Conscientiousness is prominent in Virgo, and so is self-esteem. Love of personal freedom is also conspicuous, and the sense of individual rights and liberties is frequently so strong that unintentional trespass upon private ground is often sharply resented.

People in this section of the Zodiac usually enjoy a sense of private property in personal belongings. They are generally highly egoistic, though they may be altruistic also; but they are disposed to draw a sharp line between mine and thine. It is often difficult for such persons to hold subordinate positions. They love to lead, but when they are in the ruler's seat they are not despotic. Though they adore their own way, and think it better than any one's else, they are extremely tolerant of other people's idiosyncrasies, provided they are permitted to enjoy their own in peace, and they are, as a rule, peaceful folk.

Leo exhibits the canine qualities in the animal world. Virgo is distinctly feline. Having said this, we will observe that both the dog and cat were divine emblems in Egypt. The dog, as a hunter and protector, was esteemed and venerated as an embodiment of affection and fidelity; while all animals of the cat species were regarded as emblems of the clairvoyant faculty, which the feline race displays in its ability to see in the dark, through a distinctive elongation of the pupil of the eye.

The occupations best adapted to Virgo people are invariably those which require tact, skill and the exercise of the logical faculty. Sedentary pursuits are often favorable, particularly work of a literary character. The distinctly Virgo type of mind may be compared to very fruitful earth, where seeds quickly germinate and results multiply. Virgo women are often mothers of large families, and they bear and rear children with much greater ease than those in some other signs. When the development of a Virgo person is intensely intellectual, and the sense nature is quite subordinate, we witness great fruitfulness on the mental plane. The children of the intellect multiply in that case, and in many instances a single seed idea dropped into the fruitful soil of a Virgo mind will spring up and bear a surprisingly abundant harvest of results.

Virgo people have usually very tenacious memories and the smallest details rarely escape them. They are vividly impressed oftentimes by much that most people would allow to entirely escape them; and while this regard for details often looks like evidence of a mind bent on trifles, it is not in reality so, but when rightly understood betokens ability to trace analogies between things great and small, inward and outward. Swedenborg's doctrine of correspondences can probably be more readily understood by representatives of this sign than by those of any other, it being their disposition, and a favorite study and pastime with them, to trace out curious analogies and to follow a suggestive hint to its uttermost conclusion. Henry Wood's system of "Ideal Suggestion through Mental Photography," would be likely to appeal strongly to persons in this sign, as they like to see everything clearly mapped out before them, and are vigorous exponents of the doctrine of associated ideas and of mental suggestion.

Virgo, in fine, is a sensitive, psychic, motherly sign, and though in the earthy trigon is not at all given to coarseness or gross materiality. "Let us hear the conclusion of the matter," may be a favorite text with this type of individual, who loves nothing so well as to follow tirelessly a proposition to its ultimate. In the productions of the masterly mind of Goethe we see revealed the very soul of Virgo.

Sept. 22 to Oct. 22

The Seventh Sign---Libra, The Balance.

The number seven, always regarded as highly important and significant by reason of its perpetual recurrence in nature, was, by the wise men of old, regarded truly as the harmonic of twelve. Seven, when applied to anything in Kabalistic works, always designates perfection of quality, while twelve denotes fullness of numerical representation. The seven colors of the rainbow, seven notes in the musical scale, seven days in the week, etc., may all be regarded as nature's testimony to the value of numbers. All life is expressed in geometrical ratio, and without mathematics there can be no scientific achievement. When the Europeans of the middle ages, imbued with Ptolemy's absurd errors concerning astronomy, persecuted Galileo and Copernicus, because of their blind and stupid belief that there were only seven planets in the universe, they did but instance a case of truth overlaid with errors; for—though these ignorant people knew it not—they had derived their doctrine of the music of the spheres from the profoundest scholars and closest reasoners of antiquity; men and women so enlightened that they could build the great Egyptian pyramid, and many other marvellous structures on strictly geometric lines, which to-day excite the reverent amaze of many of the most distinguished scholars of the modern world.

The seventh sign of the Zodiac is the sign of judgment. Therefore, wherever original pictures of the correct idea of judgment, entertained by the truly illumined are to be found, a female figure is represented balancing the scales, she herself blindfolded. The woman is the equinoctial virgin (Virgo); the scales she holds are Libra, the sign which immediately follows in the Zodiacal procession.

We have called attention in a previous essay to the secret of the Sphinx (Leo-Virgo), and alluded in passing to the necessity for blending the masculine qualities of Leo, the heart of the archetypal man, with the feminine attributes of Virgo, the solar plexus. Leo being Will, and Virgo, Understanding; Leo being the seat of emotion, and Virgo, of intuition, it logically follows that when Libra is attained the day of judgment is at hand; for then are we in condition to judge righteously, i. e., equitably. Unfortunately for the ready progress of correct ideas, words are used again and again in a stultifying sense, and in no instance does our language suffer more from incorrect usage than in the numerous places where justice is technically substituted for equity. This radical mistake in phraseology is as fundamental as the sociological falsehood implied in treating of man as though woman were of little or no account; while humanity and mankind are words which signify men and women equally. The Latin word justitia is placed under the portrait or statue of the woman holding the scales. This should be erased and equitas substituted. Justice may be fairly defined as due regard for the interests of society as a whole. Mercy pleads that clemency be shown to the individual. The two great reformatory objects of well directed corrective measures in lieu of barbarous punishment are very generally conceded to be the protection of society and the reformation of the wrong doer. Justice insists upon the former; mercy, upon the latter. Equity points the way to the realization of both these highly desirable and greatly needed ends, the combined result of both being the actual improvement of society. Justice and mercy are bride and bridegroom. One never appears in council without the other; and it will not be until they invariably appear together, that the human race will so understand itself as to frame and execute laws for the preservation of order, and the increase of happiness and general prosperity.

We meet sometimes with people who seem endowed from birth with the happy faculty of being able to see a subject on both sides. Men like the justly revered James Freeman Clarke, author of "Ten Great Religions," and many other admirable works, was, in our judgment, a good illustration of the Libra character, which is not ardent and impulsive like Leo, nor conservative like Cancer, but given to weighing, measuring, balancing, comparing. A study of comparative religion would be most agreeable to such a type of mind, because it would not partake of the qualities of the zealot or rash devotee, but would delight in contrasting one system with another to discover the good in all. We do not say that such minds have no preference or strong attachments to any special form of faith. They may, like Dr. Clarke, esteem a liberal kind of Christianity far superior to any other religious system on earth; but if they do, their conception of the system they espouse and defend will be so broad and eclectic that it will be very nearly universal religion, and will always be a system that lays more stress on noble character than on theological tenets of belief.

Leo is the sign of martyrs; Virgo, of deep, intuitive philosophers, while Libra gives birth to people who are called in "Psycopathy" by Cora L. V. Richmond, social solvents.

However great Shakespeare may have been in his ability to read character and interpret human nature to itself, in "The Merchant of Venice" he entirely fails to introduce a single character whose ethical ideas are satisfactory. It may be urged that he was holding the mirror to the times and reflecting the state of prevailing sentiment in Europe in the middle ages. Be that so, you have thereby accounted for the play; but you have not proved to us that its author had grasped the true solution of a momentous problem vitally affecting legislation. Shylock is just, but not merciful. Portia is merciful, but not just; and not a single character in the whole drama is equitable. Shylock was harsh and ungenerous, but those who opposed him were unfair. We need a playwright to-day who will give us a drama in which equity is exhibited in so unmistakable a manner that no one can leave the theatre without feeling that he has learned a moral lesson he will never forget, and whoever does this satisfactorily will doubtless be a characteristic Libra man or woman.

Libra people are reconcilers and peace-makers by natural disposition. They are fine, dispassionate reasoners, excellent in debate, but by no means given to contentious arguing. Never argue, but always reason a matter out, is good practical advice for everybody. Head and heart have equal rights, entitled to mutual respect and courteous consideration. Only when we deal with questions from the intellectual and emotional standpoint alike are we in the way to an amiable settlement of the many questions which continually press their claims upon us.

Libra is the sign of many of the best jurists the world has ever seen; and when lawyers of the highest type are found, we often discover when we learn their birth days that they were born somewhere between September 23, and October 22, which is Libra's period. Conciliation and arbitration are words very full of meaning and very acceptable in the ears of people who are confirmed in this sign, and it may fairly be added that they are, as a rule, very unwilling to believe ill of their neighbors. They do not object to talk about people, but they are not given to speaking against others. They may be very talkative, and have no dislike for friendly gossip, but malicious misrepresentation they abhor; and they are generally quite willing, even in cases which closely concern themselves, to confess that there are both faults and merits on either side. Such people can always be reached by rational appeal. They do not wish to quarrel or to continue at enmity; and though they may sometimes be disposed to go to law, they enter suit for the purpose of arriving at an equitable decision; not out of spite or with any unkind or malicious intent.

In social life, in religion and in politics, Libra is often said to be "on the fence" in an attitude of impartial observation. The leading feature of this sign is its diplomatic and non-committal character. It exhibits great tact, makes many friends and reconciles the estranged, as well as bringing together in the embrace of solid friendship people who had previously stood aloof from each other.

In an old Kabalistic representation of Ezekiel's Wheel, Libra is placed in the central position, marking the turning point or place of juncture between the ascending Macrocosmos and the descending Microcosmos. This is a somewhat ambitious attempt to illustrate involution and evolution by means of a diagram. The six signs preceding Libra; viz., Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo and Virgo, are placed in the upper hemisphere; and the remaining five following Libra; viz., Scorpio, Sagittarius, Capricorn, Aquarius and Pisces, in the lower hemisphere or nether world.

Libra comes in with the autumnal equinox and is the sign of harvest, of the ingathering of the fruits of the earth. Thus in every sense does it denote the judge who comes to separate the kernel from the husk, and the wheat from the tares.

If Christians in common with all other bodies of religionists, will but faithfully face their own ecclesiastical calendar and fearlessly read its inner meaning, they will find therein a key to the sublimest and most stupendous mysteries of the universe, as they directly affect human life; and in this discovery they can gain knowledge of the true secrets of disguised alchemy. The philosopher's stone and the elixir of life would be in their possession. But forever let it be understood that the true Rosicrucians never sought to discover in the outward, but only and ever in the inward realm the key to the vast results they were seeking to accomplish.

In the most external ways of life the characteristics of Libra manifest themselves amiably and usefully, in full accord with the deepest spiritual import of the sign, when its innermost significance is acknowledged. Many excellent chemists are good examples of Libra, and the best analytical chemists are the finest readers of character. At any rate they have ability to dissect character if they give themselves at all to the work. The most charming social office of Libra is often performed at a dinner party, or at any festive gathering where people have been called together, who are not on friendly terms in private life. An intelligent host or hostess, who reads character well, or who is versed in the Zodiac as represented in humanity, can often get a Libra person to render a genuine service in the following manner: Miss Wratte and Miss Mousse have had a falling out. They will not speak to each other, or even bow in passing on the street; and had the one known that Mrs. Katt had invited the other to her party, neither would have accepted the invitation. As it is they have met and glowered at each other in the drawing room before going in to dinner. Mrs. Katt, a very penetrative woman, has purposely invited the Misses Wratte and Mousse, and also a mutual friend—one they all like, esteem and are glad to meet, Mr. Balance; and he it is whose seat at the table is between the two ladies who regard each other so contemptuously. Mr. Balance, a fine Libra gentleman, mutual friend and entertaining conversationalist, easily succeeds in interesting both ladies; and as he sits between them and engages the attention of both, and they both agree with him and respect his opinions, no sooner are they in the drawing room again after dinner, than they begin talking to each other quite affably, and wondering secretly why they ever so magnified estranging trifles and regarded each other with such unfriendly eyes.

Among well-known people who are in Libra, and whose life-work can be popularly estimated, we may mention President Hayes, who certainly made many friends and left an excellent record behind him. Sarah Bernhardt is also in Libra, and so is Mrs. Besant, two public women of whom the newspapers frequently speak, and to whom the multitude will flock, though for very different reasons oftentimes. Both these women have had diverse experiences, they have played many parts, sustained different roles and acquitted themselves wonderfully well in the characters they have assumed. Mrs. Besant has lived a self-denying, philanthropic life very largely, and through it all she has displayed an equable temper, never rushing to violent extremes or indulging in coarse invective. Mrs. Besant's reason for leaving the English church in which her husband was a clergyman, was that its ministers did not, and would not if they could, satisfy her eager questioning intellect. In all her addresses on the labor question she was temperate and just; socialistic, but never anarchistic in her tendencies; and her scheme of socialism was ever to level up, not to level down. Her acceptance and advocacy of Theosophy was based entirely on its appeal to her sense of equity; and it may be here remarked that many Libra people take very kindly to the doctrines of Karma and reincarnation. There is much that fascinates them in the elaborate metaphysical systems of India, which seek to explain the working of perfect equity in the experiences of every individual; and as Libra people are, as a rule, close reasoners and patient workers—and, if need be, waiters—they are not so averse to the extremest application of the theory of evolution, as are most of those who represent the more impulsive and hasty signs. Sarah Bernhardt has achieved truly marvellous success on the stage largely through her continuous study of her parts. Gifted by nature with rare histrionic ability, she has persistently cultivated and supplemented her natural skill by the closest attention to every detail of her art. Though she can be fiery, she is in many respects a reconciler, and has rare ability to play many parts well because of her striking ability to look on both sides of any character she essays to interpret.

It will usually be found that Libra people are well fitted for influential posts or positions of trust. They make good overseers, choir masters, band conductors, stage managers, bailiffs, stewards and housekeepers; and when they are highly developed intellectually they make excellent professors in universities. Libra is without doubt the judge's seat; and while every human being can attain to equity, those who are in Libra are in a sense "to the manor born."

We will here remark that in all we have advanced concerning this and other signs, we do not wish to be understood to say that all persons born at a certain time of the year do now exhibit all such signs as we have delinerated; but we decidedly hold that our generalizations concerning their aptitude are very nearly accurate.

The Eighth Sign---Scorpio, The Scorpion.

This sign, the period of which extends from about October 22 to November 22, is one of those mysterious enigmatical divisions of the Zodiac, which, by their very mysteriousness and inexplicability from the ordinary standpoint, have given rise to very malodorous stories concerning their malefic or malignant influence.

Scorpio is the place of nativity of three very remarkable characters in modern history, Marie Antoinette, General von Moltke and President Garfield. Scorpio seems to be the seat of tragedies, and those who are within its embrace are often the subject of the most singular and unlooked for experiences. But it is with the true characteristics and natural bearings or tendencies of the sign in general that we seekers specially to deal. In our progressive march through the twelve celestial houses, we discover as we advance from station to station on our journey that marked contrasts greet us at every turn. Each sign is sandwiched between two signs very unlike itself, and this surely applies to Scorpio, whose place is between Libra and Sagittarius.

A scorpion with its sting is not a delightful creature to contemplate, and from the title of this sign we might well expect only what is both disagreeable and dangerous. But on further investigation we may find ourselves happily disappointed; for though Scorpio (or Draco) is the veritable old serpent or dragon mentioned in the Apocalypse, and the cause of unknown terror to the superstitious in eastern countries from time immemorial, the very devil should receive justice at our hands, and this boon may be called in some sense a vindication of the character of his satanic majesty. Scorpio is satan, and it is with the satanic character we have now to deal. Satan as mentioned in the book of Job was not a bad character by any means, according to the conception of the writer of that very ancient poem. The accusing angel was a rightful administrator in the heavenly court of equity; and though it was his disagreeable duty to point out errors, and bring even the most secret motives of mankind to judgment, the judgment eventually meted out was always just. The Scorpio man or woman is the accuser in society, and though the accusing angel is not apt to be particularly amiable, he may be thoroughly conscientious.

The Scorpio temperament is not usually a very happy one. It is too closely analytical and too severely critical to be what is generally called good natured; but it has its place, even though that place be the room of critic and censor, and though its influence often tends to cast a shadow, and its artistic office is to paint a back-ground, these things need to be done. Scorpio people when not very far unfolded spiritually are apt to be hypercritical and uncompromising in their denunciation of what they feel to be wrong. They may be just, but they certainly are not merciful. Their nature is exacting, and they have the sentiment of the words, "Thou shalt not come forth until thou hast paid the uttermost farthing."

We have all met people whose work in life seemed to be that of censors of everybody, themselves included. Rigid to the point of painful inflexibility in all matters pertaining to conscience or morals, they have appointed themselves, and consider themselves divinely ordained to sit in judgment on everything and everybody. Such temperaments are usually quick, restless, wiry, energetic, fond of travel, and of darting quickly from place to place. Many born detectives are in this sign, and so are many people gifted with clairvoyant penetration and what the Scotch call second sight. Quick-witted, quick of thought, speech and action, generally small in stature and of high, nervous tension, these people find it difficult to serve as peacemakers. They usually stir up strife and often bring a tempest about their own ears without in any way desiring or expecting so violent an upheaval in their environment. People who are thoroughly in the midst of this sign feel it to be their special duty to stir things up and call people to a sense of neglected obligations. They have every characteristic of a shrill trumpet which calls to judgment and proclaims NOW is the judgment day.

It would be easy enough to enumerate the disagreeable features of this sign, but our aim is to point out its usefulness; therefore our brief is for the defendant rather than for the plaintiff. One who stirs up stagnant natures, and refuses to let apathy and indolence doze on undisturbed may be a very useful member of society, though he does prod the sleepers rather sharply oftentimes.

Healers who are in this sign have a rousing magnetic effect upon their patients, and are well adapted to break up chronic cases of rheumatism, gout and other long standing ailments, which represent fixity and obduracy of erroneous thought.

In political affairs, the purification of the municipalities may well follow in the train of a scorpion-like agitator, whose province it is to scent out what needs to be done, and how to do it. Scorpio stands for shrewdness, sagacity and penetration, and by no means suggests spitefulness or vindictiveness, except where judgment is perverted through unbridled and misdirected passion. As Libra denotes the true philosopher who weighs and balances all things with impartial equity, Scorpio represents the judge who pronounces sentence favorably or unfavorably as the case may be. There is a good aspect of Scorpio rarely noted in treatises upon the Zodiac, which seldom show forth the best features of the subject they discuss, and that is the significance of the eighth or octave note, which commences a new scale, and therefore denotes the first stage in a higher or regenerate life.

The gospel tells us that after we have cast out the beam from our own eye we shall see clearly how to cast the mote out of a neighbor's eye, which obviously means that when we are quite free from error, prejudice, blindness and all else that hinders mental and moral vision, we shall be in a condition to teach others to rectify even small wrongs in their own way of thinking, and the conduct which springs from it. No more useful service can be rendered any one than to point out to him lovingly and unmistakably how he may correct his errors and live in future above the reach of the follies which aforetime marred his usefulness. The best type of Scorpio disposition, then, is a singularly useful type; for with remarkably keen and penetrative incisiveness, people of this stamp are able to ferret out hidden causes, and give advice of priceless value by reason of their clear discernment of special needs. It depends almost wholly upon the attitude a person takes to things in general whether he will search for disease with the pathologist, or for health with the true spiritual scientist. Diagnosis is a favorite occupation with Scorpio, but diagnosis is a totally different thing with metaphysicians than with physicians and the ordinary run of medical clairvoyants.

All who have read "If Christ Came to Chicago," by William Stead, and "If Jesus Came to Boston," by Edward Everett Hale, must have been forcibly struck with the thought of how easy it is to relate facts and confine one's illustrations to actual occurrences, and present, as one chooses, either a painfully pessimistic or a delightfully optimistic view of any situation. Now the disposition to hunt up news, to collect statistics and to do reportorial or newsmongering work in general and in particular, may be either a very useful or an extremely offensive trait, according to the use or misuse made of it by its possessor. Expressions in common use in society are rarely accurate; consequently the fine distinction which should ever be made between talking about people and talking against them is not usually drawn. It is quite amiable to talk about our neighbors, provided we say only good of them; therefore, the habit of talking about people when their backs are turned should not be regarded as offensive or unkind, unless the remarks made concerning them are unkind or in any way censorious. So sure do we feel that people will always seek to fulfill their natures, and that all natures are good, that we cannot positively condemn even the practice of gossiping, to which Scorpio people are especially prone; for gossip in itself is not by any means an evil, but on the contrary, when wisely directed, may be made the means of accomplishing much real good.

There is, however, a still graver tendency which is very prominent in this sign, and that is the extreme tendency to sexuality which characterizes it, Scorpio corresponding to the generative organs. Much is often said and written on this always delicate subject, but in very few instances do we find esoteric physiology taught with much definiteness and directness. The sexual impulses are not evil, and when rightfully directed their usefulness is clearly seen; thus the excessive animality which distinguishes so many Scorpio persons is capable of being transmuted into genuine active psychical ability. The love principle being the life principle, there is always strong vitality and much opportunity for good, wherever there are any strong impulses of any kind; and those impulses, which are commonly called animal and carnal, are only such on the most exterior plane of life's manifestation. All great intellectual and artistic work is accomplished by means of that very animal vigor, otherwise directed, which, when it expresses solely on the most physical plane, is the serpent of temptation mentioned in Genesis and elsewhere in the Bible.

There are two distinct tempters mentioned in the Bible, the serpent and Satan; and these are but different aspects of the same sign. Judas Iscariot was the one among the twelve apostles who was cast out of the apostolic fraternity, but his place was taken by Matthias, as eleven could not fulfill the requirement of a complete fraternity, which must have a representative of each of the twelve divisions of the Zodiac. If you read the 49th chapter of Genesis and then the 7th chapter of Revelations, in both of which chapters the twelve tribes of Israel are specially referred to by name, you will find that in Genesis the name Dan occurs, while it is missing in Revelations, yet there are twelve in each enumeration. Of Dan it is said in Genesis 49, "he shall be a serpent in the way, an adder in the path that biteth the horse's heels so that the rider falleth backward." Those words convey exactly the correct idea of the sensual proclivities of human nature, so long as they are undisciplined by the higher element in character. In the Apocalypse Dan is omitted, and yet there are twelve. This involves on its truly esoteric side a deeper problem than we may yet be able to solve; but whether we have reached its inmost meaning or not, we can certainly discern this truth, that as we figuratively take up serpents, we transmute but do not destroy the elements of lower selfhood.

We hear altogether too much of the mere struggle for existence, and far too little of the struggle for improvement. The procreative faculty is usually looked at from far too low a plane, and on far too earthy a side; therefore, the question of reproduction is either ignored or handled as though it were something not agreeable to discuss. Until all such false modesty is removed, and the most important questions touching human welfare are freely and honorably treated from all sides, we shall look in vain for any vital progress in the direction of the improvement of the human species.

Scorpio, the so-called adversary in the Zodiac, is properly not Satan the Accuser, but Lucifer the Light-bringer. The whole cosmic tragedy of the fall of Lucifer, who, when fallen, becomes Satan, concerns the debasement of the reproductive force in nature; and when in very early times, Phallic worship prevailed universally—and it was beautiful before it became corrupted—the Phallic emblems denoted purely spiritual ideas, clothed in appropriate natural garments.

Henry Drummond in "The Ascent of Man," emphasizes very strongly what we are endeavoring to teach regarding the struggle everywhere manifest in nature, not simply for continued but improved existence, which is a fuller and more glorious manifestation of the purpose of living. The survival of the fittest would never be accomplished through simple reproduction. It can only be brought about through the agency of improved production. Thus can we accept two proverbs, "History repeats itself" and "We must make the best of things," and so give expression to helpful metaphysical ideas; that evolution with its sublime doctrine of transmutation enshrined in its very heart at its vital core, may illuminate our student pathway and show us how to make the best of so-called bad things by transforming them into what is positively good and appreciably beneficent.

Scorpio is the sign of the alchemists whose ambition it is to turn base metals into gold; and where can we find a fitter or exacter illustration of what we can actually accomplish within ourselves, than by considering how this dream of the mystics may be practically fulfilled in the evolution of nobler character than ever appeared before?

Scorpio children need very careful training. They require the most helpful counsel and tender loving guidance to assist them to overcome the perils which always surround their way, as they are inclined to be very inflammable, and when their passions are greatly aroused they may do desperate deeds for which they may deeply repent after much mischief has been accomplished. Persons in this sign have usually very quick tempers. Their nature is volcanic. The disorders to which they are most subject are of an inflamatory type. As all aberrations can be successfully conquered by mental methods, but special methods are adapted to special cases, we should recommend all who have much to do with people in this sign to adopt soft colors and employ gentle music. Mental stimulants like martial music and scarlet robes are good for Cancer people, but Scorpio people need quieting. They require much sleep, and are better without highly seasoned foods and exciting entertainment. At their best they are very original, daring and creative in their genius, capable of much success through bold enterprise, but unless well mellowed in disposition they are erratic, impatient, and the appetites are too little held in subjection to intelligence.

Curiosity is a leading trait of all Scorpio natures, and this may range all the way from a disagreeable prying into other people's affairs, to a remarkable shrewdness of observation and highly useful penetration.

The cusp which occurs about October 21, when

Libra merges into Scorpio, is a time when birth is given to many very remarkable geniuses, and we shall find that many of the most distinguished people the world has ever known have combined great sensuality with high intellectual development and a keen sense of abstract equity. The cusp which occurs about November 21, when Scorpio merges into Sagittarius, is the natal time of many remarkable people also, and those who blend these two signs in their makeup are usually extremely swift in action, quick to decide, impulsive and determined to vigorously sweep aside all obstacles which may confront them.

Mephistopheles as drawn by Goethe is a true delineation of Scorpio at its worst when degraded and debased; but take the same subtlety and diplomatic ability and raise it to a noble plane, and what a splendidly successful being in honorable ways that same Mephistopheles would be. Though censorious fault-finding is often displayed by Scorpio people, they must learn that the intensely critical disposition, which is theirs by right, can be used so wisely, uprightly and lovingly, that instead of censuring their fellows and making the world a harder place for sensitive natures to live in, they can so consecrate and wisely use their critical acumen that they can see through all deceptive appearances, save those who would otherwise be victimized, and produce in the society in which they move a higher tone of righteousness.

The Ninth Sign---Sagittarius, The Archer.

Though comparatively few very remarkable personages are to be found in this sign, i. e., few whose gifts or genius can be said to lift them entirely beyond the average run of men and women, there are, indeed, many who are domiciled in Sagittarius whose accomplishments are certainly of no mean order. This autumnal sign, whose period extends from about November 21 to December 21, is indicative of a very direct nature, an excellent marksman, one who will never willingly permit himself to be turned aside to accommodate any considerable circumstance.

Were we to single out an example of this type of character by referring to a piece of mechanically executed workmanship, we should choose for our simile the celebrated railway between the two Russian capitals, Moscow and Petersburg. This railroad, built by order of one of the best of the Czars, was executed by soldiers in days of peace, men who proved their abundant ability to render useful service of a constructive nature when not engaged in the destructive pursuit of war. This unique road is laid between the two great cities without the slightest reference to the convenience of any persons who live between the two capitals. It is intended to serve as a speedy means of transit between Petersburg and Moscow, and it does so. It has a definite, well defined mission, and it fulfills it. We often hear the expressions "a bee line" and "as the crow flies." These expressions are thoroughly characteristic of the action of genuinely Sagittarius people. An arrow shot from a bow hitting a predetermined mark without any miscarriage, is the sign of the Archer in the Zodiac.

Whatever this type of person may be, he is decidedly not a bore. He never uses unnecessary words, and is a great economist of time as well as energy. Circumlocution is atrocious in his eyes, and he has little patience with those who lack directness, and use up oceans of other people's time and strength, in crawling and meandering to the point they wish to gain. As there is a natural vibratory sympathy between man and the elements of nature around him, it is not remarkable that at a season of the year when the coldest weather is approaching, and there is a brisk frostiness in the air, inviting, almost compelling, rapid motion, those who are ushered into mortal existence under such bracing atmospheric influences, should be swift of thought, quick of motion, nimble and fleet-footed in all senses of the term.

We must here make a seeming digression from our central point in this essay, to answer a pertinent inquiry often put to us in much the following phrase: If people are born at the antipodes under the Southern Cross, must not the statements made in the Northern Hemisphere concerning the constellations be completely reversed?

To this question we reply that there is much reason in such a query, and as by far the largest portion of the human family are born north of the equator a special explanation may be needed for Australasia, South America and South Africa. This specific teaching, however, could easily be given by any one who simply bears in mind the obvious fact, that the seasons being completely reversed below the line, the characteristics of Aries might be manifested in Libra; those of Taurus, in Scorpio, and those of Gemini, in Sagittarius, as mid-summer in the Northern Hemisphere is mid-winter in the Southern Hemisphere, and vice versa.

To return to Sagittarius immediately and endeavor to delineate its leading qualities, we may fairly say that those are, in a marked degree, love of freedom, impatience of all restraint and hatred of delays. The fastest express trains and the swiftest of ocean greyhounds often seem slow in their progress to the pure Archer type of man or woman, who seeks to consummate every engagement without a moment's unnecessary delay. We look confidently for the perfection of the means of aerial transit to ambitious scientists who belong in this section of the Zodiac; and not only do we rely upon them to furnish means for surpassingly swift locomotion, but we expect from them innumerable discoveries and practical annihilation of distance in all respects.

It cannot be denied that however great may be the interest taken in an attempted solution of psychic problems by a great variety of mental types to-day, there are but very few people, comparatively, who attain to anything like eminence as thought transmitters. Mental telegraphy, telepathy, thought transference, and all phenomena allied thereto, are only susceptible of being brought to a high pitch of demonstrable perfection by people who possess distinctly Sagittarius attributes. We do not mean to say anything disheartening to anybody who is striving to do good in any manner, but the words are ever true, "There are diversities of gifts, though but one spirit;" and though, "The manifestation of the spirit is given to every man to profit withal," there are distinct types of its expression; all when rightly understood being of equal use and value.

In teaching and healing ministries we all discover that some people are far better adapted to convey instruction aloud than silently. Others, again, do their very best work in the silence. Some healers only do their best work in presence of their patients, while others succeed equally well, if not better, when giving absent treatment. The type of people we are now considering is, as a class, noted for its ability to send thought waves to great distances. Clear-cut, finely articulated mental messages always travel further than those which are less definite and precise. The very clearest and most direct frame of mind is essential to the best success in absent healing, and we certainly cannot help observing, when we only listen to people's voices and watch their movement, how far they are characterized by precise definiteness, in which Sagittarius usually excels.

Some people consider the pure or full Sagittarius type disagreeable, because it is so often blunt, brusque, and reaches a point with little, if any, of that tact or diplomatic skill, which so greatly softens the asperity of unpalatable, though truthful sayings; but there is one great advantage to be derived from the intense outspokenness of the Sagittarius temperament, and that is, it leaves no doubt whatever as to the meaning intended to be conveyed.

This type of humanity is extremely intuitive, and is, therefore, given to seership and prophecy. Self-reliance is another marked trait; and so perfectly self-confident are persons in this sign, and generally well balanced, that their very confidence secures them against the many accidents which so often befall the unwary. The ability to lead while others follow is a marked trait; and it is quite appropriate to mention also, in this connection, an astonishing development in the region of locality. Sagittarius people rarely miss their way. Place them in utterly strange surroundings, and they will, unless nervously agitated, find their way instinctively to any point they desire to reach, and instead of following a circumlocutory track, they will compass the distance along the most direct line possible between any two points. Such people must be self-reliant, or they are lost. They cannot afford to be led by others, as they seem frequently to have such peculiar missions and extraordinary vocations, necessitating the employment of such unusual insight, that they are soon lost in a wilderness of perplexity, if they take counsel with others instead of heeding the dictum of their own inner feeling.

Great activity amounting often to restlessness is another feature of these people. In the business world they are generally rushing, driving, pushing, quick to see and ready to take immediate advantage of every opening or opportunity for advancement. They accomplish much in the way of definitely consummating arrangements, while their neighbors, in other signs, are pondering, meditating and talking the matters over with their advisers. Whenever quick action in a case of emergency is needed, Sagittarius is the readiest and ablest of all to furnish the required assistance; and though his motions are very swift, he is not flurried, nor does he blunder.

As great reserve power is indicated by this sign, it may be truly remarked, that, though Sagittarius people display great ability for active exertion in cases of emergency, they are apt to appear uninteresting, and even indolent, when there is no special cause for activity. When they rest they can sleep profoundly and quietly await the hour when necessity arouses them from slumber.

As the physiological correspondence is always suggestive, it is well to consider the province and functions of the hips and thighs, when considering the characteristics of those whose nativity is between November 20 and December 20. As this sign changes into Capricorn, i. e., at the commencement of the cusp, on or about December 18, we find strong tendencies to endure hardships, and also decided economical traits, for which the Goat is so pre-eminently celebrated. The marksman shooting straight at his mark, and rarely, if ever, missing his aim, will always be the symbol of the Archer; and when this is borne in mind, it is not difficult to see how much easier it is for Sagittarius people, than for many others, to obey the wise injunction—look forward, not backward.

The very strongest and most admirable Sagittarius tendency is the happy disposition to persistently persevere in whatever has been undertaken. When the hand has been once put to the plow, not even a glance must be cast behind, if victory is to be gained and the goal successfully reached. In the accomplishment of desires on which their hearts are set, Sagittairus people are unusually successful, and their wishes are speedily fulfilled. This is because they are not prone to loiter on the road. They do not procrastinate or dilly-dally, but march right onward. Therefore belonging to this section of the Zodiac, we find many successful generals and military commanders, who can so command the manoeuvres of their troops, that by prompt, decisive, sudden action, a victory may be gained, even when the odds against it appear to be tremendous.

The faults which are often conspicuous in any class of people are abnormal or inverted characteristics which may at any time be relinquished, as they are fungus growths or parasites, and no portion of the essential tree. Taking this stand with regard to failings and unpleasant eccentricities, such as characterize impostors, bores and other decidedly disagreeable people, we do not dwell upon disorderly conditions as properly pertaining to any sign, but only incidentally mention them as perversions or inversions of inherently excellent qualities. The chief faults to which Sagittarius people are liable are no doubt petulance and irritability, proceeding from an extremely nervous organization, highly strung and very responsive to external influences until disciplined to look within.

Many Sagittarius people make good old fashioned Quakers in one sense, and when they adopt something of the Quaker mode of worship they are likely to derive great good from it; for no practice serves them so well as to sit serenely in the silence and allow the spirit within to commune with the intellect and direct its path on the road to true wisdom. Sagittarius people may often spend much of their time in silent work. They are first rate telepathists. Mental telegraphy they can comprehend and practice readily, because of their peculiar incisiveness of thought and action. And after all no matter how many treatises may be prepared upon the subject—the kernel of all that can be said on qualifications for the practise of thought transference may be compressed into the following words: Take a straight, steady, mental aim; know exactly what you wish to convey, and where and to whom and for what purpose you desire to convey it; then go ahead; shoot your arrow from your bow, trusting to the law of the universe to bring about the result.

Dec. 21 to Jan 21

The Tenth Sign---Capricornus, The Goat.

It is a noteworthy fact that all the feasts and fasts of the Christian calendar owe their literal origin to astronomy and astrology, and nowhere does this fact strike the thoughtful student more impressively than at Christmas-tide, when the earth enters Capricorn on the shortest day of the year, December 21. Following this day dedicated to Saint Thomas, the doubting Didymus of gospel story, come the three days of uncertainty and gloom, according to the old Egyptian idea, during which the sun was supposed to be imprisoned in Hades; then when December 22, 23 and 24 are over, the sun reappears above the line on Christmas day, December 25, which is the natural birthday of the year, and celebrated on that account with the greatest jubilation from the earliest recorded time. The Roman Saturnalian feast and the Druid's Yuletide festivities can all be traced to the same origin. There is a deep significance in all celebrations which are held in honor of annual changes in the climate and general condition of the earth, as man sympathizes with the planet, and the planet reciprocally sympathizes with man. At the time of the winter solstice we reach the darkest, longest nights and the shortest, dullest days; but immediately the night has seemingly gained a victory over the day; the tables are turned, and at once we behold an increase in the length and brightness of the day, and consequently an equal decrease in the length and darkness of the night.

For several centuries the Fathers of the Christian Church were undecided as to the proper time for celebrating Christmas. Some kept the festival of the nativity of the Christ in the spring; others, in the autumn; but at length the unanimous decision was reached that it was highly appropriate to take the ancient solar festival of the new birth of Osiris, the light-bringer, and connect it with a distinctively Christian idea. Such is the origin of Christmas with all its traditions of frost and snow.

We have no word of criticism for this beautiful, poetic yearly commemoration. We, however, are interested in knowing the truth relating to all things. Therefore, we never seek to hide the true origin of any celebrations on the specious plea that too much light may shatter ideals and strip commemorations of their old-time beauty and solemnity. The feast of Christmas is so suggestive entirely apart from its ecclesiastical surroundings, that we find ourselves ready at any time to expatiate lovingly upon the lessons we may profitably learn from the myriad associations which cluster thickly about it; and as the Christ child, whom all Christendom reveres, is said to have been born in the manger of the Zodiacal Goat, we may certainly say that the popular idea of the greatest teacher the world has ever seen, is that of a soul ultimated in Capricorn, which corresponds to the knees of the Grand Man, and, therefore, denotes service, though not servitude. Those who willingly stoop are not slaves. A royal nature which takes a basin, girds itself with a towel and washes the feet of humble brethren is a kingly type of man. Ich dien (I serve) is one of the proudest mottoes of influential orders, notably of the Knights Templar. It is also the motto of the Prince of Wales, heir apparent to the British Crown. No finer or more expressive words do we find in the entire Gospel than "I am among you as one that serveth," and "Whoever would be greatest let him be servant to all." Serfdom is detestable because it implies coercion; and whatever service is rendered from compulsion, instead of willingly, is abominable. The Episcopal liturgy declares that the service of God is perfect freedom; and if that is the case—which it undoubtedly is—no slave can be other than the prostrate victim of some sort of error, from which he needs emancipation as quickly as possible. The true distinction between work and labor is that the former is natural, spontaneous, healthful, enjoyable and essential to growth and general well-being, while the latter is irksome in the extreme. We shall all outgrow labor, but our work, our power to work and our love of work will go on perpetually increasing as we evolve to higher and ever higher states of consciousness in manifestation.

The typical Capricorn person is a born worker; one who loves to be industrious. As a child such a one loves to help mother with the house work in every possible way, to run errands and to assist others in the fulfillment of their tasks. Comparatively few who are in this department of the Zodiac are born great, and equally few have what is commonly called greatness forced upon them; but many such achieve a very true greatness, though it may be, and generally is, of a quietly effective and altogether unostentatious kind. Hewers of wood and drawers of water, as they are sometimes called in Biblical phrase, constitute the rank and file of the Social Army everywhere; and while a few may always be lifted to extraordinary heights of eminence, there must ever be a number who serve faithfully in the knees of the Archetypal Man.

The fundamental error we are seeking to destroy all through these lessons is the wide spread belief that our situation in the Zodiac is either dignified or un-dignified, desirable or undesirable according to position. So long as this view is taken the absurd statement may be made that Capricorn is one of the unpleasant signs, as though the knees of the great body of humanity need be diseased or disjointed any more than the shoulders or the hands. Such ludicrous fallacies as we find still promulgated in astrological treatises and works of allied character make it highly incumbent upon all who know better to disabuse the public mind on these questions, and explain the peculiarities of the various signs as simple variants in the expression of a perfect unity.

Capricorn is not usually the home of very enterprising or ambitious people, like those who are lodged in Aries. On the contrary, the disposition of the Zodiacal Goat is rather contented with its present situation, which, however, it seeks diligently to improve by making the best of it in the true sense, viz., by making it yield all it is capable of yielding.

We all know some people who are by nature so remarkably economical that they can make one dollar go decidedly further than many others would make five dollars go; and this is because of their practical utilitarian disposition, which causes them to see how best to use every cent to the utmost possible advantage. The horns of the goat and its disposition to butt must also be taken into consideration; likewise the surefootedness of this often much maligned animal, and furthermore its proverbial ability to thrive upon what other creatures could not possibly digest. Take the Goat as a sample of Capricorn's influence, and we shall readily find a key to unlock the mysteries of character which specially belong to those of our brothers and sisters whose natal day is somewhere between December 20 and January 20. Perseverance, plodding industry, resolute determination to vanquish even the greatest obstacles are some of the most prominent traits we are likely to encounter. Self-will, even stubborn obstinacy, is characteristic of Capricorn, whose nature is so stalwart, that, though it will bend to the lowest works and subsist upon next to nothing, there is a sturdy vein of self reliance running through it all, which may be characterized in some such sentence as this: "I am willing to work even at the humblest trade; I am ready to get down upon my knees and scrub the floor, but I will not be put down; no one shall degrade or trample upon me."

The phrase "poor and proud" often describes Capricorn; but honest poverty is independent and cannot for an instant be compared with abject destitution, except to mark a vivid contrast. Voluntary poverty is one thing; involuntary destitution is quite another. We cannot give anything away if we have nothing to bestow; consequently the idea of poverty being in some cases voluntary proves that they who are now voluntarily poor are not compelled to be so. Among notable people who are found in Capricorn, we will mention as first and foremost William Ewart Gladstone, one of the most truly remarkable men of his age; a man who at eighty-five years appeared hale, vigorous and intellectually as able as when in the prime of early manhood, the Capricorn temperament being proverbially that which conquers obstacles and simply will not succumb to difficulties. Gladstone evidenced it in singularly high degree, for during his long parliamentary career he vanquished nearly every foe who measured steel with him in the intellectual arena, and proved himself the proud possessor of a physique so marvellously endowed with recuperative vigor that an operation for removal of cataract was perfectly successful in his case, though between eighty and ninety years of age at time of its performance, while many a man twenty years his junior would be regarded as quite too old to bear the strain and recover sufficiently to make the surgical experiment worth while. The indomitable push and perseverance manifested all through Gladstone's public career has marked him a true illustration of the celestial Goat. Many people may differ radically from him in nearly every conclusion; not a few there were who considered him the Nemesis of Great Britain; but all, including his most determined opponents, pay tribute to his power,

Though all persons can, if they will, develop a large share of persevering industry and dogged determination to succeed, it does not come equally easy to all to do so. The Capricorn temperament is born to butt its way successfully through the world in spite of obstacles; and while many temperaments are soon discouraged by the apparent force of hostile agencies, the type now under consideration is one that rises on emergency and literally loves to battle with the breakers and win a victory through even the fiercest storm.

It is also decidedly worthy of note that Charles Sumner and Lucretia Mott were both born in Capricorn; and here again we see decided evidences of the indomitable perseverance which characterizes this sign more than any other. Lucretia Mott, as is well known, espoused the cause of woman suffrage, and protested against slavery in all its forms, in defiance of the most determined opposition. Of gentle nature, though firmness personified, she led where others scarcely dared to follow; and as a noble pioneer of freedom her name is loved and esteemed to-day as one of the greatest emancipators of thought her century had witnessed. Her motto, "Truth for authority, not authority for truth," is now a household phrase wherever liberality of sentiment prevails and people dare to assert the courage of conviction. Charles Sumner, again, was a man who dared to face anything; and through his fearlessness, as well as by reason of his unusual ability, he won for himself an honored place in the American College of Immortals.

The Capricorn temperament is, of course, when undisciplined liable to peculiar aberrations, especially to that form of self-assertion which may be called head-strong obstinacy; but tenacity of will and resoluteness of purpose are the normal characteristics of this sign. It is, therefore, quite unnecessary to treat it pathologically. In private life this type of men or women excels in conquering little things, in rising superior to the petty disabilities which threaten to impede the progress of the average person; and it is in business and in the household that the Goat in the Zodiac uses its horns to the very best advantage.

Capricorn people often meet with decided opposition, and the fates seem frequently to war against them, but they defy fate and triumph over circumstances. To make environments submissive to their will; to prove the rightful ascendancy of mind over things—this is their special work; and though their path is not generally thickly strewn with roses, they conquer by sheer force of determination to succeed. Of all the twelve manners of people they are the least ready to show the "white feather," or allow that they have been or ever can be defeated.

There are many successful mental soldiers in this sign, and the amount of private heroism practiced in unsuspected ways by many who represent it in home and business life is inestimable. There is a great deal of the bull-dog nature in Capricorn, and so much persistence of every kind, that defeat to such natures, when normal, appears impossible. Those who admire a soft, yielding disposition, or who seek effeminate luxuries, will not be much in sympathy with this relentless disposition which succeeds by utter force of grip and inward strength. Whenever a hard battle needs fighting, an unpopular cause steadily defending, or any enterprise pushing to a victory in spite of the most discouraging symptoms, Capricorn is ready to take up the work and do it manfully and womanfully.

In the practice of mental healing the characteristics of this sign are very desirable, as they include ability to conduct successfully the most depressed and depressing cases, and to hold on to the thought of health, even when every sign of disease is evident to mortal view. "Never say die" and nil desperandum are mottoes which belong to this section of the Zodiac especially; and though the more genial and attractive qualities common to Aries and Leo may often be absent from Capricorn, for sturdy devotion to any undertaken task this mid-winter constellation unquestionably bears the palm. The goats are outside the fold; they do not need shepherding; they can take care of themselves; and though they are often alluded to as lascivious, and, in many ways, unholy, they are simply the representatives of a great amount of energy, all of which, if it be expressed as yet on the lower planes, can be transmuted and directed into the purest, noblest and most useful channels. To make the best of things; to make a little go a great way; to endure hardships so as to conquer them, and not be conquered by them; to live anywhere and derive one's support from nature, even in the most adverse climates, these are prominent traits of Capricorn people. Ready to work anywhere, and capable of succeeding anywhere, they are, in our judgment, like the knees in the body, powerful supports to the entire frame. Knees bend easily, and in bending they are not broken; their joints are flexible and they can bear a great amount of strain without injury. To learn well the lesson of the knees; to grasp the right idea of service; to know how to master obstacles and conquer our fate, making much out of little and compelling circumstances to bend to our decree and do our bidding—this is to know the secret of Capricorn, the most truly optimistic of all the signs, as it is the one which most readily demonstrates the truth of optimism.

As we are often confronted with temporarily aberrant conditions, we may encounter persons in this sign who appear considerably the reverse of the best we have indicated; but as disorderly states can be vanquished and the true nature of the sign revealed, it is unscientific to assume that because certain people are misrepresenting themselves they are incapable of being led to a state where they will correctly represent their nativity. Through development character is not radically changed, but its expression is rendered symmetrical.

Jan. 20 to Feb. 20

The Eleventh Sign---Aquarius, Water Bearer.

The familiar figure of the man with the watering pot naturally suggests this, the eleventh sign in the Zodiac, whose title Water-bearer immediately brings before us the thought of irrigation and all things pertaining thereto. Having considered the Paul-like qualities of Aries at the outset of these studies, we have now reached that point in our consideration of the twelve great divisions of mankind, where we are confronted with the Apollos-like characteristics common to Aquarius. "Paul planted, Apollos watered, God gave the increase," is a text from which an excellent analytical sermon could be preached concerning the special work of that particular kind of people with those peculiarities we have now to deal. We are all thoroughly familiar with the fiery, intrepid, energetic pioneer who runs up and down the country planting churches, holding revivals, starting societies and generally awakening interest in whatever appears to him to be of the highest value, and we are, also, familiar with those far less conspicuous, but none the less effective, workers who follow after the enthusiastic promoter of some new enterprise and water the ground patiently and continually wherein the seed has been sown.

Aquarius is not the sign of the brilliant orator so much as the home of the patient, quiet, unobtrusive, faithful teacher, one who knows just how to irrigate the mental soil and carefully tend such natures as require judicious treatment if they are to show forth the best that is in them. Persons born between January 20 and February 20 of any year are very apt to find themselves impelled by natural disposition to occupy the teacher's seat. It may be publicly or it may be quite in private that they exercise their honorable function of imparting knowledge, "line by line and precept by precept," for that is their method. These people are often gifted with a wealth of illustration. They are fine reasoners and can usually adapt their utterances to the comprehensions of any children or adults with whom they may be thrown. They often excel as healers and instructors of private classes, and their persistency makes up for any lack of fire and apparent energy they may fail to possess.

We notice that in this sign were born Abraham Lincoln, Robert Burns, the poet of freedom whom Scotland idolizes, Swedenborg, Thomas Paine, Strauss, Thomas Edison, the so-called "wizard of the nineteenth century," Talleyrand and many other extremely notable people. Careful examination into the careers of such widely dissimilar people as Emanuel Swedenborg and Thomas Paine, or Abraham Lincoln and the electric Edison, will show that no matter how utterly different their outward courses may have been, they all possessed the faculty of keeping on steadily with whatever they had undertaken until they succeeded in making their work tell powerfully. Lincoln, as one example of Aquarius at its best, may be cited as a largely self-made man, a man whose industry and sterling worth raised him from obscurity to unusual eminence. He was slow of speech and deliberate in manner and frequently annoyed impulsive people, who wished to rush business in a desperate hurry, by his leisurely methods of procedure; but he was sure of his position before he took it, and, having taken it, he was uncompromisingly tenacious of the stand which conviction had impelled him to occupy.

Swedenborg was a deep student, a tireless worker, a most painstaking experimentalist, who, long before his remarkable illumination in 1757, had published scientific and philosphic works in great abundance, displaying surprising erudition, and marked at every turn with the footprints of a genius which might very well be described as an infinite capacity for taking pains.

Consider also the work of Thomas Paine, whose conscientious adherence to conviction is now beyond dispute, and who, despite his iconoclasm in some directions and his lack of insight into the interior meaning of the Bible, has given us some of the grandest sayings extant in any literature, not excepting the very highest. "Every man a brother, every woman a sister, the world my country, to do good my religion." What can be sublimer than such sentiments? And the marvel of it is that they were written at a time when the most unfraternal theories were circulating in every direction; when church and state alike were eaten up with partisan jealousies and devoured by hostile factions everywhere.

Robert Burns is another example of the same spirit of manly fearlessness. Who has protested more vigorously than he against every sort of sham? has exposed hypocrisy more boldly, and who has extolled genuine virtue more sincerely?

Strauss, the sceptical author of a "Life of Jesus" and many other rationalistic works, also illustrates many of the leading traits of this decidedly unorthodox and unconventional sign.

Typical Aquarius people are always departing from accepted standards of belief and practice. They are among the most pronounced of the radical teachers of mankind, and if we are to have genuine teachers of any sort we must have eagles rather than parrots; men and women who soar, and do not imitate.

Thomas Edison, who is one of the most conspicuous examples of the true Aquarius nature, richly endowed and broadly developed, is a forceful, living illustration of the whole-souled concentrativeness which is one of its most expressive features. It is recorded of this renowned electrician that shortly after his marriage with a woman between whom and himself the truest sympathy existed, he actually forgot that he was married, so thoroughly absorbed was he in important electrical experiments.

Concentration on a given theme, complete devotion to a work in hand, entire absorption in the chosen duty—there may be fairly regarded as conspicuous elements in the true Aquarius character. As Aquarius is placed in the airy trigon or triplicity, and air symbolizes imagination, we are not surprised to find that people who are deeply rooted in this sign are singularly aspirational and prophetic in mental tendency, but not as a rule positively impetuous. Being addicted to elevating kinds of study they are generally well adapted either for a scientific or literary career, which necessitates close application to the work in hand, coupled with much perspicuity. These people illustrate the truth of the proverbial saying that constant dropping wears away the hardest stone. They win through their indomitable perseverance. They are often divinely patient and willing to allow the fruits of their efforts not to appear, if need be, till after many days. Such people are frequently on the unpopular side of important questions. They are often vigorous reformers, but usually their work is done in a quiet, plodding way. They write their briefs and elaborate their essays with much precision. They are careful in expression, weigh well their arguments and reach conclusions by orderly, logical process. It is rarely you can disagree with an Aquarius person if you grant his premises, as faultless, logical style and wealth of elucidation of a theme are seldom absent from the speeches or writings of people of this type, who are usually better writers than speakers by reason of their measured style and lack of much personal magnetism. They are like all truly intellectual people, given to brainy rather than hearty appeals; but in this statement we do not intend to imply any disparagement of their genius. We only mean that as Leo natives are disposed to regard everything from the centre of feeling, and that is characteristic of all the fiery signs, those in Aquarius and some other signs are touched more strongly by reasoning than by emotional excitement.

It is extremely interesting to watch with what minute precision Swedenborg iterates and reiterates his propositions. He writes as a man of infinite leisure; but, though he is somewhat tautological because extremely affluent in expression, those who follow him closely will perceive that no two sayings of his are exactly identical, and no two narrations are precisely similar, though there is a close resemblance between a multitude of his expressions and records of wonderful experiences.

Strauss when a young man (he wrote his "Life of Jesus" when fresh from the University he was not much over twenty-five years of age) exhibited all the peculiar limitations of the undeveloped individualist; later on his style improved greatly. Utterly unlike the poetic and romantic Renan, who was also a sceptic, Strauss wrote a somewhat barren story, and instead of seeking to explain unusual occurrences in a rational manner, if possible; he simply dismissed them as incredible and strove to account for legends in so very matter-of-fact a manner that the reader soon grows weary of his most inadequate commonplaces. Such writing is that of a man seeking to stifle or repress imagination. No so-called "development theory" will satisfy the inquiring spirit of to-day, which is a most enterprising and ambitious spirit; but there is a grand service which cool, deliberative intellect can render to the present psychical research movement; and that is to sift evidence, compare testimonies, dispassionately examine into alleged marvels and then give the public the clearly reasoned result of so wise a system of procedure.

In the sign Aquarius we find scholarly attainments of no mean order. This is a student's sign, and because somewhat lacking in intuitive perception, those who most fully represent it are all the more given to such mental pursuits as tend to establish knowledge on a firm external base.

According to physiological correspondence, Aquarius is in the ankles of the Archetypal Man, and surely the ankles, having great weight to support, need to be strong, firm and capable of much endurance. Following this suggestion we can read this type of humanity very accurately. They think and act for others; they are supports to their weaker neighbors, burden bearers, tireless, incessant, uncomplaining workers when in good condition. Being very near the extremities of the social body they are singularly able to carry out their ideas to logical and complete conclusions.

Aquarius children are generally modest and retiring in behavior. If they show pride it is pride of intellect, not personal vanity. They are good scholars, patient at their lessons, though not especially quick in learning, and very fond of asking questions from books as well as of their teachers.

All literary and scientific pursuits are suited to persons in this sign, though of course different individuals show special preferential aptitudes for particular studies.

As Aquarius overshadows Pisces, and Pisces is the twelfth sign, signifying the feet of the Grand Man, or final ultimation of the entire organism, we observe that those born on the cusp of Pisces between February 18 and 22 are often particularly given to conceiving and executing new ideas. They have a wonderfully versatile faculty for grasping the, as yet uncomprehended or unthought of, and bringing it down to the every day affairs of earth. Though Aquarius is an airy, and Pisces a watery sign, and air signifies imagination and water intellect, the imagination of Aquarius is of a very practical, reasonable kind, and may safely be called the scientific type of imagination, whose special province it is to see ahead what can speedily be rendered actual.

The Twelfth Sign--Pisces, The Fishes.

We have now reached the final section of the Zodiac, and are now in the feet or ultimate extremities of the Maximus Homo. Feet and fish suggest the lines along which we must proceed if we are to duly comprehend the attributes specially pertaining to this, the most external region in the Zodiac, which is the place where the utmost circumference is reached. It is interesting to note that George Washington, founder of the American Republic and its first President, was born just as Aquarius had melted into Pisces (February 22), the period of Pisces extending from about February 20 to March 20, the Vernal Equinox. Many other celebrities find their home in this, the last of the watery signs, where the waters become prolific of living creatures, and bring forth abundantly the moving denizens of ocean, lake and stream. Voltaire and Victor Hugo are two of the most notable modern representatives of this sign, whose distinguishing features are love of complete fulfillment of designs and final decoration of all that has been previously undertaken.

The typical Pisces man, woman or child strikes us at once as one who is singularly precise and orderly, hating confusion, and very much objecting to leaving things in an unfinished condition. We may often visit the artistic studio or literary sanctum of an Aries person, and find a variety of pictures, statutes, manuscripts, etc., in various stages of incompleteness, as Aries people often begin things which they never finish, and especially owing to their remarkable quickness of perception, they grasp an idea but cannot fully externalize it; or, as is still oftener the case with them, they are so eager to rush to the newest work which they are conceiving that they neglect and even forget the subject of their earlier inspirations. Pisces people are the very reverse of this. Usually they are not originators, architects or designers, but they are fulfillers of the law to its utmost jot and tittle. Having set out to accomplish anything they insist on its entire completion, and being particularly apt at ending works which others have left unfinished, they are often successfully appealed to to write the last chapter of a story, or the last scene in a play, and to do a variety of useful things which their more flighty and impetuous neighbors have not concluded. We all know people whose pet delight is in fully finished productions, and whose chief aversion is to anything not fully carried out.

We note how incomplete and, therefore, largely unsatisfying are the works of many distinguished novelists and playwrights of this day, notably those who, like Henrik Ibsen, the famed Norwegian dramatist, allow the curtain to fall, as in "A Doll's House," upon an ending which is properly no ending, but only a transitional move, a temporary expedient on the part of the bewildered heroine. Some people, notably those of the pure Pisces type, when well developed, can supply perfect endings to these unfinished pictures; but such persons are the very ones who are best adapted to externalize their own mental conclusions in such a way, that people unlike themselves and lacking in their culminative intellectual ability, may not be left at the mercy of uncertain conjecture as to the real lesson conveyed by the play or novel.

Pisces people are good moralists. They can easily write morals explanatory of fables written by their friends, who are in other sections of the Zodiac. We all know the careful hostess who inspects the guest chamber before the visitor's arrival, and makes sure that every detail of preparation is complete, even to pins in the pincushion and flowers in the vases. Such a woman is a good representative of Pisces, and she will also be very particular with her own dress, and quick to observe any lack of completeless in the apparel of another, and in the furniture of an apartment. Mural decorations, gilding of cupolas, finishing of spires and all similar work is congenial to this type of humanity, whose eyes are very quick to discern outward deficiences wherever they may appear.

As with all the other signs so with Pisces, there are various planes on which the distinguishing traits of the sign are most conspicuous with different individuals born in it, and further differ with the same individuals at different stages of their progress. It must never be forgotten that evolution and education do not radically or essentially change disposition, but by these means characters are raised, advanced and in every way assisted to more perfect expression. Pisces is a sign in which we find many pedestrians and travellers of all sorts; children and adults who like to use their feet, and whose congenial occupation compels their use of these members. The desire for locomotion may be expressed in the pettiest, fussiest, external manner, or it may show itself forth in the sublimest way. To travel with intellectual feet, regardless of the motions of the pedals of the flesh, is to have attained to a means of locomotion which only such rare geniuses as Emerson and a few others seem to have comprehended yet; but we are certainly approaching, and that rapidly, a state in consciousness where we shall dispense greatly, if not totally, with our present physical globe-trotting apparatus. We all know how familiar are the phrases. "change of air" and "change of scene." We all know how constantly physicians and others, fall back upon these trite recommendations when medicines, reasonings and all else seems to have failed, and we cannot deny that after an ocean voyage or a trip over land many a pallid invalid has returned home buoyant and vigorous to outward seeming. But these superficial appearances are often deeply treacherous, for very soon after resuming the old life in the accustomed place, the old disorderly symptoms reappear, and another prolonged absence from home and business is seemingly necessitated. Pisces people of all with whom we are acquainted need to be kept most constantly on the move, and till they have grasped a higher philosophy than materialism they must have frequent physical change and motion to keep their machinery in working order. When they have become elevated in thought to a higher plane of consciousness, these natural pedestrians can enjoy every advantage of travel without stirring a yard from their domestic hearth. To the intelligent student of Mental Science it is extremely interesting to watch the true resurrection of various types of humanity to regenerate conditions. Pisces stands figuratively for all that baptism by water unto repentance and subsequent elevation of life signifies; and students of occult lore know well enough that baptism by water signifies intellectual regeneration, which is nothing less than a transposition of intelligence, a transference of thought, to a higher or interior realm.

Pisces children are usually active and of rather a roaming disposition. They enjoy excursions in the woods, wandering by the streams, and out-door life generally. They are neat in their persons, orderly in their behavior and often given to write out compositions with extraordinary accuracy.

We do not say that people in this sign buy pictures for their frames, but we do find that as a rule they are not satisfied with unframed pictures. They are, unless highly awakened inwardly, too disposed to look at the setting of a gem. The casket which enshrines a jewel is often, to them, quite as much as the precious stone itself. Being very much concerned with ultimates these people are splendidly adapted to fashion receptacles for truth and to give attention to the minutest detail of expression.

In this sign are to be found many actors, elocutionists, teachers of methods, instructors in languages, copyists, readers, decorative artists, coiffeurs, milliners, dressmakers, tailors and, in a word, people working at all sorts of trades which require the knack of putting an excellent finish to something.

It is by no means a difficult task to trace the particular inversions to which persons born at different seasons of the year are most liable until they have reached the height of the wise men, who rule their stars and are no longer classable among the unwise, who are ruled by them; but to dwell at length upon tendencies to ailments of any kind is both depressing and unnecessary, as all besetting weaknesses, which most readily accompany special temperaments are simply inversions of the excellent qualities normally characteristic of the sign. Pisces, considered in its position of pedal extremities of the Grand Man, is most likely, if caught napping, to be attacked with some disorder of the feet, or with difficulty immediately connected with the most external aspects of business or family life. A very wise mental attitude to take is the following: Whenever you find yourself disposed to some special annoyance, read your distinctive mission through it. If you are in Aries, and your head is liable to trouble you if you get unduly excited, consider that you are specially capacitated by nature to do excellent work, not only with your own head, but on behalf of the heads of your neighbors; for wherever our greatest strength lies, there are our temptations fiercest. We all have to do battle at the very point where we are capable of rendering the most efficient service; for wherever the scene of conflict is there must the victory be; and wherever the overcoming is, there do we find the victor's robe, wreath, palm and crown. In the Apocalypse there is a wonderful statement to the effect that he that overcometh shall receive a new name, and a white stone wherein will be written the name which no other than its recipient can read. This refers to the glorious result of individual victory, when the conqueror takes his seat and rules in his domain, to be henceforth no more a slave forever. Every one of us, no matter where we may find ourselves in the Zodiac, will have to wrestle until we have conquered, in the field of action in which our native strength is tried. The deep underlying truth contained in the doctrine of the successive incarnations of the same Ego, on this or some other planet, until final ascendancy over all the elements of nature is reached, is to be found in this most reasonable reflection; viz., that we must strive until we conquer. We must go over our lessons again and yet again until we have learned them to perfection. Physical dissolution solves no problems. Individual regeneration solves all problems for the regenerating individual through the agency of orderly regenerative processes. Suicide is a weak act fraught with no exemption from the subjective bugbear we may vainly seek to escape from. There are no loopholes of escape from ourselves or from the consequences of our acts. The wheel of change turns with us on it, until we have escaped from the wheel by soaring above it.

Now that Oriental philosophies are being investigated pretty thoroughly in Europe and America, so that Americans and Europeans are beginning to understand something of the wisdom of the ages concealed in all venerable systems in part, though wholly in none, the time is ripe for a searching comparison of the essentials of all religions and philosophies, to the end that we may discover the essential root of truth underlying all. Then as we cease piling refuse on this foundation, which is none other than the truth embodied in the old Quaker doctrine—there is a Christ in every man—we shall set to work intelligently to do our own work nobly and cease criticising and reviling our neighbors because we differ one from the other as do forest trees, garden flowers and all the beautiful forms of nature in all her provinces or kingdoms.

Let us take into our lives the full significance of the mottoes: We are all good, though we are all different; and We must agree to differ, but never disagree; and very soon we shall learn to solve every problem which now vexes us, and go forward as a happy, industrial army to the ideal commonwealth not so very far ahead.

The Four Triplicities
General Summary.

Having in the preceding essays endeavored—though but in barest outline—to give as lucid an account as possible of the predominating characteristics of twelve representative manners of people, classified according to the ancient idea of the Universal Zodiac or Archetypal Man, we, in this concluding essay, endeavor to answer some of the many questions which the preceding essays have raised. In the first place let us call attention to the four-fold division of the Zodiac, common to all writers, both ancient and modern. The four trigons, triplicities or domains, as they are called, are portioned out as follows: The fiery signs are Aries, Leo and Sagittarius, corresponding to the head (Aries), heart (Leo) and thighs (Sagittarius) of the Grand Man.

The airy triplicity is composed of Gemini (the arms), Libra (the loins) and Aquarius (the ankles).

The earthy trigon is constituted of Taurus (the neck), Virgo (the solar plexus) and Capricorn (the knees).

The watery domain contains Cancer (the breast), Scorpio (the genital organs) and Pisces (the feet).

These four sections of the Zodiac may be very profitably studied by all who are seeking to compare one sign with another to the better understanding of the main subject in general and in particular.

Those who are born in any part of the domain of fire are apt to be impetuous and inflammable in disposition. When such persons collide it is as when two fires meet to produce an intense blaze; but this comparison needs to be followed on to its spiritual planes of application, if we would illustrate our theme by referring to the higher rather than to the lower aspects and expressions of this impulsive type of disposition. Those whose abode is in the realm of fire, if living on a merely animal plane of existence, are very apt to fly into rages on slight provocation, and to be carried away by every novelty and exciting circumstance. They are highly sensational, melo-dramatic and tragic when keenly aroused, and are consequently the heroes in fields of strife of all descriptions. When such people are thrown together they are terribly apt to quarrel, and though frequently very affectionate in temperament, and sincerely attached to each other in the depths of their nature, on the surface of existence they may be embroiled in never ending conflict. When persons of this stamp rise from animality to intellectuality, and leave behind them the baser emotions common to the lower section of the fiery domain, they may be most successful collaborators and produce a joint work of far more value than either could produce singly; while on the highest moral altitudes and in the spiritual or interior degrees of these warm, impulsive signs, frequent exhibitions are made of a sublime and glorious enthusiasm for all that makes for righteousness, illustrating the practical truth of the widely accepted doctrine, that love is the supreme power, the weightiest force in the universe.

Fire has ever been directly associated with God, and equally with the devil by theologians. Never was there a divine appearance or revelation of any kind, according to the Jewish scriptures, but fire was directly connected with it. Moses is startled at the sight of a burning brush at Horeb. Elijah proves the superiority of Adonai to Baal by means of a fiery test; and so on through every recorded instance of a heavenly communication, fire enters conspicuously into the accompanying phenomena. The New Testament takes up the strain where the Hebrew prophets have left it; so when the Holy Spirit descends upon the apostolic company in Jerusalem they witness cloven tongues of flame descending upon those who are awaiting inspiration, prior to the entrance into them of that fullness of spiritual strength which causes them to transcend all ordinary limitations and prove themselves capable of rising to meet every conceivable emergency. Nature unmistakably testifies to the reasonableness of this conception. Every living body is warm, while dead bodies are invariably cold. As the devil only means force inverted or power abused, a lake of fire is said to be satan's habitation, while God is said to dwell in fire forever, and more than that, the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews says: "Our God is a consuming fire."

The present popular study of comparative religion is fast revealing to the world the fact that the learned among all ancient peoples entertained the idea of fire as coeval and co-extensive with Deity. Animal worship was only a lower form of worship, practised by the comparatively ignorant and illiterate; but the word animal literally means a living creature, an organism endowed with some animating principle; from the Latin animus, anima, meaning mind or spirit, the English noun and adjective animal are directly derived. Wherein does an animal distinctly differ from a vegetable, but in that it is a higher form of organized existence, considerably warmer and with powers of locomotion which a plant does not possess.

To follow out the correspondence of fire at all fully would require a good sized volume at the least; but when we find that the ancients placed fire both in the head and heart of the Grand Man—and these are the universally acknowledged vital centres—we can judge something of the importance they attached to this most sacred of the elements. When mythologies are studied even reverently with a view to grasp their inner meaning, we shall all be surprised to discover how truly wise many of our far-off ancestors were, and how flippant is the conclusion based on gross ignorance, that nothing is worth anything unless it is brand new.

It is said by some students of the different manners of people that those born in the same triplicity should not intermarry. If there is any truth or justice in this remark it refers only to very undeveloped persons who are living entirely on the sense plane. Those who are in any way super-sensuous in their attainment, when both are in the fiery trigon, stimulate each other to proficiency in the noblest undertakings. The marriage question, however, cannot be settled by cold arguments concerning utility, unless people are willing to surrender emotion to intellect altogether, and allow themselves to be actuated by utterly rationalistic considerations. As marriage, resulting in the birth of offspring, is a social question of the first importance, affecting the common good of a community and the interest of the human family at large, it cannot be out of place to call upon people to consult the general weal, not merely to gratify their own impulses; but though an immense reform can be instituted in this direction, it will probably always remain true as Longfellow has said in his "Building of the Ship":

> "It is the heart and not the brain,
> That to the highest doth attain,
> And he who followeth love's behest,
> Far excelleth all the rest."

When heart and head are truly blended we may safely say that the divine fire is aglow within us, and we are prepared to let our true light shine for the enlightenment of all humanity. Swedenborg's profound and lucid statement concerning fire, that its heat corresponds to love, and its light to wisdom, is the most perfect condensation of truth on the subject to be found in any literature. Such a definition cannot be simplified or improved upon, and it opens so wide a field of thought that to follow it as a suggestive leader is to be introduced into an endless pasture land of richest herbage for the soul.

The quality of air, being widely different from that of fire, suggests that the airy triplicity must be the home of natives who are by nature volatile and transitional in temperament or disposition. Air and fire always work well together. A draught is necessary to kindle a blaze, and wherever there is a raging fire a strong current of air accompanies it. The divine effluence is always compared in ancient scripture to wind or breath, and we all know that quick breathing induces and accompanies added warmth of the system.

As the subject of breath is now so much discussed among students of all phases of occultism, and breathing is unquestionably a vitally important process, while speaking of people who are in the airy constellations, it may be well to remark that their special power is in their breath, which is Kabalistically related to imagination, as fire is always associated with affection. External breathing-exercises have a certain symbolic value, if only on account of their suggestiveness; but breathing is really regulated by imagination, and as all people in the airy triplicity are naturally imaginative, it is well that they should understand the true nature of imagination, that they may understand themselves. Imagination is, properly speaking, the imaging, portrait-taking or photographic faculty, and is, therefore, directly connected with seership and vision. Clairvoyance is frequently exhibited, even during infancy, by children born in Gemini, Libra or Aquarius; and while disordered imagination leads many people into trouble, we know of no sure cure for any disorder except the truly rational method pursued by intelligent Mental Scientists, who seek to discover the true province and function of a faculty and usefully employ it accordingly with its natural intent. To attribute ideals to imagination is scientifically correct so far as language goes, provided the speaker is a genuine etymologist; otherwise it amounts to a flippant dismissal of a subject too high for the foolish to grasp, and too deep for the thoughtless to comprehend. Imagination is the road to every new discovery and fresh achievement in science, literature and art. Without imagination we stagnate in cellars instead of breathing in the bracing air obtainable from the summits of our dwellings.

The airy domain or province of the atmosphere is the habitat of all who are disposed to fly in thought above the solid earth of actual objectivity, and the moving waters of the subjective or intellectual realm, and take excursions from planet to planet, and find out as much as possible of what is going on in the psychic realm. There are more psychics or sensitives in the airy triplicity than in any of the other divisions of the Zodiac, and these natural born sensitives need perfect liberty to travel as they will through airy spaces in the unseen state.

The fiery domain is the seat of rulers; the airy trigon is the abode of travellers. Restlessness is the weakness to which the denizens of the air are most addicted; but when they learn to utilize their roaming temperament for the highest good, they soon discover that thought can move quickly and fly far afield without involving nervous irritability or constant agitation of the person.

The earthy signs, Taurus, Virgo and Capricorn are the abodes of the most practical and executive types of people, those who love external order and desire to carry everything out to its logical fulfillment. Service is the one word which best expresses the function of this triplicity, and it is only when actively engaged in some useful undertaking that such people are really well or happy or feel in any way satisfied with their condition. People of this type do not, as a rule, agree very well with those who belong in the airy trigon, unless both are singularly well developed, as those whose home is in one of the earthy signs, though ever so idealistic in some respects, cannot be content to let things rest in the vapory realm of speculation. Air people are often flighty and volatile, and are satisfied to dream of things they never execute; but earth people, though they may be very spiritual in their conceptions, are determined not to rest till they have ultimated their own or somebody's else ideals. When air and earth people understand each other, they can enter into partnership and produce a singularly felicitous result of joint activity.

Concerning the watery signs, Cancer, Scorpio and Pisces it may be truly said that these three constellations are apt to be the province of coldly intellectual people, who weigh and measure everything in a decidedly emotionless manner; and this triplicity is by far the most conservative of the four.

The earth nature is motherly, and though very practical and often external in its objects and delights; it signifies the womb of nature, the matrix in which gestation, germination and insubation take place. The dwellers in the sea, the finny tribes of ocean, are called cold-blooded, and so they are when contrasted with hot-blooded mammals. Fish always stand for cool intellect, and refer to whatever can be deduced by rational process. Many distinguished persons of great intellectual ability are found in the watery domain, but unless very highly unfolded they are too critical and fail to understand life as it appeals to warmer temperaments.

As fire and water quench each other, so do we often see instances of lamentable incompatibility between married people; when one is in the fiery, and the other in the watery trigon. If it is discovered in families that brothers and sisters are illy adapted one to another, it is surely better to help them to gravitate to congenial spheres of action, instead of stolidly insisting upon keeping a family together, which is often done at the expense of health and harmony and to the detriment of all concerned.

We are indebted to Eleanor Kirk's very interesting book, "The Influence of the Zodiac Upon Human Life," for a final classification of the twelve signs into three groups as follows:

Aries, Taurus, Gemini and Cancer are the four positive signs. Leo, Virgo, Libra and Scorpio, the four middle signs. Sagittarius, Capricorn, Aquarius and Pisces, the four negative signs. In a picture of the Grand Man they stand anatomically as follows: Positive parts of the body, head, neck, shoulders and breast. Middle portions, all the nutritive, digestive and reproductive system. Negative section, the lower limbs and feet. Each of these three divisions contains four signs the first of which is fire; the second, earth; the third, air; and the fourth, water. This final division makes the four domains practically equal, though fire always takes precedence of earth, and air takes precedence of water.

Though from the 21st day of one month to the 21st day of the next may be broadly stated as the period occupied by each sign, a more exact classification reads as follows: Aries, March 20 to April 20; Taurus, April 20 to May 21; Gemini, May 21 to June 21; Cancer, June 21 to July 22; Leo, July 22 to August 22; Virgo, August 22 to September 23; Libra, September 23 to October 23; Scorpio, October 23 to November 22; Sagittarius, November 22 to December 21; Capricorn, December 21 to January 21; Aquarius, January 21 to February 20; Pisces, February 20 to March 20. Three days at the commencement of each sign may be allowed for the waning of the outgoing and the waxing of the incoming influence.

The twelve tribes of Israel as mentioned in the forty-ninth chapter of Genesis and in the seventh chapter of the book of Revelation are, by some students of the Kabala, connected with the signs in the following order:

Aries—Benjamin. Taurus—Issachar. Gemini —Simeon-Levi. Cancer—Zebulun. Leo—Judah. Virgo—Asshur. Libra—Dan. Scorpio—Gad. Sagittarius—Joseph. Capricorn—Naphtali. Aquarius—Reuben. Pisces—Ephraim and Manasseh.

This designation is in accordance with the words, "The first shall be last and the last first." We have given this enumeration in response to numerous inquiries. The two orders are simply the heliocentric (esoteric) and the geocentric (exoteric). Both are correct, but the matter is viewed from opposite standpoints.

In concluding we desire to state plainly to all our readers that we have written suggestively to provoke further inquiry, not dogmatically as though we were settling the matter finally for all mankind.

Broad hints and general outlines have been given, but the multifarious variations from outlined types must prove subject matter for constant individual investigation.

Significance of Names and Numbers.

(Reprinted from Occult Review, November, 1910.)

From very early times, certainly since the days of the famous Greek philosopher Pythagoras, we all know that much importance has been freely assigned to names and numbers, and many have been the ingenious theories constructed to explain their significance. The number of letters in one's name, and especially their arrangement, is forming the topic of many a modern, as it formed the theme of many an ancient, discourse. Many theorists have recourse to the Jewish Kabala and lay much stress upon the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet, but the twenty-six English letters are now often called into requisition, and quite an elaborate system has been built up for the convenience of people born in English-speaking countries and who know nothing of Hebrew. According to one system, now much in vogue, the twenty-six letters are divided into two columns of nine letters each, and one of eight letters, reading thus: The value of 1 is attributed to a, j, s;

2 to b, k, t; 3 to c, l, u; 4 to d, m, v; 5 to e, n, w; 6 to f, o, x; 7 to g, p, y; 8 to h, q, z; 9 to i and r. In reading the importance of one's name by this method, the following course may be pursued: Take as an illustration Carolined Crosspuddle. The letters are stated as to numerical value thus: C, 3; A, 1; R, 9; O, 6; L, 3; I, 9; N, 5; E, 5; D, 4; C, 3; R, 9; O, 6; S, 1; S, 1; P, 7; U, 3; D, 4; D, 4; L, 3; E, 5; making a total of ninety-one letters, and as 9 and 1 make 10 this is a name of completeness, as all the figures and the circle are represented in it. Now though the name is an unusual one it is nevertheless one of excellent omen, and according to this numerical calculation its import agrees with its obvious suggestiveness, which is of one who conquers difficulties, surmounts obstacles and generally displayes indomitable perserverance. It is notworthy that the three letters of the well known name Fox are all of the value of 6, but 3 times 6 is 18 and 8 and 1 make 9, therefore Fox is a powerful name, as 9 is the highest numeral. But as it is invariably the case that one has a given as well as a family name, different members of a Fox family would find their complete names adding up very differently; for example, John Fox totals 38, as John counts 20 and Fox 18. Now 11, which is the acknowledged ultimate of 38, is said to be one of far more than ordinary value, for 11 and 22 are placed as special ultimates and not further reduced, as they could be by making 11 equal 2 and 22 equal 4. The reason assignable for this refusal to trace them to their lowest conceivable ultimate is that o do so would necessitate the reduction of an attained ultimate which is not permissible. This can readily be seen by illustrating with a name which reaches either 2 or 4 by simple first reduction. Any name made up of 11 would ultimate in 2, likewise any name constituted of 22 as its numerical value would ultimate 4. Eleven is called the octave of B, 22 is the octave of D, according to the system to which we are referring. What's in a name? is a question continually raised, and very often quite inconsequently dismissed as though there were next to nothing in it, but human experience by no means justifies this shallow view. We all know how much stress is laid upon name-values in ancient sacred literature. The Old Testament has a great deal to say about names being enlarged, and in some instances entirely changed, to indicate the further spiritual growth of their possessors. Abraham is a much stronger name than Abram, which it superseded, and Israel is a far nobler name than Jacob, which it supplanted. In the New Testament the same idea is carried out with great emphasis in the case of naming the infant John at the time of his circumcision, when no one in the family into which that child was born had been so called. It is idle to say that there is naught but antiquated superstition in this discussion, for entirely apart from the occultist's interior view of the matter we all know how heavily handicapped many people are by mean and ugly names, and how greatly it is to one's advantage to be the possessor of a good name in all senses of the word.

Time-honored customs, which go on persisting age after age, have always something originally to justify them, and this fact is clearly evident when we consider the persistence with which the sons and daughters of royal and noble houses are endowed with a number of names, while the peasantry of all nations have always been satisfied with few and simple appellations. The reason for this is very easily traced. In the one case many and arduous duties would fall to the lot of the child as he or she grew to maturity, while in the other the work to be done would be simple and monotonous, though often physically severe. The good old idea of rulership was that it required unusual abilities on the part of the rulers, and that high position, far from justifying laxity in morals coupled with indolence and foolish self-conceit, demanded of all who held high rank that they set the noblest possible examples of industry and excellence of character to all over whom they were placed. To live up to a lofty name is a great and honorable duty in these days as well as in times of old. But are not names given arbitrarily and even accidentally? many will inquire. No, they are not, for nothing occurs by accident, answers the uncompromising occultist, who is sufficiently scientific and logical to declare that for every effect there must be an efficient cause, and who furthermore insists that behind every material or physical event there lies an unseen psychic origin. We are born when and where we are born in consequence of the special mission the incarnating ego is seeking to fulfil through incarnation, and the name given to the child at birth, or soon after, is an indication of the place that soul is to occupy on earth and the nature of the work to be accomplished. Then we may well ask, can we, or have we any right to change our names or to suppress any portion of them? Is a nom de plume permissible? To which the following answer may be given. Our names from birth through the comparatively irresponsible years of childhood represent what we have to encounter and the raw material with which we have to work; this is imposed upon us, at least apparently, without our choice, and may be referred to karma; but as we advance to years of discretion and must take responsibilities upon ourselves, the right, and indeed the duty, of selection is brought home to us, and we are therefore called upon to embark upon an ocean of self-responsibility which aforetime we could not navigate. The addition of a name at confirmation in the Catholic Church is a survival of a custom immeasurably older than Christian history, and it is one of those impressive ceremonials which give us to understand that with the approach of intellectual maturity a sense of responsibility must be impressed upon the youth or maiden as a qualification for the graver duties which must be acknowledged as strength increases and years advance. It is often found that when one has been long enduring what is commonly called misfortune, a decided run of what is vulgarly styled "better luck" follows swiftly upon the adoption of a new name, sometimes even from the suppression of one's name which has long been made prominent and the bringing forward of another part which has been resting in abeyance. A firm name deliberately chosen has a large influence on the business conducted over it, as the suggestion constantly made by its publication in print, together with the frequent setting up of peculiar currents by its frequent pronunciation, attunes the business to a certain rate of vibration and serves to connect the establishment with certain unsuspected influences who are attracted, and sometimes even summoned unknowingly to those who summon them, by the very utterance of the name.

Of course the effect of merely casual pronunciation of names cannot have the same intense effect which is produced by uttering the name with full awareness of its value coupled with intent to employ it systematically; still, there is very much unconsciously accomplished by the constant reiteration of a name by a great many people, even though it be but thoughtlessly. As there are a few extremely usual English names by which multitudes of our compatriots are called, it is interesting to see to what special categories some of the most widely employed among them belong. George, the name of the present British King, is a name whose number is 39, which is reducible to 12 and ultimately to 3, if one wishes to push the ultimate to uttermost finality. As 12 represents the entire number of the Zodiac and 3 is the triangle, denoting the first equilibrium, the equalization of the three planes—physical, mental and moral—the name is one of great power and dignity, and is the appropriate name of the patron saint of England who has traditionally and mystically "slain the Dragon," i.e., overcome the lower elements and won his spurs through valiant conquest over the most powerful and insidious of foes. Mary, the name of the Queen Consort, is numerically 21, which immediately ultimates in 3. The present King and Queen are, therefore, unitedly 15, according to the higher reckoning, the ultimate of which is 6, and 6 also according to the lower. Now what is the significance of 6? It stands for the interlaced triangle, an emblem extremely prominent in Jewish circles; the present reign throughout the British Empire should therefore augur well for the House of Israel, but as 6 is only preparatory to 7, which is the Sabbatic numeral, the names of our King and Queen united indicate the activities of a sixth working day, not the repose of a Sabbatic period. Great activity all over the Empire is suggested by present omens; great increase in wealth and honor and much legislation calculated to overthrow old-time limitations and lead the Anglo-Saxon race and all who are guided by it to renewed prosperity and ever-growing liberty.

Alfred is a name which numbers 28 and ultimates as 10, denoting fullness of expression. Edward numbers the same. Albert numbers 22 and ultimates as 4. Harry numbers 34 and ultimates as 7. Charles numbers 30. Emma numbers 14 and ultimates as 5. Julia numbers 17 and ultimates as 8. Hannah numbers 28 and ultimates as 10. We might easily multiply instances, but what little has been said may suffice to induce some readers to look up the quality of the names they bear and see whether they may not be able to trace a good deal that is obscure in their lives to this peculiar origin. Diminutives such as Jim, which numbers 14 and ultimates as 5; Jack, numbering 7 direct, and Tom, numbering 12 and ultimating in 3, are borne by so many boys and young men that they must have a great effect upon the rising generation. A very ancient system gives the following special value to numbers: 1, unity, simplicity; 2, duality, versatility; 3, trinity, general adaptability;

4, quaternity, equity; 5, dexterity, brotherliness; 6, comprehensiveness; 7, completeness, spiritual discernment, reposefulness; 8, octave, enterprise, sphericity; 9, aspiration, discovery, achievement; 10, universality, completeness. Whatever there may be in this study, it is certainly a fascinating intellectual pursuit, and when one seriously takes it up there seems no end to the interesting and instructive experiments which may be conducted in connection with it. The word MONEY numbers 27 and therefore totalizes as 9, giving birth to the thought that as 9 is the highest of our numerals there is no limit to the good we can do with wealth, even on the most external plane, if we do but resolutely determine to consecrate its use and acquisition toward furthering the ends of general human welfare.

A very interesting book dealing with this subject under the title Numbers, their Magic and Mystery, by Dr. Isidore Kosminsky, is supplied by the publishers of this book. Paper covers, 30 cents, post free, Another book, applying the principle of numbers and Kabalistic calculations to Astrology, is Your Fortune in your Name, or Kabalistic Astrology, by Sepharial, cloth gilt, $1.00, post free, also from the same publishing house.

MASONIC HISTORY
and
VALUABLE LITERATURE

Ancient Mysteries and Modern Masonry. The Mysteries-Egyptian, Hindu, Persian, Druidical, Gothic, Grecian, Jewish and Christian, their Origin and Objects; the Meaning of True Initiation, Origin and History of Freemasonry, Knights Templar, Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite, and the Symbols and Legends of Masonry; in 12 Lectures, given in Pullman Memorial Church, Albion, N. Y., Rev. Charles H. Vail, 32°. Over 200 pages. Extra fine binding, silk cloth and gilt stamps. No. 22056 $1.00
Paper 22060 .75

Ancient Mystic Oriental Masonry. Its Teachings, Rules, Laws and Present Usages which govern the Order at the present day. Dr. R. Swinburne Clymer. Cloth, No. 22086..... 1.50

Ancient Constitutions of Freemasons. Verbatim copy of the original edition of 1723, containing the History, Laws, Charges, Orders, Regulations and Usages, together with a collection of old Masonic Songs and Music. Anderson. (An original in good condition is worth $65.00.) No. 22081.....1.00

Antiquities of Freemasonry. Comprising Illustrations of the Five Grand Periods of Masonry, from the Creation of the World to the Dedication of King Solomon's Temple; including chapters on Masonic Tradition, Masonry from the Creation to the time of Enoch, Origin of Arts and Sciences, Masonry from Enoch to the Deluge, Idolatrous Mysteries as contrasted with Freemasonry, Masonry from the Deluge to Isaac, Symbolic Instruction, Masonry from Isaac to the Deliverance from Egyptian Captivity, Five Points of Fellowship, Masonry from the Deliverance to the Dedication of King Solomon's Temple. Illustrated. Rev. George Oliver, D. D. Blue cloth, gilt, 5½x8¼, 242 pgs, No. 22091.....1.50

Cyclopedia of Fraternities, The. Including the Origin, Purposes, Growth, History and Statistics of 600 or more societies. By Albert C. Stevens assisted by more than a 1000 members of various Orders. Complete in one Vol., 468 pgs. Illustrated by Charts and Maps. Cloth, No. 22411.....4.50

Egypt the Cradle of Ancient Masonry. Comprising a History of Egypt, with a comprehensive and authentic account of the

Antiquity of Masonry, the result of many years of personal investigation and exhaustive research in India, Persia, Syria and the Valley of the Nile. Norman F. de Clifford. Beautifully illustrated,
Art Canvas binding, 2 vol., 9x12. 644 pgs, No. 22421.... 6.75
Half American Morocco, 2 vol., " " " No. 22423.... 7.50
Full American Morocco, 2 vol., " " " No. 22424.... 10.00
Full Persian Morocco, 1 vol., " " " No. 22425.... 10.00

Egyptian Symbols, A Comparison with those of the Hebrews. Including Principle of Symbology, Application to Egyptian Symbols, to the Symbols of Color and to the Symbols of the Bible. A clear, concise exposition of a most interesting subject, by Frederick Portal. Translated from the French, by John W. Simons. Illustrated.
No. 22381..... 1.00

Encyclopedia. By A. G. Mackey, D. D. Revised and enlarged with new Subjects, Pronouncing Dictionary. Masonic Scripture Names etc. C. T. McClenachan.
Library Sheep, No. 22402.....6.00
Half Russia, Gilt Top, No. 22405.....6.50
Full Morocco, No. 22404.....8.00
Two Vol. Edition, No. 22406.....12.00

Freemasonry, "Open Road to Damnation." Catholic.
Paper 50650.....10

Genius of Freemasonry, The, and the 20th Century Crusade. For the good of Masonry, and in the interest of Freedom and Fraternity, Light, Liberty and Love; against Ignorance, Superstition and Fear, Despotism and Jesuitism. J. D. Buck. Cloth. bound.
339 pgs. No. 22656.....1.00

History and Cyclopedia, Illustrated. An Account of the Rise and Progress of Freemasonry. Definitions of Technical Terms used by the Fraternity; also "A Complete Dictionary of Symbolic Masonry" George Oliver, D. D. and Robert Macoy, 33°,
717 pgs, 222 engravings. Full Art Canvas, No. 22391.....2.75
Library Sheep, Marble Edge, No. 22392.....3.00
Half American Russia, Gilt Top, No. 22395.....3.25
Half American Morocco, Full Gilt, No. 22393.....3.50
Full American Russia, Full Gilt, No. 22397.....4.25
FullAmerican Morocco, Full Gilt, No. 22394.....5.75
Full Persian Morocco, Full Gilt, No. 22398.....8.50

History of Initiation. In Twelve Lectures: General Introduction, History of Initiation in Hindustan, Philosophy of the Eastern Mysteries, Initiation in Persia, Initiation in Greece, Ceremonies of Initiation into the Mysteries of Bacchus, the Celtic Mysteries, Ceremonies in Britain, Symbols and Doctrines of the Druids, Gothic Mysteries, Doctrines and Morality, History of Initiation in America, comprising the Rites, Ceremonies and Doctrines of all the Secret and Mysterious Institutions of the Ancient World. Rev. George Oliver, D. D. Illustrated, 218 pgs. Blue cloth and gilt stamps, 5¼x8¼, gilt. No. 22801..... 1.50

History of Freemasonry, from the Building of the House of the Lord, and its progress throughout the civilized world, down to the present time; to which is added a History of the Craft in the United States. J. W. S. Mitchell, M. D., P. G. M., P. G. H. P., and P. E. C. Two magnificent volumes of 1500 pgs., royal octavo, 6½x9½ inches, bound in Emblematic Blue Silk Linen. Embossed with jewels in silver, complete, No. 22781.....4.00
Sheep, Library style, No. 22782.....5.00
Morocco (dark red) Jewels in gold, No. 22784.....6.00

Historical Landmarks, Geo. Oliver. The body of this work is of itself one of the greatest contributions to Masonic literature; while the annotations on the original text, by Dr. Oliver, add immensely to its value. There is a fine steel likeness of the author expressly engraved for the American edition, besides the many beautiful illustrations with which this great masterpiece of Masonic writing abounds. Two volumes in one. 1000 pages, 6½ x 9½ No. 22723.....4.00

History of the Knights Templar. C. G. Addison. A condensed narrative or History of the Great Crusades; a thrilling account of the longest and hardest struggle for freedom of Christian principles that the world has ever known. No such zeal and ardor have ever been recorded; no such battles have ever been fought in ancient or modern times; no such persecutions, martyrdom and suffering for any cause as those endured by the Crusaders to whom we owe our beautiful system of Templarism.

The work is also a record of events in connection with the Orders, from those strenuous times to the present date, containing the proceedings of Triennial Encampments down to and including the 30th, at Saratoga in 1907. Some of these original proceedings are very scarce, and only to be found in rare collections.

Full art canvas No. 22811.....3.25
Library sheep. No. 22812.....3.50
Half American Russia. No. 22818.....3.75
Half American Morocco. No. 22813.....4.00
Full American Russia. No. 22819.....4.75
Full American Morocco. No. 22814.....5.00
Full Persian Morocco. No. 22817.....8.75

History of Freemasonry, A Concise. Robt. F. Gould. A most reliable comprehensive and valuable book. 559 pgs. 36 Columns of index. Nearly 200 illustrations, many of them beautiful half tone engravings. Cloth. No. 22771.....2.75
Library Sheep, No. 22772.....4.00
Half Morocco, No. 22773.....3.75
Full Morocco, No. 22774.....4.75
Levant Morocco, No. 22775.....8.50

Irish Prince and Hebrew Prophet, a Masonic Tale of the Captive Jews and the Ark of the Covenant. A most interesting book. By the author of "The Jericho Papers." 300 pgs., 6 x 9½, No. 23001.....1.50

Lexicon of Freemasonry, containing a definition of all its Communicable Terms, notices of its History, Traditions, and Antiquities, and an account of all the Rites and Mysteries of the Ancient World. A. G. Mackey, 526 pgs. No. 23161.....3.00

Lights and Shadows of the Mystic Tie. Consisting of absorbing Masonic tales—romantic, tragic and humorous; a few of which are: The Masonic Breastpin, a thrilling Indian story; Death on the Sierra Nevada; Catherine Williams or Husband and Wife; The Church Trial, or "Jynin," the Masons; Stone-Squarer's Lodge No. 91; The Broken Tessera; Three Buds of Sweet Briar; The Echo and the Flute; and more than a hundred other stories, sketches, anecdotes, opinions, songs and poems, illustrating the character and tendency of Freemasonry, including Robert Burns' Farewell to Masons. Rob. Morris and Albert G. Mackey. 624 pgs. illustrated, beautifully bound in blue and gold. No. 23181.... 2.50

Lodge Goat and Goat Rides, The. More than a thousand anecdotes, incidents and illustrations from the humorous side of Lodge life. Compiled and edited by James Pettibone. 600 pgs. Cloth. No. 23191.....1.50

Low Twelve. Edward S. Ellis, A. M. A book of thrilling and impressive stories of Masonic bravery and loyalty, told with that accuracy and charming style which has given Mr. Ellis such world-wide popularity. Half-tone Illustrations. No. 23221....1.50
Full Leather, a fine gift book. No. 23224.....2.50

Lost Word Found, The. "The most compelling bit of literature yet presented by Dr. Buck, and unlike anything ever written concerning the mystery of the Lost Word." J. D. Buck. 32°
No. 23196..... .50

Man of Mount Moriah, The. From Symbolism and Prophecy to Sacrifice and Fulfillment—a wonderfully interesting story of the Grand Architect at the Building of King Solomon's Temple. C. M. Boutelle. Beautifully illustrated, followed by forty pages of the best Masonic and O. E. S. poetry, including Esther, a sacred drama. 334 pgs. Edition after edition has been sold, which enables us to greatly increase the quality and style of the book for serviceable wear and richness of appearance. A choice gift book.
Half Morocco and full gilt. No. 23488.....4.00
Half Russia and full gilt. No. 23487.....3.60
Half Morocco, marble edge. No. 23483.....3.20
Half Russia, marble edge. No. 23486.....2.80
Full Cloth, marble edge. No. 23481.....2.40
Heavy Paper Sides, marble edge. No. 23485.....1.60

Masonic Gem. A collection of Masonic Odes, Poems, etc. A sketch of Esoteric and Exoteric Masonry. Rev. A. E. Alford. Illustrated. No. 23541.....50

Masonic Sketch Book, or Gleanings from the Harvest Field of Masonic Literature. By E. du Laurans. This book covers a great variety of subjects and includes some of the choicest work of our best Masonic writers, as well as many valuable and interesting articles by the author. Full gilt sides and edges. 345 pgs. 6 x 9 Illustrated. No. 23291.....2.00

Masonic Token. William T. Anderson. A gift book for all seasons. Full gilt sides and edges. Embellished with upwards of thirty illustrations, the letter-press being from the pens of a large number of our most gifted authors; especially intended for Masonic home reading. 289 pgs. No. 23311.....2.25

Memphis, Ancient and Primitive Rite. Origin, Introduction and Summary of the History; Excerpts from the Landmarks of the Order, Institution in America, Manifestos, Withdrawal from Orient of France, Treaty, Confederation, Present Status, Degrees, Seals, Emblems etc. J. A. Gotlieb M.A., M. D., L. L. D. No. 22821 1.00

Mission of Masonry, The. Rev. Madison C. Peters. Cloth. No. 23356.....50
Paper. No. 23360.....35

Morals and Dogma, Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite from the 1st, to 33d Degree, by Albert Pike, Grand Commander. This valuable work is the result of years of study, translations from ancient and modern languages, and thousands of dollars expenditure by the author. The Masonic and Theosophical student will find in it a mine of knowledge that can be found nowhere else, and heretofore within the reach of but few. The greatest book ever written or printed about Free Masonry. 861 pgs. 6½x9½. Cloth binding with gold stamps. No. 23361..... 5.25

Mystic Masonry. Explains the Symbols of Freemasonry and their connection with the Greater Mysteries of Antiquity, in which, for centuries, have been concealed the grandest achievements in knowledge ever gained by man, that, through the efforts of Freemasons, may be and are being understood and restored to the world. J. D. Buck, 32°. Illustrated. 260 pgs. No. 23421.... 1.50

Poetry of Freemasonry. Rob. Morris, L. L. D., Masonic Poet Laureate, with Portrait and Biography of the Author, by his son. Introduction by the Author, and his favorite poem—"We Meet Upon the Level, and Part Upon the Square"—in the original words and later changes, followed by over 500 poems, notes and illustrations, 400 pgs. Of finest book paper. Beautifully embossed cover, 8 x 10½ inches. No. 23281.....2.75
Gold and silver leaf stamping, gilt edges. No. 23285.....3.50

Rose Croix, The. A story of Two Hemispheres. A most interesting novel. David Tod Gilliam. 369 pgs. No. 23946.. 1.60

Rosicrucian Cosmo-Conception, The, or Christian Occult Science. An Elementary Treatise upon man's Past Evolution, Present Constitution and Future Development. By Max Heindel, who includes a note of thanks to Dr. Rudolf Steiner and Dr. Alma Von Brandis. "Prove all things."—Paul. 5½ x 7½ 536 pages 14 of Index, Color plate, Illustrations, Diagrams, etc. With Red under Gilt Edges, Green Cloth, Gold and Color Stamps. No. 23896 (A Master Work, worth many times its cost.).... 1.15

Rosicrucian Philosophy, The. In Questions and Answers. A Sequel to Cosmo—Conception. Life on Earth, Life after Death, Bible Teachings, Sayings of Christ, Phenomena, Initiation, Astrology—true and false, Prayer, Freewill, etc. Illustrated. Seven Days of Creation and the Four Great Initiations. Max Heindel. No. 24391.....1.15

Rosicrucians, Their Rites and Mysteries. Founded on their manifestoes, and on facts and documents collected from the writings of initiated brethren. Hargrave Jennings Illustrated. 464 pages. 6 x 9 No. 23881.....3.50

Sacred Mysteries. Freemasonry in times anterior to the Temple of Solomon. Relics of Mayas and Quiches, 11,500 years ago, their relation to the Sacred Mysteries of Egypt, Greece, Chaldea and India. Augustus Le Plongeon. No. 23956.....2.50

Scarlet Book of Freemasonry. Contains an authentic and thrilling history of the seizure, imprisonment and martyrdom of Free Masons and Knights Templar from A. D. 1275 to the present time; history of the life of the renowned philosopher, Pythagoras, his extraordinary career and tragic death; an account of the late remarkable discoveries of Masonic emblems under the pedestal of an ancient obelisk in Egypt, together with a case of recent persecution and death in that country; also an account of the recent discovery of an ancient temple in Mexico with Masonic emblems. Beautifully illustrated. 548 pages. 6½ x 9
In fine satin cloth and gilt. No. 23981.....3.00
Morocco, gilt edges, very rich. No. 23984.....4.00

Signet of King Solomon, or the Freemason's Daughter. A. C. Arnold. A charming and fascinating story of a "Knight of the Temple" in modern times. Beautifully illustrated. 288 pgs., 6 x 9½. No. 23976.....1.50

Signs and Symbols. Dr. George Oliver. Illustrated and explained in a series of twelve lectures. No. 23986.....1.50

Singular Story of Freemasonry, The. A most attractive concise and interesting little book. W. B Sibley. 4 x 6, 100 pgs. No. 23916.....75

Solomon's Temple. Its History and Structure. Rev. W. Shaw Caldecott, No. 24026.....2.50

Spirit of Freemasonry. Comprising Lectures on the State of Freemasonry in the Eighteenth Century, the Design, Rites, Ceremonies and Institutions of the Ancients, Nature of the Lodge, Furniture, Apparel and Jewels of Masons, Temple at Jerusalem Geometry, Master Mason's Order, Secrecy of Masons, Charity, Brotherly Love, Occupations, and a Corollary; followed by an Appendix containing Charges, Addresses and Orations on various Masonic occasions. William Hutchinson. With copious notes, critical and explanatory, of great value, by the Rev. George Oliver. No. 24021..... 1.50

Swedenborg Rite, and the Great Masonic Leaders of the Eighteenth Century. The Masonic career of Swedenborg and his followers, and the relation between the symbolic system of Swedenborgianism and Modern Freemasonry. Samuel Beswick. No. 24051..... 1.00

Symbolism of Freemasonry. Illustrating and Explaining its Science and Philosophy, its Legends, Myths and Symbols. Mackey. 360 pgs.. No. 24071..... 2.25

Symbol of Glory, showing the Object and End of Freemasonry, in a valedictory and thirteen lectures: Masonic Science, Poetry and Philosophy, Knowledge, Doctrines, Circle and Parallel Meaning, Great Lights, and Masonic Ladder, Theological Virtues and Masonry, Clouded Canopy and Ladder Symbols, Application, Blazing Star, Symbol of Glory, etc. Rev. George Oliver. 298 pgs., cloth, black and gold stamps. No. 24061..... 1.50

Tradition, Origin and Early History of Freemasonry. An elaborate account of the traditions which form the basis of the degrees in Freemasonry and their coincidence with the Ancient Mysteries; also the origin of the Society of Operative Masons and its transformation into a Speculative Fraternity; with a brief history of the Order, and its rituals and customs. By A. T. C. Pierson and Godfrey W. Steinbrenner. 540 pgs. 6½ x 9¼ Illustrated. No. 24213.....2.50

Washington and His Masonic Compeers. An interesting and reliable work, abounding in facts and incidents pertaining to Washington's Masonic life. A part of his history, entirely omitted by most of his biographers, brought to light by diligent research among the Masonic records and documents of the past century. Containing fine Masonic portrait of Washington and numerous other illustrations. No. 24301.....1.75

A SELECTED ASSORTMENT OF BOOKS

Historical, Fraternal, Symbolical, Mystic, Astrologic, Occult, Psychic, Spiritualistic, Optimistic, Philosophic, Masonic, New Thought, Etc.

Ahrinziman, The Strange Story of. As told by himself, after a period of over 2000 years; through the super-consciousness of Anita Silvani. The philosophy of this great Mystic and Persian Ruler, what Life hath taught him of the soul—on Earth, in the Abyss, and in the Heavens—A New Pilgrims Progress Arabian Nights, Paradise Lost, Wanderings in Spirit. and Paradise Won. Notes on Obsession and Mediumship. Preface by Frederick W. Thurstan, M. A. of Christ's College, Cambridge.

"To each one comes life's lesson in a different form: Let him that would learn the meaning of this story attend to these words that he may the better understand, and let him that is the idle hearer of a tale pass them by." Two volumes, combined in one book of 49 chapters. Illustrated with a portrait of Ahrinziman and a Vision in the Desert. 284 pages 5½ x 7½ No. 22026.....1.00

Altar in the Wilderness, The. In seven chapters—The Golden Age, The Exile, Life in Death, The Conflict. The Wilderness, Illumination, The Temple,—representing the Seven Spiritual Ages of Man. Ethelbert Johnson. Cloth, No. 24231,..... .50
Paper, No. 24235..... .25

Ben Hur, a Tale of the Christ. The Great Christian Drama Gen. Lew Wallace. No. 22076..... 1.50

Book of the Master, The. A clue to the mysterious religion of Ancient Egypt. W. Marsham Adams. Cloth, No. 22166... 1.25

Brotherhood. Nature's Law. Burcham Harding. No. 22176 .50

Brother of the Third Degree. An interesting and facinating story of the thrilling experiences of an earnest occult student on his way upward to those sublime heights of Universal Love and Devotion to Humanity, attained only by the true Initiates of the Great White Brotherhood—a vivid picture of life in the famous occult schools of Paris and the Far East; explaining much which has so long been veiled in mystery. W. L. Carver. 377 pages, Cloth. No. 22161..... 1.00

Constructive Psychology. The Constructive Principle of Character Building. Dr. J. D. Buck. 32° No. 22296..... 1.00

Culture of Concentration. Occult Powers and their acquirement. Wm. Q. Judge. No. 22266..... .10

Discovery of the Soul, The. Throwing light on the path of progressive man; leading through mysticism to the discovery of those unused powers within the soul, which duly appropriated give expression to the Divine in Man. Floyd B. Wilson. No. 22306..... 1.00

Harmonics of Evolution. This work marks out a new path in the treatment of the so-called Occult in Nature, attempting to explain rather than to mystify and to illustrate and elucidate the correlation of spiritual and physical forces in Nature. Florence Huntley. 463 pgs. No. 22716..... 2.00

Hermes and Plato. The mysteries of Egypt and of Eleusis. Edouard Shure. No. 22856..... 1.00

Initiation, The Way of, or How to Attain Knowledge of the Higher Worlds. Rudolf Steiner, Ph. D. Americanized from the translation by Max Gsyi. Notes by Edouard Schure. A most valuable and natural guide in a matter between you and yourself. New large type. No. 24276.....1.00

Initiation and its Results. Rudolf Steiner, Rh. D. A sequel to the Way of Initiation. These works in the plainest and clearest way, give more instruction in occult knowledge than any yet published. Mystics, and the Theosophic Press indorse them in the highest terms. New large type. No. 22976.....1.00

Initiation and Mysteries. Rudolf Steiner. No. 50910. 1.00

In Tune with the Infinite. Ralph Waldo Trine. Bound in Japanese style or special silk. No. 22996 ..... 1.25

Isis Unveiled. About 1500 pages. Portrait of the Author. H. P. Blavatsky. No. 23016 2 Vols. 6 x 9....4.00 and 7.00

Josephus. The authentic works and life of this great Jewish historian and celebrated warrior. Translated by Wm. Winston, M. A. 1055 pgs., attractively bound and illustrated. 7½x9½. No. 23061..... 1.75

Kingdom of Love, The. Henry Frank. Beautifully expressed, wholesome, helpful and inspiring essays. 245 pgs. No. 23086..... 1.00

Koran, The. Commonly called the Alkoran of Mohammed (the Mohammedian Bible). 559 pgs. No. 23071..... 1.50

Krishna and Orpheus, the Great Initiates of the East and West. Edouard Schure. No. 23106..... 1.25

Last Great Initiate, Jesus the. Edouard Schure. The Essenes, St. John, etc. No. 23056..... 1.00

Life and Writings of Dr. Rob't. Fludd, the English Rosicrucian. I. B. Craven. Cloth. No. 23286..... 2.50

Light on the Path. A treatise for the personal use of those who are unfamiliar with the Eastern Wisdom but desire to enter within its influence. C. M. Cloth. No 23166..... 50
Leather. No. 24167..... 75

Man Limitless. "A study of the possibilities of man when acting under infinite guidance with which he is in absolute touch." Floyd B. Wilson. No. 23531..... 1.25

Mastery of Mind in the Making of a Man, The. A searching analysis and exposition of the power of mind in body-building and the forming of personality. Henry Frank. 250 pgs. No. 23306..... 1.00

Myrtle Baldwin. A novel of great interest, especially to the Fraternity, as it is full of Masonic principles. Bro. Charles Clark Munn, author of The Hermet, etc. 510 pgs. 5¼x7½. Illustrated, green cloth, black and gold stamps. An excellent gift. No. 23586..... 1.50

Mystical Life of Ours, This. Ralph Waldo Trine. No. 24236..... 1.00

Occult Science in India, and among the Ancients, with an account of their Mystic Initiations and History of Spiritualism. Louis Jacolliot. Cloth. No. 23716..... 1.50

Occultist's Travels, An. Willy Reichel. Cloth. No. 23726..... 1.00

Paths to Power. "The struggling will gain strength—the doubting assurance—and the despairing hope, from this book." Fifteenth edition. Floyd B. Wilson. No. 23796..... 1.00

Philosophy of Fire, The. "There is nothing new under the sun." Fire Philosophy is the foundation of all True Initiation, and all Mystic and Occult Fraternities, as well as the Secret Doctrine and Ancient Mysteries. Atlantis, its Beauty, and its Fall. The Templars, and Fire Philosophers. The Therapeutae and Essenes and their Initiation. Second and very much enlarged edition, contains the Rosicrucian Fire Philosophy according to Jennings. R. S. Clymer. About 250 pgs. Silk Cloth. Symbol in gold. No. 23806..... 1.50

Pythagoras and the Delphic Mysteries. Edouard Schure. No. 23811..... 1.00

Queen Moo and the Egyptian Sphinx. A most interesting and valuable work—the result of extensive research among the ruined palaces, tombs and temples, and careful study of the signs, symbols and ancient manuscripts of the Mayas of prehistoric Yucatan; showing evidences of a civilization antedating, by centuries, that of the Eastern Hemisphere, and giving a reasonable solution of that mystery of the ages—the Origin and Meaning of the Egyptian Sphinx. Augustus Le Plongeon. Beautifully illustrated with full page half-tone prints, from photographs taken by the author while exploring those ancient remains. No. 23851. Reduced from the Authors price 6.00 to..... 4.75

Queen Moo's Talisman. The Fall of the Maya Empire. A beautiful Poem with Introduction and Explanatory Argument. Alice Le Plongeon. Profusely illustrated. Cloth. No. 23841..... 1.50

Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, The. With 12 full page illustrations in colors and tinted border designs, 6x9. Deckel edge, No. 23936 1.25. Watered Silk, No. 23940..... 2.00
Limp Leather, No. 23937..... 2.00

Secret Doctrine, The. The Synthesis of Science, Religion and Philosophy. 6 x 9 About 1500 pgs with Index. Vols. I and II No. 24066... 12.50 Vol. III No. 24067... 5.00

Secret Doctrine, Abridged. Hillard. No. 24031... 2.00

Sermon on the Mount, and other Extracts from the New Testament. A verbatim translation from the Greek with notes on the Mystical or Arcane Sense. James M. Pryse. Cloth. No. 24076..... .60

Servant in the House, The. A beautiful and uplifting drama of Brotherly Love Charles Rann Kennedy. No. 22966.... 1.25

Sixth and Seventh Books of Moses, The. The wonderful arts of the old wise Hebrews, taken from the Mosaic books of the Kabbalah and the Talmud, for the good of mankind. 100 pgs. Paper, No. 24040..... .75

Story of the Other Wise Man, The. A beautiful narrative. Henry Van Dyke. Exquisitely printed and bound. Cloth, No. 23961, .50. and Limp Leather. No. 23962..... 1.00

Temple, The. Its Ministry and Services at the Time of Jesus Christ. Rev. Dr. Eidersheim. 308 pgs. No. 24201..... 1.50

The Tabernacle. Its History and Structure. Rev. W. Shaw Caldecott. Cloth, 5¼ x 7½, 230 pgs. No. 24176.....1.75

Theosophy. An Introduction to the Supersensible Knowledge of the World and the Destination of Man, The Constitution of the Human Being, Re-Embodiment of the Spirit and Destiny. The Three Worlds, The Path of Knowledge. Translated from the German. No. 50665..... 1.00

Thoughts for the Occasion. A Manual of Historical Data and Facts, Helpful in Suggesting Themes and in Outlining Addresses for the Observance of Timely or Special Occasions of the Masonic, Odd Fellows and various other Orders. Compiled by Franklin Noble, D. D. 576 pgs. cloth. No. 24216.....2.00

Through Silence to Realization. This work embodies a system of instruction for mental growth and attainment of ideals. Floyd B. Wilson. 5½x7½. No. 24241..... 1.00

Voice of the Silence, and Other Chosen Fragments from the Book of the Golden Precepts for the Daily Use of Lanoos. H. P. Blavatsky. Cloth. No. 24266, .50. Leather. No. 24267 .75

W. J. COLVILLE'S BOOKS.

A Selection of the Most Popular Works by This Great Author and Well Known Lecturer in Europe, America, and Australia.

Ancient Mystery and Modern Revelation. A wonderful new work. By W. J. Colville.—The book, which is of considerable size, aims to introduce selected gems from Oriental literature together with philosophical interpretations of the most disputed Bible texts, and also presents highly condensed biographical accounts of the Esoteric Schools of Antiquity and the characteristics of their founders. To every liberal-minded Bible student and to all who are investigating the psychic problems of to-day the work as a whole must appeal as one of more than average interest. Cloth. No. 24346..... 1.00

Six copies to any single address on receipt of $5.00.

Auras and Colors. Four Lectures. W. J. Colville. Paper 25c
A full outline description of the Significance of Color and a clear explanation of the nature and development of the Human Aura.

Birthdays, The Significance of, or Our Place in the Universal Zodiac. W. J. Colville Cloth and Gilt. No. 22192 .75
Leatherette. No. 22191..... .50

Dashed Against the Rock. A scientific novel, illustrated with many remarkable diagrams. W. J. Colville. Cloth.
No. 22316..... .75

ESSAYS:

Concentration of Thought	22276	.10
Human Aura	50900	.10
Law of Attraction	50440	.10
Law of Success	50450	.10
Law of Suggestion	50455	.10
Sleep, Dreams and Visions	50460	.10
What is Genius	50465	.10
Words of Power	50445	.10

These Essays are on live topics very clearly setting forth practical mental methods for conquering obstacles and making the most of life generally..... .....any 3 of the above Essays for 25 Cents

Fate Mastered-Destiny Fulfilled. Three stirring essays on live issues. A very tasteful presentation volume. W. J. Colville.
Cloth: No. 22476..... .30

Glints of Wisdom, or Helpful Sayings for Busy Moments. Abstracts from Lectures by W. J. Colville. An encyclopedia of psychological laws contained in an endless variety of subjects.
Cloth No. 22671. .75. Paper No. 22675..... .30

Health from Knowledge; or the Law of Correspondences as Applied to Healing. W. J. Colville. Cloth, No. 22741 .75
Paper.....No. 22744..... .30

Life and Power from Within. An excellent book, embracing the most advanced mental-physical teaching and the simplest rules for the guidance of daily life, according to New Thought standards. W. J. Colville. Cloth. No. 23151..... 1.00

Living Decalogue, The. 12 Expository Lectures. W. J. Colville Leatherette. No. 23156..... .50

Lectures, by W. J. Colville, on various subjects: Atlantis, The Way of Initiation, Initiation and its Results. Symbolism—Its use and Value, etc. Send for list, each 10¢. 3 for..... .25

Mental Therapeutics, Elementary Text Book of. Twelve Practical Lessons. W. J. Colville. No. 22420..... .25

Old and New Psychology. Twenty-four chapters, including explanatory essays on many subjects of vital interest to all teachers and students. *W. J. Colville.*Cloth. No. 23766..... 1.00

Onesimus Templeton. A vivid romance, tracing the evolution of a soul from bondage to liberty. W. J. Colville. Cloth. No. 23771..... .50

Throne of Eden, The. Twenty-six chapters presenting important teachings entrusted to the writer's charge; also a record of extensive travel in the Southern Hemisphere; and a rational system of preventing as well as healing diseases. W. J. Colville. Cloth. No. 24186..... 1.00

Universal Spiritualism. Spirit Communion in all ages among all people. The work has two distinctive features: (1st) A resume of the Spiritual faith and practice of Egypt, India, Persia, Greece, Rome, China, Japan and other ancient nations, not excepting Europe, during Christian centuries. (2nd) A summary of recent experiences in America, Great Britain, Australia, France, Germany, Italy and other modern lands, all tending to show the persistent continuity of spiritual revelation. Clairvoyance, Telepathy and Psychic Phenomena in general are dealt with in separate chapters at the close of the volume, which extends to 352 pages, making it a highly useful text-book for all who are interested in the question of human immortality. W. J. Colville. Cloth. No. 24256..... 1.00

JAMES ALLEN'S BOOKS.

A Foreword. "I looked upon the world, and saw that it was shadowed by sorrow and scorched by the fierce fires of suffering. I looked for the cause, but could not find it until I looked within, and there found both the cause and the self-made nature of the cause. I looked again, deeper, and found the remedy I found one Law, the Law of Love; one Life, the Life of adjustment to that Law; one Truth, the Truth of a conquered mind and a quiet and obedient heart. And I dreamed of writing a book which should help men and women, rich or poor, learned or unlearned, worldly or unworldly, to find within themselves the source of all success, all happiness, all accomplishment, all truth: And the dream remained with me, and at last became substantial, and now I send it forth into the world on its mission of healing and blessedness, knowing that it cannot fail to reach the homes and hearts of those who are waiting and ready to receive it."

As a Man Thinketh. Inspiring and helpful "New Thought."

The Path of Prosperity. A way leading out of undesirable conditions to health, success, power, abounding happiness and the realization of prosperity.

Out from the Heart. Most optimistic and uplifting.

Entering the Kingdom. That heavenly kingdom within the heart of man, where perfect trust, knowledge, peace and love await all who will enter its Golden Gateways.

The Way of Peace. It's realization and attainment.

The Heavenly Life. How to attain its supreme happiness in this life, on this earth, here and now.

Morning and Evening Thoughts. Allen's rare jewels.

Through the Gate of Good. Leading from the complexities of ignorance and formalism to the joyful simplicity of Enlightenment and Faith.

Any of the above in either style of binding as follows:

Paper Covers, size 4¼x7¼	.15
Cloth Binding, " " " " " " " "	.50
Leather Binding, " " " " " " " "	.75
Watered Silk, " " " " " " " "	.75
Special Gift Editions, with colored borders, 5½x7¾, imbossed	.75

Life Triumphant. Man's Divine Destiny. Cloth. 1.00

From Poverty to Power. The Path of Prosperity and Way of Peace. The two books in 1 vol..... 1.00

Order and read one of the books—say The Path of Prosperity, and you'll ask the price per dozen, wanting all friends to have one.

In the Quarries.

There lie many gems of eloquence, many sparkling rays of genius, many practical thoughts and expressions, which if brought to the surface would prove of essential service to the Craft. These valuable treasures should not be left to lie in the rubbish and be covered with the dust of ages and forgotten. These writings of the wisest and best Masonic scholars, words of wisdom expressed by men of age and experience, ought to be garnered into storehouses where all can have access whence to draw "more light" to illuminate the pathway of the worker in the Masonic quarries. A library of rich treasures of Craft literature, would prove of essential benefit to the seeker after knowledge, and would be to him a school of instruction, whence he could derive inspiration as refreshing as that to the weary traveler who slakes his thirst at the fountain of sparkling waters.—Comps. George J. Gardner and Charles T. Mitchell.—Cor. Report Grand Chapter, New York, 1890.

Directions for Ordering.

Send Express or Post Office Money Order for the amount of your purchase, and the goods will be sent immediately, subject to approval. They can be exchanged or returned when your money will be refunded; or, by sending one-fourth of the amount, on deposit, they will be sent by express subject to inspection and approval. Or if desired for use on our Circulating Library Plan; send us the price of the book, and we will prepay postage to you. After reading return it to us carefully protected and we will return the money (except on paper bindings,) less the postage we have paid on it, and 10 % for the first month's use, and 5 % for each additional month. For further information regarding "Library Plan" see last page.

All goods are guaranteed to be as represented.

CIRCULATING LIBRARY.

(FREE READING) (HOME READING)

For our many readers, who have no room for a collection of books, yet wish to become conversant with Masonry, its Origin, History, Symbolism and Objects, or Theosophic, Mystic, Occult and New Thought literature, we have set aside several well filled cases, containing the latest and best, as well as many rare, old and out-of-print books, on these subjects.

We invite you to consult them freely at the library, without charge or to use them at your homes at the rate of ten per cent of their value for the first thirty days, and an additional five per cent for each month thereafter—which will cover the expense of wrapping, book-keeping, etc.—Thus, for a comparatively small item of cost you can add to your store of knowledge, for greater usefulness and personal enjoyment.

As time and carfare is an important item, you can order the books to be sent through the mail or express, by enclosing stamps or money order equaling their value, which will be refunded, less the percentage, when the books are returned.

Readers in any part of the United States can take advantage of the mail rates—Books—1/8 lb. for one cent,—which we advance by prepaying them to your express or post office, deducting the same when refunding balance.

To secure books on the Circulating Library Plan, order the books in the usual way, send Money Order equivalent to the value of the book and state that you wish them on the library plan.

Trusting you will find it convenient to make use of the books at the library or try a selection from the list for your evenings at home,

We are, yours fraternally,

Macoy Publishing & Masonic Supply Co.

45 John Street, New York, U. S. A.

In the clear unclouded skies of the East the ancient Chaldeans & Egyptians & the Semitic Race were the first to study the stars and note their motions. They formed the heavenly bodies into Constellations & gave them names. They distinguished the planets from the fixed stars and by keeping a record of the eclipses, were able to some extent to foretell their occurrence. It is probable also that they made use of their knowledge for the purposes of navigation. The Phoenicians & Arabians are said to have been proficient in the art of "night sailing" which probably meant steering by the stars. But the step that led towards the discovery of the laws regulating the motions of the heavenly bodies was not reached for the Sun & Planets. The earliest attempt at explanation of a knowledge of the spherical form of the earth, which is the first important astronomical fact attained by man is to be found in the books of Aristotle, 350 B.C. About 200 years later Hipparchus approached the true conception of Celestial Phenomena by resolving the apparent motions of the heavenly bodies into an assemblage of circular motions. But placing the earth in the centre of the universe, he failed to plant his foot on the next step to astronomical truth, which was not attained until after the lapse of 1800 years.

Ptolemaic System

Ptolemy is the next name of note that appears in the history of astronomy.

MACOY PUBLISHING AND MASONIC SUPPLY Co 45-47-49 JOHN ST. N.Y.

It arose about 150 A.D. and received distinct development in the Ptolemaic system which was [illegible] the Science, no further It was neglected, almost wholly until at the close of the 15th Century it was re-awakened by Copernicus

Copernicus System

He propounded, for the first time, the doctrine that the sun is the true centre of the celestial motions which theory established firmly and completely all the obvious stellar phenomena and forever extinguished the geocentric theory which had placed the earth in the centre of the universe. The system of Copernicus was confirmed by the telescopic discoveries of Galileo in 1609

viz:- The visible irregularities of the moon's surface, the moonlike phases of the planet Venus, the satellites of Jupiter and the rings of Saturn. Galileo was followed by

Kepler

who established that the distances periodical times and orbits of the celestial bodies that revolve about the Celestial dem[illegible] connected by numerical & geometric laws that prevail throughout the whole planetary system.

Sir Isaac Newton

Followed Galileo and Kepler by establishing by strict mathematical demonstration, the existence of the law which pervades the whole universe, binds the celestial bodies together, and reduces their motions to harmony and order. This is the law of gravitation by which all the particles of matter in existence, from the smallest pebble to the solar mass itself, gravitate towards each other with forces directly in proportion to their masses, and inversely as the squares of their distances
The simple proposition on which this grand discovery rested was, that the force which caused the apple to fall from the tree to the ground was the same force that retained the moon in her orbit, and guided the earth and all the planets in their elliptic courses round the sun. It was indisputably the most sublime & important physical discovery that has ever dawned on human intellect and was the means of transforming the whole of physical astronomy into a system of celestial mechanics. Since the development of this law by Newton, Lagrange and Laplace have applied & extended it by developing and demonstrating the elements of the stability of the planetary system."

"From the Chaldeans to the Greeks, from the Greeks to the Arabians, from the Arabians to modern Europe, from modern Europe to the world, this old star-lore of the East, with its grand mythography of animals and men and monsters, has been transmitted: and the science of to-day and to-morrow cannot cast the spotted skin of the past. The Zodiac is there with its bull and lion and virgin, and who shall ascend into heaven to take them down?"

Redfearn.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS
0 022 171 673 5

GLINTS OF WISDOM

W. J. COLVILLE

Class P

Book .J

Copyright No.

COPYRIGHT DEPOSIT.

GLINTS OF WISDOM

GLINTS OF WISDOM

OR

HELPFUL SAYINGS FOR BUSY MOMENTS

BEING

ABSTRACT FROM LECTURES

WITH

REFLECTIONS, STATEMENTS, MEDITATIONS, AND MOTTOES

BY

W. J. COLVILLE

AUTHOR OF

Health from Knowledge, Fate Mastered, Destiny Fulfilled, Life and Power from Within, Mental Therapeutics, The Living Decalogue, The Throne of Eden, Old and New Psychology, Dashed Against the Rock, Universal Spiritualism, Etc.

AN ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PSYCHOLOGICAL LAWS CONTAINED IN AN ENDLESS VARIETY OF SUBJECTS

MACOY PUBLISHING AND MASONIC SUPPLY CO.

NEW YORK, U. S. A.

BF1261
C12

Copyright 1910
BY MACOY PUBLISHING
AND
MASONIC SUPPLY CO.
45-47-49 JOHN ST.
New York, U. S. A.

©CLA265055

LIST OF SUBJECTS.

The Word	9
Thought	11
Knowledge	15
Cause and Effect	22
Limitation	29
Servility	32
Individuality	35
Mental Healing	41
Inversion	51
Liberalism	56
The Coming Religion	63
Alternative	64
Chastening	68
Persistence	71
Concentration	74
Destiny	78
Heredity	84
Specialty	86
Law of Attraction	89

Recognition of Qualification 94
Polarity 96
Harmonious Vibration 102
Telepathy 108
Correspondences 110
Association and Organization 112
Memory 113
Karma 115
Emanations 120
The Real Ego-Atma 125
Dreaming True 132
Psychical Unfoldment 140
Spiritism 150
Elective Affinity 154
Auras-Psychical Environment 156
List of Books 160

PREFACE.

THE shorthand notes from which this volume has been compiled were taken, and the transcription begun, with no thought beyond the personal benefit and satisfaction to be derived from their perusal from time to time.

As the work of copying advanced, however, the idea of sharing my valuable collection of beautiful truths with others who are in the pathway of the higher thought became an impelling motive.

While each excerpt is complete in itself, and the original intent was to cite them in the order reported from the lectures, yet, for the sake of convenient reference, they have been arranged as seemed suitable; the method of compilation and classification suggesting itself, and ultimately developing into the form here presented.

A helpful, inspiring motto may be found in nearly every citation; but the grouping of several at the close of each subject, it is hoped, may aid in securing that concentration which leads to healing and unfoldment.

So, with hopeful expectancy that these truths may indeed prove helpful Sayings for Leisure Moments, and that an acceptable and inspiring suggestion may appeal with strengthening influence to many, when in doubt, or disheartened—and believing it will meet with a warm welcome from those whose privilege it has been to listen to this gifted speaker—I affectionately offer this little volume to all who are of the brotherhood and sisterhood of Spiritual Science, and to all who seek to become familiar with its inspiring doctrine.

A. E. L.

NOTE.—The MS. of this work having been submitted to me for approval and correction, I have carefully revised it, and gladly pronounce it authentic.

W. J. COLVILLE.

THE WORD.

"In the beginning was the word." Words are necessarily forms for the expression of ideas. There is vastly more meaning in them than the majority of people attach to words.

A condition is made by the speaking of a word. The spoken words "I am glad," attract gladness. We can attract to us whatsoever we demand.

Whenever we wish a thing, we should voice it—just as a master calls a dog. Every person and every thing answers to his, her, or its name. Putting power on the basis of immutable law, we may call for what we wish.

Whatever we call upon in the universe answers the call. The statement "Wherever two or three are gathered together in My name [in the name of any good] there am I [the object sought] in the midst of them," is in accordance with the Law of Attraction. If gathered together in the name of Truth, there is Truth.

We are responsible for every word we speak; there is limitless power in the spoken word. Every word carries power and conviction with it. There is no chance, and there are no accidents.

"According to thy word be it unto thee." It is entirely woman's fault if man's estimate of her is low—it is woman's own opinion thrust back upon her.

It is absolutely necessary, in all teaching, to avoid using two words for the same thing, as words have widely different meanings.

MOTTO.

Every man is God's spoken word.

THOUGHT.

Thought is the magnet that attracts everything to itself.

Everything originates in the thought world. Every material thing springs from the mind of some individual.

We bring upon ourselves an immense amount of trouble because we act without thought; we take the consequences of our own ignorant actions.

People express what they express in consequence of their chronic habits of thought. We must learn to live always in the best and highest thought; to take note of our thoughts; to encourage only those thoughts which, when manifested in external forms, express in forms of beauty.

As every thought you think about yourself comes back to you, every time you call yourself "a poor creature," it will come back to you. The "worm" theology has made worms of vast numbers of people. "According to thy word, be it unto thee," is universally the case.

A great many people want to be well, but they do not wish to think along the lines that lead to health.

People want to be well, and at the same time they wish to be unmolested in their bad thoughts—their venom. They must either change their thoughts and get well, or they must hold the old thought and remain ill.

The mental healer needs to know what thought must be expressed in place of a thought that makes for illness. No one can be permanently cured by any external method. No one can be cured until the cause of disorder is removed.

"Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." We often hear the expression, "a speaking countenance." We can all read character when we become familiar with its signs. We know that, on the physical plane, there are healthy and unhealthy positions of the body; all that the mental healer declares is that on the subjective plane—where we are dealing with thought—there is a way to think that will produce health. When we think in the right way, we are well; and when we think in the wrong way, we are ill. Effect follows cause; our ignorance makes no difference with the law.

By holding to the ground that one is entitled to honest dealing, that he will be honest and demand honesty from others, people around him will be held in the thought of honesty; he will make for honesty in the community. If we hold people in the thought of dishonesty, we are making for dishonesty.

Whenever one holds the thought that people are going to do wrong things, he vitiates the atmosphere. The person who eggs another on to do a wrong is just as much to blame as the wrong-doer. These are the very hypocrites denounced by Christ. One who undertakes to pass judgment or condemnation upon his neighbor is a hypocrite. If one is easily influenced, the one who holds a wrong thought in regard to him helps to make him a wrong-doer.

Thought can be sent out into a room or any place. You can send into an apartment a helpful thought whenever you wish to do so—provided you have no doubt as to the matter.

Many people have been accused of plagiarism when they have only picked out of the atmosphere thoughts that have passed out from others. Our very thoughts —the very words we may be writing—can be taken up by other people in this way.

Everything readjusts itself; every thought we yield to reflects itself in our conditions.

A circumstance matters not at all to a person who recognizes the sovereignty of thought. Any place is a sanctuary where one's mental state is holy.

MEDITATION.

The more unfolded we are ourselves, the more good we must do, wherever we go and whatever we undertake. If the thought is right, good thought goes through the work—whatever the thing done, the worker makes the work sublime through his own high concept.

KNOWLEDGE.

What constitutes knowledge? Experience is an interior realization.

The intellect is subject to continual change.

The most that one knows is the limit of that person's present attainment. The limit of our attainment to-day is higher than it was in days gone by; but the limit of our attainment to-day is not the limit of our attainment for days to come. The order of development is first, animal instinct, next the intellectual, and then the higher spiritual qualities; our moral and spiritual attainments are superadded to the animal and intellectual.

Those who are now on the lower rungs of the ladder must live through different and higher expressions, either on this planet or elsewhere.

There are many persons to-day whose intellects are entirely superficial.

It is what you understand that is, practically, the reality so far as you are concerned.

The Book of Nature is open to every one who is willing to read it. Every one who is in the position to discover the truth, discovers it. No one can withhold from any one knowledge, when his condition fits him to receive it.

As the intellect expands, the universe becomes larger—seen through the expanding intellect. We do not bring new things into the universe, but we see things in a new way. There are multitudes of new things—from the standpoint of man's knowledge.

The spiritual method of arriving at knowledge is the very reverse of the material method.

The atmosphere holds everything that we want to know.

There are no secrets in the universe; every one can draw whatever he pleases, after he has learned the way.

There are no questionings of the human mind that are impertinent.

If God has any secrets which he doesn't desire to reveal to his children, then he does not endow his children with the desire to penetrate them. Where wrong comes in is stated in Genesis: The man and woman partook of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. So far as they partook of the good, so much the better for them; so far as they partook of the evil, so much the worse. Their motive was a mixed one when they sought knowledge.

Knowledge

Everything in this universe is open, unsealed. God has placed a veil over nothing. God is willing that every one should read the Book of Nature through and through, and come into the secret of creation itself. "Understandest thou what thou readest?"

Things are vastly more than they seem.

All our mistakes come from false conjecture; we conjecture something beyond what is evidenced to us. When our senses do not tell us enough, our conjectures and speculations produce false beliefs, which continue to hold us until apprehension of truth destroys them.

Nature never picks out any of her stitches! Never repents! Man's knowledge of the universe is progressive. Man makes mistakes; therefore, man has to alter his own work. Man's belief concerning the law changes; knowledge never changes. Knowledge increases; belief changes. Belief may be false; therefore, belief changes; but knowledge cannot change.

Man is neither omnipotent nor omniscent. There is no one altogether perfect except the Eternal Being, because no one but the Infinite can be perfect in knowledge; and it would be necessary to possess all knowledge in order to always do right. There is always the possibility of error as long as there is more for us to learn.

Nakedness signifies without experience. We are not desirous of going back again to any state of infancy which we have left. We cannot have innocence without ignorance, but we can have purity without ignorance. Innocence is the earliest, childlike state of ignorance. The pure in heart see God; but the merely innocent hear the Divine Voice, as it were from afar. As our ears unclose, the Divine Voice sounds nearer and nearer to us.

If our experiences were all equal, our knowledge would be equal, our power would be equal; knowledge gives power. With every fresh experience we gain knowledge; with every increase of strength we gain more freedom.

Our dead selves may be used as stepping-stones to higher development. We can look back and say, "I did make mistakes, but I am wise enough now to keep out of the trap." Many say, "If I could only live my life over again, how differently I would act." You will live your life over again—and act differently. You will be placed in different positions, where you will have the opportunities you wish.

Education is the unfolding of a faculty from within. Surroundings or environments have a part to play in education—the same as the elements have a part to perform in the development of a seed. A great deal can be done to hasten the process of gestation. You may improve the wild rose. You can, by education, develop more and more conscience, more and more reason, and perceive more and more of the Divine Light.

We frequently make mistakes (commonly called sins) because we are ignorant. When we take this ground, we have no difficulty in harmonizing apparent inconsistencies between desire and conduct.

Every truth is apprehended morally and mentally; those whose spiritual development is equal will apprehend the same truths in the same way, no matter how far apart they may be physically.

The knowledge of truth is universal and profound. We acquaint ourselves with facts according to our environments. The two opposing elements in education are tuition and intuition; tuition reveals facts, intuition reveals truths. Whatever relates to universal order or cosmic harmony, can be learned without books.

We are now looking forward to the time when knowledge shall become universal. Man's power extends—in harmony with law—vastly beyond what is ordinarily supposed.

The gift of wisdom is the gift of penetration; the gift of knowledge is that which enables people to pick up bits of information here and there; people who have it are versatile. The one who has the gift of knowledge is only an assistant to one who has the gift of wisdom.

One having wisdom is able to arrive at conclusions by intuition, to penetrate to the very root of a matter —not necessarily learned, wise by intuition. Wisdom and knowledge are not synonymous terms. Knowledge may be the result of a good, retentive memory; wisdom is gained by direct spiritual perception, an interior perception able to lay hold of direct spiritual illumination.

There are two classes of teachers in the world today: rationalists and intuitionalists.

REFLECTION.

The "Philosopher's stone" means wisdom. It is the knowledge of the law.

Belief is voluntary. One can hold in thought or belief whatever one pleases, in regard to anything or anybody. Belief and knowledge are not the same. If we absolutely know anything, that is more than belief. Wherever there is knowledge or demonstration, there is no further need for belief at all.

MOTTO.

The human soul attains through effort.

MEDITATION.

On every plane man can learn more and more. We are never called upon to shift our basis, but should be open to every phase of knowledge. Develop broadly —on different planes. If we only believe a thing, our belief may change at any time; but our knowledge is forever.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.

Everything—no matter how great or how small in man's opinion—is the result of law. Man is the expression of the law. We are not creatures—not servants—but children of God.

It is impossible to do anything outside of universal law.

Many do not know the difference between what makes for satisfaction, and what makes for dissatisfaction.

As long as people live on a low plane of morality, they will have all the ills that arise from sensuality, from worry, from all irregularities.

For every effect there must be a sufficient cause. We do not call every cause a reason.

We should not say that all persons who appear ill are suffering the results of sin in the theological sense, though all sick people are sinners in the philosophical sense. A mistake has been made by some one, and the result has brought about a condition which is a penalty, though not in the punitive sense. There is no punishment for error, but there must be a penalty.

If people admit that all the suffering and sorrow in the world is the result of God's anger, they can never hope to avert it, unless by some miracle.

The statement, "Whatever is is right" should be, "Whatever must be is right"—whatever is in the law of necessity, the unchangeable effect of the unchangeable cause. An unchangeable cause must produce an unchangeable effect. We must aspire in order to inspire.

People would never suffer if they never needed to suffer—if they never brought suffering upon themselves. We do not overcome pain and suffering simply by denying its existence. All disorder is mental; the physical effect is only the result of a mental cause. No one can alter the relation between cause and effect.

Every thought produces a decided effect upon the thinker; and not only does it produce an effect upon the thinker, but also upon all those who yield to its influence consciously or unconsciously.

We do not advocate dealing arbitrarily with individual cases. There is one Universal Law, which can be expounded for all mankind. Every one can be well—can be happy—can be successful. The law is absolutely universal. There is no reason, though undoubtedly a cause for people being ill, unhappy, or in any way distressed.

We teach most positively that every one is held in bondage to the law he makes for his own government. Laws will never relax their hold until the framers of the laws give them up. You bind yourself by your own laws. What we need to realize is, that all laws which can be broken, had better be broken; the only law which cannot be broken is the Law of the Universe. To break divine law is the only thing you cannot do. If you have a headache it is not because you have broken the law, but because you cannot break a law of Nature. Nobody ever breaks the law, because the law cannot be broken. The relation between cause and effect is unchangeable.

There is no such thing as accident; everything is traceable to cause and effect.

We do not admit physical causation, any more than the Christian Scientists do. We admit physical effects, but we do not allow that the body is its own cause. We do not admit that a pathological condition is the result of physical causation. All causation is mental. There is no physical causation, but there are physical effects.

There is always a mental cause back of the effect. What is cause? The mental habit, the tendency, the disposition of the mind; these are to be healed. What people commonly call disease in the body, we call the effect of disease in the thought.

The world is in hysterics. Why? Because of the false standards of justice and morality prevailing everywhere.

A sensation is an effect, and necessarily of something back of it which produces it.

Be moderate in all things! Whatever is natural and spontaneous gives satisfaction. There should be no satiety, but continual satisfaction, on the lower plane; till that which is higher and comes later, transfers desire to another region in consciousness.

We are often too ignorant to know the relation between causes and their effects; therefore we are surprised at our experiences and find them for a while incomprehensible.

There is no special Providence, but there is a universal Divine Providence. The one Divine Law regulates all things, from stars to smallest atoms. The same law governs in the least as in the greatest.

Nothing in the universe transpires except in accordance with a fixed law. Divine operation continues through the operation of natural law. God could not change the law of the universe without changing himself. The law is the expression of the law-giver.

The effect cannot be unlike the cause; unchangeable cause produces unchangeable effect. All human ordinances are subject to change; not only to progress, but to alteration. When we know a thing, we know it forever. The opportunity for progress is in the natural, inevitable order of things. The element of change—alteration—proves that man not only knows too little, not only knows now far less than he will know, but makes mistakes and blunders. He does work that he will have to undo, because he often works blindly.

We often have to pay the penalty, in our own persons, of what we call others to account for.

Neurasthenia—the gradual wasting away of the nervous tissue—is the popular ailment of the present age. Hysteria is just as common with men as with women. Neurasthenia does not appertain to one sex more than another, nor to one age more than another, it is to be found in all periods of life, and in all occupations.

These ailments—hysteria, neurasthenia, impairing and general wasting away of tissue—are not due to over-work; they are only due to worry. A great many people are over-worried, not over-worked. The antidotes to all these disorders are purely mental.

If you do, in a normal condition, as much work as it is right for you to do, you will fall asleep, and sleep as long as it is good for you to sleep.

Worry is nothing but hysteria! We destroy brain tissue by worrying.

We never knew a strong person who was always in a hurry, and we never knew a successful person who was always in a hurry; people whose experiences are like a see-saw are mentally unbalanced.

Watches are usually too fast when in the pockets of hysterical people.

In consequence of certain things being as they are, certain results will follow. Change the cause; trouble yourself not with the effect, and the effect will take care of itself.

AFFIRMATION.

There are no accidents. Nothing ever occurs by chance. There must be a sufficient cause for every effect. Everything takes place according to law.

MEDITATION.

Not only oil, but soapsuds, will calm the troubled sea. We can increasingly discover the Law of the Universe, though none can change its immutable decrees. One element neutralizes the rage of another. The way of discovery is open to every individual.

MEDITATION.

The irritability of the human invalid and of weak little dogs is proverbial. The strongest men and also animals are always good-natured. But turn to some one of rather less than average intelligence or strength, and you will find a person who resembles a little snapping cur, instead of a noble, powerful mastiff. Little creatures who feel their absence of power, but would like to assume a power they do not possess, are like little barking, snapping dogs contrasted with the finest canines.

LIMITATION.

Deny all limitations; there are no limitations, per se. Unless we take this ground, we shall never succeed in our effort for health on any plane, in any direction.

When we get beyond all sense of limitation, we can have just as much as we desire to attract. There is a universal supply. Nature is so bountiful that all can have as much as they can hold.

You wish to overcome a limitation—then you will to actualize the very opposite of what you are now doing. You must let your will work quietly, and bring your recognition into harmony with your will by acknowledging your ability to accomplish whatsoever you desire.

While our goal is to be entirely superior to circumstances, we are not entirely superior to them until we have grown to a highly developed state. We can grow to absolute control over circumstances. This is not yet generally attained; it is the ideal.

To be able to control all circumstances is an evidence of very high moral development. One not so highly developed will succumb occasionally.

When you depend for happiness upon anything, you make it a necessity. As you make it a necessity, so it is necessary to you. The person who says he cannot do without this or that, allows it to become a necessity to him. You say you cannot get any information except from books; very well, you have made that a law. "According to thy word, be it unto thee." If we did not make laws for our own bondage, we could get all needed knowledge psychically. It is just so with every limitation under which we groan. We have made the limits, and now we must break away from our limitations.

We maintain that all those limitations which people make for themselves are entirely unnecessary, and should be overcome. The mistake is in thinking that they can only get the blessings they desire through a prescribed media. People must realize that according to their word, it is unto them. The ministration of second causes is not to be denied; effects are produced through many agencies; the power of external suggestion is not to be denied—up to a certain point —but the sooner we grow above this the better.

Everything that is external keeps you in a certain groove; and as long as you are in a groove you can never attain true development. If you will be bold enough to step out of all ruts, whatever you need will come to you. Develop!

There are virtuous people so stale and monotonous that they rise to a certain height, and never go above it; you know you will never have a surprise from them. But take a person who is in any sense outside the ordinary limit—you never know what is coming; there is something pleasurable in that kind of uncertainty, for it savors of progression.

If you are going to place a limit anywhere, you are not open to a revelation from the universal Spirit of Truth—if there is any line beyond which you may not pass. Just as long as you say "Of course, there's a limit," you are limited by that thought; and you cannot go out into any larger and higher thing as long as your own word confines you to that smaller thing.

The age of man should be at least one hundred and twenty years. It takes about twenty years for the human animal to reach maturity, and he should live, after that, five times as long as the period taken to mature. This is the least we have reason to expect; the greater duration of man's terrestrial existence when he has transcended the animal within him is illimitable.

REFLECTION.

The word "only" should be struck out of our vocabulary; it signifies limitation. We find ourselves at war with all limitation immediately we place confidence in Omnipotent Spirit.

SERVILITY.

The weaker people are, the more easily they can be influenced in any direction.

It is intellectual laziness and servility that lead to so many of the ailments of the present time. It is the combination of servility and laziness that produces all the ailments extant; we may add one other cause, anger. To get rid of all these, we must get rid of all limitations; to get rid of all anger, get rid of all fear, get rid of all laziness, get rid of all mental as well as physical servility. Fears manifest themselves in disorder. Anger, fear, servility, laziness—four demons.

When we have got rid of these four, we have become well. We can then read Nature's book without a hindrance.

It is the right and privilege of every person to be healthy, and it is equally the privilege of every person to be free. How many free people are there to-day? How can we expect health in captivity?

Belief hampers many people to such an extent that they are bedridden, because they believe in that condition. Their thoughts are so crippled that they have not liberty to move their bodies.

Servility

The majority of people to-day cannot account for their diseases, for the reason that they take upon themselves the conditions of people around them; and this is because of their mental servility.

Every blind following of a fashion or custom means vastly more to the mental scientist than it does to the physicist. The mental condition of which such an act is an expression matters greatly. We do not mean, as metaphysicians, exactly what we say, when we object to the wearing of a certain hat; but the mental condition, of which the hat is the expression, is what we care about. It is not the articles of clothing, but the mental servility which makes such clothing worn which can hold people in bondage.

The person who wears anything he doesn't like becomes ill through the mental condition which caused him to wear it.

When people do not dare to live up to their own honest convictions, they break the first commandment of the Decalogue.

We must not wear intellectual corsets and tight shoes, if we wish to become psychically liberated.

Many women permit themselves to become psychologized by their husbands. No one need be in any kind of bondage to another. The moment the soul asserts its own freedom, it need never be under the control of any one—in heaven or earth—No one is free until he is self-emancipated.

REFLECTION.

If we are in free thought, we shall enjoy free breath. All disorders, such as bronchial troubles, proceed from some bondage in thought.

INDIVIDUALITY.

Our individuality expresses itself through our personality.

You are the same individual, but you are not the same person that you were a year ago. We are new people in old situations.

The people with whom we associate—why should we expect them to be the same in the new year as they were in the old? They have undergone necessary experiences; they are not the same people; they are what they were then, plus what they have gained. Do not feel that you have to deal with the same old people, in the same old way.

We overcome personal limitation by discovering our spiritual individuality.

The personal man comes from the dust of the ground. The Lord God is the spiritual man. The personal man is the copy of the individual man. We body forth our desires. The process of embodying is the process of showing forth what is contained in the original. Individualization is absolutely necessary in the copy.

Physical attitudes are results of mental attitudes. People's voices show their mental conditions. One's movements show individuality—or the lack of it.

The question often arises, "How is it that so many seemingly good people are not well?" Until we have become individualized—have obtained control of all our hidden chambers—we cannot be free; therefore we cannot be well at all times, for we lack the requisite understanding.

People who are simply agnostic, or sceptical, are shallow; they may be perfectly sincere, but never profound.

The materialist is a simpleton, though he may be quite sincere.

The trouble is in our not thinking rightly of ourselves and others; we are not sufficiently independent and individualized. That false humility which makes us think others better than ourselves is as detestable in the light of science as the stupid pride which is the other extreme.

What is needed to-day is an adventurous soul that will break the bonds of all conventionality.

Perfect individualization is necessary to the highest morality as well as health. There is no morality in injustice; where there is no justice, there is no morality.

It is the woman who has to do with the little infant. The great thing for woman to do to-day is to hold herself in respect, in the silence, as well as in the spoken word. Woman's power psychically is far greater than her power physically.

Woman holds an enormous spiritual power, of which she is for the most part unaware.

When people are tempted and tried, what does it mean? It means that they are upon their metal. They are being tested. Thus, character is developed. If you could always see the Divine countenance, then you would be less than a hero. Stand upon your own metal, and reach the point where conscience becomes an infallible guide. Everything that puts people upon their own footing is of the utmost value to them.

Every individual must come into a conscious knowledge of how to regulate his own life. As long as we depend upon other people, we do not decide for ourselves, therefore we cannot become individualized.

Man must dominate the earth as represented within himself, before he can dominate the earth around him. Man can rise entirely superior to all the lower influences around him, but only by first gaining the needed victory within his own economy.

We are capable of unfolding the Divine within us, because we have it to unfold. Man is a spiritual entity here and now. Man's body is his own; he claims the right of ownership. Is it right for the master—the spirit—to control the flesh? or, is it right for the flesh to dominate the spirit?

It is our individuality that needs to be recognized. To do this is where people fail so lamentably.

The greater the manifestation of life, the nobler the form appears.

It is absolutely necessary to have a form as a means of expression on any plane. When we no longer have the physical body, we shall sustain the psychical body—in its own way. We can only build up the physical body in a psychical way.

This physical body must be perfected before we exchange it for a higher body.

To have a body that would serve the spirit perfectly, would be to have a body volatile—a body that would come and go at will—not a body of bones and sinews, flesh and blood.

The psychic body can be made perfectly tractable —becoming visible and invisible, at will—A body entirely under the control of the will of its owner can be materialized or dematerialized at its owner's pleasure.

Individuality

The difference between one form of life and another is that one expresses more life than another. It is only a question of the lesser and the greater that decides the value of expression.

Every one who believes in an angry God worships not the Divinity within him, but the animality.

What people call rebellion against God is really a phase in the development of their lives. All the records of the fall of man and God's consequent anger are falsely interpreted, owing to our ignorance. God has always been looking on man with perfect complaisance, satisfied with his own work.

Lucifer, according to Milton's "Paradise Lost," says, "I had rather rule in Hell than serve in Heaven"; and the opportunity was given him. The fall of Lucifer represents the human soul falling into the kingdom of materiality, developing its own self-consciousness, and determining to reign in its own kingdom. We do not believe that man ever fell in a manner to offend God.

Man, before the fall, according to the spiritual theory, lived in a natal paradise. The soul, in that primeval paradise, was perfectly conscious, but not self-conscious; we must discriminate between consciousness and self-consciousness. When we add self-consciousness to consciousness, self-consciousness is a desirable acquisition; the simple consciousness remains, but the self-consciousness being added, we are not content to know that we are alive, but ask why we live, and what we are living for.

The account of Jesus putting the little child in the midst of the people illustrates this. The child is an interrogation-point, a query. The child is determined to develop self-consciousness.

The little child is a symbol of the individual first awakening to self-consciousness.

INTERROGATION.

Our individuality persists now, in spite of all the changes of the body. Why should it be destroyed when we lay off this body?

MOTTO.

Character is something one has to develop within himself. A reputation may be bought; a character must be earned.

MEDITATION.

If you are worthy of a recommendation, you do not need one; if you want one you are not worth it.

MOTTO.

One cannot make a decided impression when he himself is undecided.

MENTAL HEALING.

Metaphysical means beyond the physical. There could not be a metaphysical if there were no physical. There must be a physical to admit of a metaphysical.

He is a metaphysician who goes all the way the physicist may go, and then transcends this limit.

What is mental healing? Mental healing is accomplished educationally. You can overcome whatever you will to overcome; there are no limitations that can hold you any longer than you are passive to be held by them. It is not the will of the people that we have to change in metaphysical healing, so much as to enlarge their understanding. Just so long as people believe that they have to be unfortunate, they will not succeed. There must be co-operation of the will with the understanding. A very necessary mental attitude to take when giving a treatment is, that unless you admit that you have the power to do anything, you cannot do it. In giving a mental treatment, you must admit that your patient has both the will and the power to express the state he desires to manifest.

In treating one's self, let the will alone, but appeal to the intellect. Come to realize that all good will can be called into effect.

All pathological conditions are abnormal. We allow no place for unhappiness, no place for failure; these are abortions, not necessary to the complete work of Nature. No one need be ill, no one need be unhappy, no one need fail; there need be no disorder in the world; these are entirely unnecessary.

Society is a sick man, and you have to treat society —just as you would an individual. How shall you prescribe for it?

You must take people as you find them; but do not leave them as you found them. Your influence must be to lift the world to a state that it was not in when you found it.

One who has more than ordinary access to the unseen realm can help others—on their own plane; and then, just as you take your children and educate them, you take grown people along. Make any present "craze" or "fad"—if people choose to call it so—a means of taking people along acknowledged paths to something higher—to the discovery of the soul.

The true idea of mental healing is that one can help another into similar harmonious relation with the universal supply.

A great many things are spoken of in the plural; but the intelligent mental healer is one who endeavors to bring everything to a point of unity. There are many expressions of one universal and entire interest. Human nature is in all respects a unit; all the interests of mankind are positively one.

The word "healing" means, properly, "making whole."

We meet many people who were born feeble, both physically and mentally. When metaphysical healing was first presented to the public, we heard much of people applying to be cured of various complaints and diseases; and they talked about "mind cure." Mind cure might mean the healing of the mind when feeble. But metaphysical healing includes every branch of therapeutic practice; there is no possible ailment, or lack of health, which it does not undertake to cure or supply, as the case may be. It rests upon only one basis, man's ability to rise above every conceivable limitation.

Every treatment that you give, that is given wisely and well, is in recognition of a state not yet attained, but which can be attained—and the more easily with your aid.

All negative processes—all processes that aim simply at eviction of disorder—are on the wrong side.

The true metaphysical healer does not undertake to fight disease. As we claim that the condition of the flesh is due to the condition of the blood, and the condition of the blood is due to the condition of the thought, it follows that if the thought be pure, the blood will be pure and ultimately the flesh likewise.

It is affirmed by many talented physicians that all disorders proceed from derangement of the lymph or the blood.

People cannot avail themselves of the benefit expected from outward conditions unless in a mental condition to receive benefit.

Send out a thought which will place before the mental eye of the student or patient a state which expresses what you and he alike wish to see expressed.

We do not apply mental healing to physical disease, but to the mental disease which produces the physical effect. No intelligent mental healer ever attempts to treat people's bodies with his mind, but to instruct them by a mental process in the science of so thinking that their bodies must express outwardly the harmony which is within.

We cannot successfully treat any part of the body alone; treat the body as a whole, through the mind.

Our contention has always been against specialism in metaphysical treatment, because every part of the body is related vitally with the whole. No matter what the malady, you must deal with the human organism as a whole. No one can intelligently deal with any part of the body without dealing with the whole organism of which the organ is a part.

Do not treat, in any sense whatever, with a disease; never deal with an eye, or an ear, or an organ, as a part; but with the whole system, which includes the seat of the abnormal function.

There is no occasion for any quarrel between physicians and metaphysicians; the one is dealing with a physical, the other with a mental condition. While the metaphysician is dealing with our thoughts, the physician is dealing with our physical systems.

There is not anything like the fanaticism in the medical profession that is supposed to exist. Many in it are acting in accordance with their best light.

The regular physicians—many of them—are thorough metaphysicians; a great many of them are true psychical healers.

In metaphysics, the apparent evil is not called a disease, but the result, the effect of a disease—mental; in physics, it is called a disease.

We deny that any disease is physical, but we do not deny the physical effects of disease. We say that discord is mental; all disease is mental. But just as you might say, from a physical standpoint, that the disease is physical and produces mental effects, we say that disease is mental and produces physical effects.

One tumor may be removed; then another forms, another, and still another. Why? Because the method of cure is entirely false; the reasoning is false; the disease is mental, and the tumor is its consequence. if you remove that physical effect or consequence, you are not destroying the disease, any more than you are destroying the hair by shaving. As long as the root remains—which is the mental condition of the patient —so long the liability or susceptibility remains; there is, therefore, no guarantee or security of any sort that there will not be a relapse, and that the last state of that patient may not be worse than the first.

We should not undertake to cure by attacking disease. Never oppose any disorder as such, but undertake to invigorate the system, so as to effect a harmony that will expel the fruits of any disorder already in the system.

Let us consider the utter fallacy of seeking to turn out a disease. If you undertake to fight a disease, and you overcome it as if it were an entity, you turn one devil out; and, as in the case of the event recorded in the Bible, into the man out of whom one devil was driven, seven others entered, so that the last state of that man was worse than the first, so many other devils—or diseases—come in to take the place of those expelled. The vacuum left by turning out one devil opens the way for more to enter.

The true spiritual scientist is not chiefly interested in mere recovery or restitution, but in helping onward the individual treated to a higher plane than he had ever previously reached.

As we develop on to higher planes, we cannot be susceptible to disorders as we were on lower planes.

Quite a few mental healers do a great deal of injury, both to themselves and their patients, by false beliefs of their own.

The cause of our illness may be our false belief in regard to the thoughts of people around us toward ourselves.

If you have any ill-feeling toward any one, you deserve to be ill.

You cannot enter into heavenly societies when you are out of love to your neighbor. If there is any hatred in your heart toward any being, you will be ill—and you need the illness.

There are two distinct factors in healing: first, the knowledge of what to do; second, the doing of what is necessary to be done.

If we have not clear knowledge, it is hit or miss with us; sometimes we succeed, and sometimes we fail.

What has produced a cure in days of old will always produce a cure in days to come.

The word and faith cured people of old, and the same word with faith cures people now. "According to thy word be it unto thee" holds good still. But the people have walked in ignorance, regardless of the power displayed in the undeviating working of Nature's law.

We must look for the common ground of healing methods; underneath all superstructures there is the same foundation; that foundation is, that there is a law of health in the universe; and when the way is opened, vital power will rush in.

A great many people would rather pay a large bill for the privilege of swallowing medicine, than a small bill for instruction. This is intellectual laziness.

There is no more disgusting work than trying to probe out disease. The worst work ever done by mental healers is trying to diagnose sickness. It is a remnant of the old methods; it is not yours if your methods are spiritual or metaphysical. What people call disease is an effect or result of disease. If people say their eyes are dim, that is not a disease; it is the expression of a mental state of dimness. We should not care to know what people commonly call disease, because what they call disease is only the effect of disease. We care far more for the physician who tells us how to get out of difficulty than for the one who diagnoses the disease.

A good Chinese idea of the province of a doctor is to pay him while the people are well, instead of when ill. The true mission of the doctor should be to keep people well, not chiefly to cure them when sick.

All the best teachers to-day, who are undertaking to heal the sick, are steering clear of the old saying that people are not suffering pain. They admit that pains and sufferings exist, but claim that they are only temporal and they are remedial. Just as soon as we discover the law, and obey all its precepts, we shall suffer not one more twinge of pain—not one more pang of sorrow.

Our senses are not false witnesses when normal, but they testify inadequately. We treat our senses as we would witnesses on the stand; some can throw but little light on the matter, others have more important testimony to offer. We have to employ our intellect—our reason—to help out the testimony of the senses. We hold that all the senses of man bring in a limited amount of testimony, but the bulk is inadequate.

A well-ordered life gives the greatest attention to the vital organs; and mental healing will affect lungs and heart when it will not touch the hair, because treatment goes to the centre of the organism. Hair is only a covering and an ornament. What is most vital and internal builds up first, and then the spare force goes to the integuments.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

The spiritual gift of healing is like unto a vase of roses—imparting fragrance to the atmosphere of a room.

MEDITATION.

In mental treatment we can reach the internal organs long before we can reach the skin, because all expression is from within outward.

The greatest mistake is in thinking to change anything on the outside; we cannot change things from the outside, but must always work from within outward.

Do not treat people only, but treat places. Leave your best thought everywhere. When you leave your helpful thought, you leave a rich blessing.

INVERSION.

The present disordered state of society is shown by the language of the people.

All error and seeming evil should be regarded as inversion—like an angel standing on his head; as illustrated by Swedenborg, in his description of the "celestial" and the "infernal" standing feet to feet; the celestial standing upright, the infernal showing the inversion. All disorders are inversions.

Things are not good and evil in themselves; things only appear evil when inverted or distorted. Everything, when known for what it is, is assuredly good.

As man has within himself the divine element, so he has also the element of animality within him; and sometimes, he yields to the temptation of the lower, which endeavors to dominate the higher; then he experiences evil. When he gives place to the highest within him, he knows only good. Very seldom do we strike the golden chord of love to all mankind. At one time, we are extremely altruistic; at another, intensely egotistic. We are thus always contending between emotions; we are between two fires, listening to two voices. We hear the voice of God, and the voice of the serpent. When we try to obey the two, we produce confusion.

"Man shall not live by bread alone!" To merely gratify the animal propensities is to live a starved life. When the soul is starved, the body gets starved. Unfed conditions of the soul produce wasting diseases, nervous debility, anæmia. The only way to conquer all this is to realize that the soul gets hungry; the soul calls out for its dinner. You are feeding your bodies all the time and often starving your souls. When we come into harmony, we feed the soul, and thus allow the soul its fair opportunity to regulate the body.

A great many people honestly entertain the fallacy that if they were to be thoroughly honest in their business dealings, they would have to starve. Starvation or dishonesty is not the alternative. We can carry out the Golden Rule in our business and social relations, and be splendid social and business successes. We do not say you can become a-several-times-millionaire and do it; but you can be in perfectly comfortable circumstances.

It is not what a person believes, or what a person intellectually adheres to or perceives, but whether the mental window is open or closed. Health is the normal, disease an abnormal condition; instead of health being a rare acquisition, or very hard to maintain, we find that animals—except in captivity—enjoy perfect health. An animal in captivity is in an abnormal state, and hence, subject to illnesses unknown in the natural state. We find birds ill, in cages; but we have no reason for inferring that the same birds would be subject to such ailments if free, in their natural condition.

Natural instinct belongs to man as well as to animals; if we did not deny our normal instincts, we would be well.

The health of civilized communities is vastly lower than it is in savage states. But the theory that the more highly intellectual people become, the poorer their health, is to be denied, except as methods of culture may be artificial and unnatural. If every faculty of mind and body is strained to the utmost, if nearly all the measures resorted to are abnormal, it is not physiology, it is pathology that is accountable for an enfeebled condition.

Education is conducive to health and strength. Health is the normal play of all the faculties, and education is a delightful stimulus to all the organism.

The natural, normal life, is a life where everything is beautiful. So far as beauty is concerned, it is a means of grace. Beautiful form and beautiful color may be regarded as steps toward Heaven—Heaven is altogether beautiful. There is nothing conducive to spiritual growth in wearing ugly clothing, or in being plain and unattractive, or in living upon poor food.

Anything obtained without doing any injury to others is perfectly right—speaking of the accumulation of property. We do not for one moment believe that it is wrong to appropriate the beauties of the earth; the error is in placing them in a false position.

MOTTO.

Never dissociate the secular from the sacred. Sanctify the secular, but do not desecrate the sacred. In order to be spiritual we do not have to give up anything; but we do have to fit the conduct of life to the truth.

MEDITATION.

You cannot have too much of a good thing. Only a thing that is itself an inversion creates an abnormal craving. That is the rule in all spiritual, artistic, musical and other desirable pursuits.

REFLECTION.

There must be a place for everything, and everything must be in its right place—for perfect harmony.

Inversion

When a thing is not in its own place it is evil in appearance—not in reality. Disorder is an inversion. There is no unhappiness, no pain, that is not due to inversion. The cure for ignorance is always more knowledge.

There is a divinity in things seemingly evil. Evil is a question of undue proportion. We shall understand this when we learn that evil is not real but is simply disorder.

LIBERALISM.

There is a central spiritual philosophy upon which all the religions in the world rest.

People mistake fractions for the whole; that is the cause of all the discord in regard to the different schools of science. All sciences are fractional expressions of one Universal Science. The fractional statements which we continually hear may be resolved into one, by concentration upon the idea of Universal Truth.

One of the most pitiable sights in the world is that of people trying to find wherein they disagree, instead of trying to find their points of cantact. Humanity would be saved if every one would only give up his label or his tag.

Whatever makes for harmony makes for health. As long as we have any prejudices or antipathies, we shall be ill. We cannot be well until these are done away with.

We should do away with the word "toleration" and take instead the word "appreciation"; thus, instead of tolerating our neighbors, we should come to appreciate them.

We must attribute to no one a motive that we would not like to have applied to ourselves. People make many mistakes and blunders, no matter how honest. And we must take the very same ground in correcting one class of ailments that we would in correcting any other error.

We should be glad to have our mistakes pointed out to us, so that we can correct them; but no one has the right to impute an unworthy motive to any one.

A spiritual revelation is not to point out an error for the sake of exposing it, but to give the people something higher in place of it—something they could get in no other way.

Spiritual power has for a long time been suppressed; but people to-day, on their own account, are going fearlessly to work investigating their own nature.

We have nothing to say to the happy and contented, except that we are glad there are people in the world who are happy and contented. If they are so, they are right—on their plane; they may be in a state of materiality; they are naked and not ashamed—unfallen Adams and Eves. If one is content with his present condition, we have nothing to say, except to rejoice in his contentment.

If you invite a person to go to the Father's house before he is ready to go, the invitation lacks everything of pleasure or profit to his mind.

We should never try to restrict others by what agrees with ourselves.

We should remain insular, if we held narrowly to one creed or cult. Every cult is too small, and every creed too narrow. This is well shown in the metaphor of four persons going up the four sides of a mountain. All were honest in their convictions, but each travelling a separate path had, necessarily, a different view; and each claimed that his particular view was all there was to be seen. Argument and dispute arose among those four short-sighted but perfectly honest people. The gift of seeing the four sides of the mountain at one view is only enjoyed by one who has reached the top. The one who has had this wider experience—standing upon the height—is able to look in all the different directions, and to see where the various roads lead.

Criticise not, unless you wish to be criticised. When you criticise a song, it is yourself that you criticise. One critic interprets one way, another interprets another way; they can only tell how it strikes them. No one makes any progress in spiritual development until he is perfectly willing to read all reviews, but not to be guided by them. Never allow anybody else's mind to act for you to the suppression of your own.

One star (or sun) is of orange hue, another blue, another red, and so on; yet all those suns are equally beautiful, resplendent, magnificent. So is it with flowers—so is it with trees, birds, gems. One differs from another in its phase, not necessarily in its degree of beauty. So, in human society, we find that all gifts of the spirit are of equal value, and equally interesting—if we know how to employ them aright.

One who has come into spiritual understanding has no favorite flowers. Because you love the roses, there is no reason why you should not also love the lilies. A larger conception enables us to rejoice in all the forms of beauty we behold in the universe. They each have their own mission to fulfil, and we must know ourselves in relation to all of them alike.

The greatest teachers have always been super-personal and super-systematic.

The perfection of a man differs from the perfection of a woman. There can be perfection in all states. Perfection may go along from birth to maturity, manifesting on rising planes.

We must stand for universal brotherhood and sisterhood; there must be no sex qualification anywhere.

We maintain that man and woman are the joint expressions of the one super-personal God.

"I take great comfort in God," said Lowell. People have been taught to fear God in the wrong way. There is a great deal of religious hysteria in the world to-day. In all ages, there has been established precedent in the way of all life—in the way of all progress. There has always been a very large Cancer in the Zodiac, a Crab, whose tendency has been to oppose everything new.

Whatever is asserted is for investigation; all is for consideration; no one should accept without question the sayings of any person.

It is not liberality to go down into the dirt because your neighbor is down there; remain on the heights yourself, and beckon him up. Don't try to get even with people, but help them to get even with you; then there will be two of you on the heights, instead of two of you in the gutter.

All truth, all honor, if it is going to do any practical good, must go down among the "evil" and rescue them. How can we expect the annihilation of evil—the reform of girls and women in all sorts of horrible places—when we hold ourselves aloof? There is no way to help these girls and women to rise to the ideal of noble womanhood, except by going among them and lifting them up.

If you associate with people on any plane, objective or subjective, who are below you in growth and moral character, and you turn to them in blessing, instead of their cursing you, you will do them good; and you will never get any harm, as you will never do anything but good.

Learn from the strong ones; give instruction to the less advanced.

What is a temptation to one is not a temptation to another; what is an attraction to one is not so to another.

Put the right kind of temptation in people's way; a temptation is not simply something you can comprehend with your bodily senses.

The best and highest treatment is to put spiritual temptation to a nobler state within the reach of every one.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

Do not think your altitude is your own special property; it is to enable you to help others.

MEDITATION.

Deep down in the nature of every one there is a settled conviction that it makes a person worse to call him evil, and better to call him good.

REFLECTION.

God's law is only dimly shadowed forth in the purest human legislation.

UNIVERSAL STATEMENT.

God is the parent of all humanity. Woman is as much God's image as man is.

THE COMING RELIGION.

The universal religion is the religion of science.

You may take seven different systems of religion—they are all right, like the seven rays of the rainbow, the seven tones in the musical scale—each right in its own place; but no one of them can be the scale.

Every later revelation contains all the truth that the older revelation embodied.

It makes no difference where the body is, Heaven is as near to us in one place as another. It is only when we come to know what it is to be regardless of time, regardless of place—to feel that one point is as sacred and near to God as another—that we can realize the truth.

No one will be one step nearer Heaven by going to Egypt and meditating, as he walks down the "Avenue of Sphynxes," than by remaining at home and realizing that Heaven is in the very locality where his present action lies.

ALTERNATIVE.

It is only through the discovery of Universal Law that we can know how to fulfil our desires.

When we are in universals, we are one with God; when we are in personals, we are not in harmony with God.

When we come into right relations with the interior state, we shall always desire what is best for us.

We find ourselves, continually, in positions where we are obliged to choose between two things, we can have one or the other, but we cannot have both. This goes on through life—this or that, but not this and that. There will often come an opportunity for the culture of the spiritual, or the material. If we put the spiritual last we shall never secure any spiritual development that is worthy of the name. But if we say, "I will have the highest!" then we may draw from the fountain of Spiritual Truth. The reason why we cannot draw more from the spiritual world is because we live so much in the external.

To bring children up not to depend on externals is to bring them up to realize themselves as magnets for spiritual realities.

Those who desire it earnestly, become possessed of the deepest secrets of Nature. This knowledge comes to us when we give up the love of externals. We become qualified for just what we set our thoughts upon. If we regard externals as the chief good, they will be the only things we can associate with; we can keep our places just where we elect to put ourselves.

Man's spiritual power is universal. Without this spiritual power we should not be men and women. Whatever a seer or prophet has done, some one else can do. There is always possibility for further development along the same lines.

We shall be able, when spiritually developed, to regulate ourselves through the law of natural selection. All normal, healthy human beings will, through this law, select the very things that are best for them.

You are spiritually well and strong; whatever is best for you to have, that you will crave.

Wherever there is a great feeling of need there you can always develop power; it is not easy to develop power where there is no feeling of necessity.

The reason why so many people never receive anything on the psychic plane is because they pay too much attention to externals.

We can all have whatever we want in this universe. Just as we vibrate, we can put ourselves into relationship with whatever we wish. We can vibrate with it. Everything says, "If you seek me with your whole heart, you will surely find me"—everything in the universe! If you seek the higher spiritual development, you can rise entirely above your present limitations. Things cannot move you when you have attained the power to move them. You must either be the operator, or you will be the subject—in the affairs of your daily life. If you say, "My circumstances shall obey me!" you will control them. I never propose to get under any circumstance. Whenever a circumstance comes up we must realize that we can govern it.

Whenever you approach a summit, you are vibrating on a plane much above the ordinary. You have to surrender on one plane to operate on another. It is a question of choice or alternative. If the internal is cultivated, the external is sacrificed. Whenever we undertake to give to the higher and take from the lower, it is a question of exchange. And this is our idea of the true meaning of the word "sacrifice." In living a consecrated life the higher nature always makes demands upon the lower; it is consecration, not destruction. You do not destroy the body, but let the spirit use the body as it will.

Alternative

You will have a good physical body as long as you need one; then, there will be no unwelcome death—no disease. Your transition will only be to you a state of passage from one plane to another. You overcome the fear of death. There will then be no undesired death, no sickness. You are at once prefectly at home in the spiritual world—no sense of bereavement is possible to those who live now and always in the realization of omnipresent life in spirit.

GOLDEN MOTTOES.

Things cannot move you when you have attained the power to move them.

Man is the arbiter of his own fate.

The idea is a true and important one, that man makes his own paradise, or his own sheol, here and hereafter.

We do not have to be unsuccessful. We get what we invite, and nothing else.

Human will ought not to be considered as something to be contested; the essential will is all right, always.

CHASTENING.

THE word "chasten" means to cleanse. The world is undergoing house-cleaning. We can well imagine angels going about on earth with scrubbing-brushes and pails and soapsuds,—and even raising clouds of dust while sweeping.

If Adam and Eve did fall, it was not our fault; why should we be made to suffer? There is no divinity where there is no equity. Punishment is an arbitrary word that should fall into disuse. Chastisement means purification; correction means setting straight that which is crooked. The reformation of the fallen, the protection of society—of all human interests—that is always humane and wise. The improvement of society—the betterment of human conditions, through correction of the offender—this is exceedingly salutary; all may unite upon this reasonable basis.

In the fifty-first Psalm, original sin is recognized. This Psalm, whether written by King David, or some one else, was written by one who was conscious of the results of wrong-doing. The man endeavors to account for his sinful tendencies, and also tries to ease his conscience—smarting under a consciousness of wrong. This is not at all unnatural, and not altogether unjustifiable—the desire to get rid of a little of the responsibility of the wrong-doing, seeking to excuse one's self. This Psalm shows the inevitable results of the doing of a wrong; it is more explanatory than profoundly philosophical. It is to be regarded as something of a mirror, in which one can see one's self. People can look at themselves, in the light of literature, and see the relation between cause and effect in human experience; if they will only reflect how people feel in certain positions, they may avoid similar evils.

In Isaiah we are told, that "The son shall bear the iniquities of the father"; and, again, that he shall not. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." And yet, we are told that one person bears the burden of another's sufferings. When we find statements apparently so conflicting, are we not wisest if we try to find the points of reconciliation in such seemingly contradictory statements?

When we live on the spiritual plane, there are no disasters for us; on the higher plane, so-called disasters are but stepping-stones to further development. We only require certain discipline until we have outgrown it. Just as long as any good may be obtained from dealing with what may be called the cross, the cross looms up; but when the time comes that the cross has fulfilled its mission, that cross becomes a crown.

The "world" which passes away, is not the planet, but a state of society, etc. In a figurative sense, the "sun shall be darkened and the moon turned to blood," is fulfilled in the spirit; it means a new order of society. There is much misinterpretation of the inspired metaphor of the Scriptures. The "earth" means the objective. "In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth." Earth refers to visible things; it is the natural showing forth the spiritual. The expression, "the world is passing away," is always used to signify an existing state of society in its decline.

We would certainly say if any one is given to any of the foolish interpretations formerly held, he had better give them up. There will not be external fulfilment of the prophecies, but a spiritual verification. We are now on the verge of a new era.

MEDITATION.

The cross is transmuted into the crown. The transformation of the cross into the crown is like the baser metals being placed in the crucible; the dross is consumed and the pure gold remains, purified by fire.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

We cannot wipe out anything with tears. There is but one at-one-ment—go and sin no more.

PERSISTENCE.

A dormant faculty remains dormant until something comes to call it forth. Those who are contended against, become strong.

The very best thing that can happen to people is when they are subjected to severe privations. Our great minds, as a rule, come out of strong effort, and out of much contention with what the world calls misfortune.

It is looking back and turning back, getting discouraged and disappointed, that hinders success; going on and on, persistently, is what makes for success —dogged persistency. One may have much to battle with; but by going on, steadfastly, we all shall succeed. Do not stop to fight the enemy. Go to sleep whenever you wish to. But when you steadily hold before you that one persistent consciousness that you are a magnet to draw toward you whatever you will, you will bring it to you.

Man's desire is an expression of man's potency; every one can do what he desires to do. But the volition is fulfilled gradually, in a process from within outward.

Our desires must be fulfilled through steady, constant expectation. The desire must be firmly and consistently held. It fulfils the law, "Every one that seekest, findeth." It is to ask for one thing definitely, and then do everything with that one object and expectation. Never permit anything to come between you and the fulfilment of your desire.

A teacher cannot give us ability, but can help us to unfold our ability. Our desire is an evidence that we have some talent for the thing desired. Never allow yourself to become discouraged because your progress seems slow; you must never take any notice of seeming failure or defeat. Note only your successes. And use ever to yourself, correct versus incorrect language. It is exactly the same in regard to any progress; do not say, "I do not seem to make much progress," but, "I am sure I do this a little better than I did."

Obstacles come to us to be conquered—to be overcome; but any one who will stand aloof will gain nothing.

Let the will remain where it is; the will is good enough, but the intellect is often all wrong. The will that says "I wish it" is to be left where it is; but the intellect must be brought to realize that "I will do it, and I can do it." The very moment that you bring the "can" instead of the "cannot" into relation with the will, you have overcome the difficulty.

The word "trust" is used constantly, in connection with the word "faith." Before we can trust, we must acknowledge the trustworthiness of the thing in which we trust.

We must use the word "can" potentially before we use it actually.

MEDITATION.

Work is something that we love to do; labor is something we have to do. Work is a blessing, but labor is a curse.

Always maintain that you will have the strength for whatever necessity may arise.

All progress is by means of a spiral stairway; we do not go forward in a straight line, but by a spiral pathway, and this pathway often appears to have its ups and downs. We are not going simply round and round, but truly going forward.

CONCENTRATION.

The restless character is not the ideal character. In order to develop general power, one has to learn to work with one's mind.

Whenever you are afraid that you are going to lose something, and are always troubling yourself about it, you set in motion a destructive current of force.

We can do as we choose with our own faculties. This is the first lesson in concentration. If you say you cannot help it, you are a confessed creature of circumstance.

According to whatever you expect—whether you will it so, or whether you will it otherwise—shall it be unto you.

Like attracts like; everything attracts its own kind, throughout the universe. But there are those who desire one thing and expect another; this explains why many persons remain ill.

You can have anything you like in the universe—provided you set about attracting it in the right way. Can you not make a mental picture of anything you want? The first question is, Do you know what you want? If you do not know what you want, no one can help you. In business, unless you know what you want, a business person cannot tell you how to get it; it is just the same on the psychic plane. Find out what you desire most of all. Choose out some place and some occupation, and put yourself in relation with it subjectively, in your quietest moments.

If we know what we want, we can relate ourselves to it. Go into the silence and find out what you want. Do not rise from your chair or place of retirement until you know what you want.

Every individual is a magnet to draw to himself whatever he needs to draw—whatsoever is steadily determined upon. The result is attained by living continually with one object and one determination. When people will to succeed, that is one-half; when they expect to succeed, that is the other half. This is to govern fate, instead of being governed by it.

We put all speculative topics aside; we will not dogmatize upon them at all. The question is not whether our desires are the result of reincarnation or the result of heredity. But, your desire being what it is—your desire being yours—you can gratify the desire. We cannot change our past incarnations. What we maintain is, whatever your desire is now—let it result from whatever it may—you can fulfil your desire through the law of attraction. If you do not care about a thing, you do not want to get it. There is not a person on this earth who really wants a thing and cannot get it. The desire is that which attracts.

Make conditions for success by calling out mentally whatever you wish to attract. You are a magnet to attract it; it is entirely through the law of attraction. "Wherever two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Wherever two or three are gathered together in any mental condition, if joyful, they are a magnet to attract joy; they attract whatever they concentrate upon.

Not in use, but in abuse, lies the injury of any faculty. Never make an unpleasant effort to produce any effect. Doubt and fear and strainful effort produce injurious effects. When people try to do anything, they almost invariably fail to do it. Never say "I'll try," but say "I'll do it." "I'll do it!" is what conquers obstacles.

If a person wants anything, let him know that he wants it and open himself to it. "I will have what I want, because I want it," is the attitude to take for the accomplishment of anything.

When you wish a prophesy for your own life, go into the sacred silence; don't ask anybody else, but go into the depths of your own consciousness. When you can go into the holy silence at will, then you will soon become a genuine theosophist.

The way in which the highest knowledge comes to us is the way it came to the early prophets; they went away by themselves—they went into the wilderness.

If we have pure eyes and loving hearts, we can read the book of Nature. There is meaning to every voice, and a significance to every form.

The true condition is perfect rest, but continual activity.

It is not the length of time we consume in doing any work, but the amount of energy we throw into our work that truly tells.

People who are always running about and trying to accomplish a great deal, often accomplish very little. Quiet industry is most effective.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

The greatest and the noblest things often take the longest in coming to maturity.

DESTINY.

While only what is involved can be evolved, we know that irrigation is necessary for the fertility of the soil. A fertile soil is necessary for perfect expansion of the buried seed.

If we have different works to do, this necessitates varying endowments. One star differs from another star in glory—not, necessarily, in the greater glory of one than another.

We must regard humanity as the Grand Man. The Grand Man has all the members and all the parts which the human body has; and one member cannot do the work that another should. We must admit that there are people born into the world who cannot do the work their brothers or sisters can. The same talent is not demanded in all. There are always some people who not only see ahead, but work ahead. There are some who are in the brains of the Grand Man; these have to work in their studios, preparing great things for the world. There are societies of angels who perform the functions of the mouth; others who are in the province of the hands. Those who are called upon to run on swift errands are in the feet of the Grand Man.

There are those who are especially qualified for outward kinds of work; there are those who are qualified for esoteric action only.

We may find our places in the Signs of the Zodiac.

Not every one is qualified to be in the brain, or in the eye, or in the tongue of the Grand Man. Some must be in the hands, others in the feet. We are to aim after organic harmony—a perfect organism.

We are perfectly in harmony with Nature when we claim that there may be twelve manners of people—as represented by the Twelve Signs of the Zodiac—all correspondences to the different parts of the body.

We may also note fancied resemblances in people to the different animals; thus, some people exhibit the characteristics of the wolf; others show the traits of the dog or the cat. (All this may tend to support the theory that our lower selves have evolved through the various stages of the animal kingdom.)

Desire to fulfil your own mission in life, whatever it may be; then, when you take this ground, that you will work for the good of humanity, you will find that in these days, as in days of old, there is a Sinai. You will find yourself on the hill, conversing with the highest.

Learn to appreciate every one's gift, your own included. And then, do not care what particular thing you are called upon to do, what situation you are called upon to fill, but seek to attain the highest state in any. Many will say they cannot do the things they are called upon to do. If any one feels in that way, he should compel himself to do the thing over and over, until he feels no aversion to it, and can do it well.

The words "gift" and "mission" have a universal signification.

Every human being has a mission, a distinct destiny. Some have missions which seem to elevate them, in a certain sense, above others. There are those who may be regarded in a special way as lights of the world.

No one's work comes to an end because it has been a failure, but because it has been a success.

The law is that all affairs and events of human life remain until their successors are ready to appear.

Always feel that if one thing goes away, you are ready for something higher. Never say, "I have lost something," but, "I have come to the end of a certain period in my journey, what is the next thing for me to do? What is the next good that is coming to me?"

Destiny

What has a beginning must have an end; what has no beginning can have no end.

At this particular time, we are at the end of a cycle —at the close of an age. It seems as though this conception were in the air; every one seems to feel it. But the majority of people fail to interpret the signs. We are not yet in the new dispensation, but we are in a period of what might be called interregnum. The world is now passing through a narrow passage-way, like the bar at the mouth of a river. The generally instilled feeling everywhere says we are in a transitional epoch. It is as people usually feel at a period of house-moving—a great deal more than a simple change, like going into some place or condition with which we are not familiar; there is an element of mystery. The unknown, even if it may be an unknown blessing, is still dreaded; that is why there are so many restless hearts and minds at present.

We hear it truly said, "There is a good time coming!" We are in the dawn of the "Golden Age." We cannot tell how long it will last; a "thousand" signifies a great number.

As all the baser metals are transmutable into gold, so every cross that the world has borne is to be melted into a crown. The cross becomes a crown through transformation of energy.

It is the destiny of Columbia to lead the nations. Every land is to become a Palestine. Think of the territorial area of the United States! This is to be the new nation! A new nation is being "born in a day"—in the day when people can see the light, in a period of light and universal illumination.

The Orient and the Occident shall join hands.

We believe there will spring up here (America will take the initiative) a new dispensation of Light and Truth to dawn upon the whole world.

The new order of things will not be born all at once; it will come as a little child, but it will grow, continually increasing in wisdom and stature.

MEDITATION.

Every man is the arbiter of his own fate and the shaper of his own destiny. There is a destiny in the sense that there is a destination. The destiny of man is involved in his nature.

We must not believe in physical power as we do in intellectual and moral power. Spirituality alone justifies optimism. No finite step is a final step.

We should look upon our past lives as stepping-stones to the higher lives we are to live. We rise from the dead; not the resurrection of the dead, but from the dead is our blissful heritage.

Destiny

Nothing can go until the time has come for its departure. You cannot destroy what has a message yet to deliver and a mission yet unfulfilled.

The reason why some structures and some books remain, while others are lost or destroyed, is because they have something yet to teach. Nothing is destroyed or lost until it has fulfilled its mission.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

Let us ever realize a Trinity of Love, Wisdom and Use.

HEREDITY.

The doctrine of heredity is the old doctrine of original sin in a somewhat new and professedly scientific guise.

We are told that in consequence of the transgression of the first parents of the human race, sin came into the world. There are two theories with regard to original sin: one, that man inherits sin from his forefathers; the other, that of imputed sin.

If people believe simply in heredity, they make themselves irresponsible creatures. This is hopeless pessimism for a great many people; it is only the old Calvinistic doctrine of original sin dressed in a new garb. If this were true, the race would tend to final corruption. "He that overcometh shall inherit all things."

There are no invincible tendencies. You can overcome the tendency to consumption just as reasonably as you can overcome the tendency to drink or any other immorality.

Persons may become intoxicated, and suffer from delirium tremens; that is the penalty. You can discover the law of cause and effect so as to work with it.

Most people think it very wrong to tell a falsehood; it is wrong, beyond a doubt, but a person may have just as much a tendency to lying as to consumption or cancer. If a person has a tendency to tell lies, he ought to overcome it; then he must have the power to overcome it. One cannot do what one is constitutionally unable to do. We must teach ability, or our moral counsels, even the highest of them, are idle, impracticable vaporings.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

We are not bound by the law of heredity. All tendencies can be encouraged and developed, or they can be suppressed and overcome.

SPECIALTY.

Great specialists are not apt to be interesting to people in general.

Information should be obtained upon all points, but we have plenty of room for specialists. There are certain qualifications, however, which are as necessary for one as for another.

There never will be a successful worker in any field who has not qualified himself for that special field. We must understand our business. Whatever may be the particular qualification one desires, one must live for that work in particular.

To be specialists in any great line, we must concentrate our forces on that special line. If you want to succeed in anything, you can become great wherever you really desire to be great.

It is asked, "Is it not true that any scientific demonstration demands that one's life should be given up to it?" If we desire to be eminent scientists in any line, we must give ourselves entirely to our work. We must be people of "one idea"; we must have one central object. We may read all literature, and interest ourselves in all arts and amusements, but we must make everything subsidiary to the chosen end.

Specialty

Make everything you hear—everything you do—tend in one direction. Be able to illustrate your subject in manifold ways. People may carry the thought of psychic development with them wherever they go, into everything they do; never allowing anything to be a hindrance; keeping the desire always fixed upon the unfolding of the interior.

If one is to use his eyes, he must have an occupation which calls the eyes into use.

Give out your best and highest, in every way: in the newspaper article, in your novels, in your conversation, in your silent thought.

The majority of people, who write hysterically on various subjects, start on their subjects from nowhere, and, therefore, cannot possibly reach a satisfactory conclusion.

In going into the practice of healing, do not give up your special talent, but through the exercise of your gift do your work. The daily newspaper, the theatre, the novel, all are to be used as channels to carry the higher truths to the people. Every one is to use his own special talent, and give to the world what he has to give, through that special channel. Some people have, undoubtedly, greater capacity than others, but no one should lay aside his special vocation.

MEDITATION.

We rest by changing our occupation. But let people cease to do anything, and think that idleness will produce a cure, they will not find what they expect but exactly the reverse of it.

When people talk about attracting whatever they want, it is perfectly true; but they cannot want what they have not potentially the means of procuring.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

Whatever is involved in any soul can be evolved therefrom.

THE LAW OF ATTRACTION.

There is a Law of Attraction, which is absolutely universal. Everything is a link to attract that which is like itself. Thus one may be brought into relation with all in Nature that is like unto the object upon which one elects to concentrate.

Every individual is by nature a magnet to draw from the universe what is needed to build up his own organization. It is not for us to give up to others, nor to ask others to give up to us.

Whatever comes into any building, or into any person's individual sphere, comes because it is attracted thereto through the Law of Attraction.

We hear of attraction and repulsion: the Law of Attraction is the only law we recognize. There is in reality no law of repulsion, though there appears to be such a law. Everything follows the line of greatest attraction, which is the line of least resistance; thus it appears to us that there is repulsion, while really there is only attraction.

Any limitation that anybody is groaning under comes through the Law of Attraction.

Whether a person knows it or not, he gets whatever he is in a condition to receive.

Many will say—"We came into the world with differing endowments." That is not asking "How did we come to be what we are? And from whence did we get our tendencies?" Granted that you have any desire, you can fulfil that desire through the operation of the Law of Attraction; making yourself a magnet, you can draw to yourself anything you want.

The action of this Law of Attraction is, that whatever we seek, we find. And, if two persons can be found attracting the same conditions, they will have precisely the same experiences—provided they are in the same mental conditions.

We shall eventually know how to produce anything in this world that we wish to produce.

Let people assert something, instead of attempting to deny something; trust in the Law of Attraction, not in the Law of Repulsion, conquers. No one need suffer from a sense of neglect, nor through hypersensitiveness from disappointment and heartache; there is a cure for all this. When feeling sorrowful, pronounce the words "Joy, joy!" Try this, it will be found successful. Everything answers to its own name. Everything responds to the name by which it is known!

It is the Universal Law: "Call upon me and I will answer!" This is universally true; it refers to the highest, and the lowest, and to all that is intermediary. Whatever you call will always respond.

When we pronounce certain words mentally, making positive assertions, our words return to us; and they do not return to us void.

It is entirely the condition of the person himself which causes the treatment he receives. Those who get the worst treatment bring it upon themselves.

If you have bad dreams—if you have nightmares—if you wake in the morning feeling badly—it is entirely your own fault; not necessarily your sin; but your blunder.

The Law of Attraction needs to be understood. If you are in a condition to attract children, and do not know that there are any children in the neighborhood, they will be attracted by you and will come to you, because of that attraction. It is not only so with children, but also with animals—with dogs and with birds. It is not probable that they understand this, but they surely feel drawn toward you because of the sympathetic vibration between you and them. This is the Law of Sympathetic Vibration.

If there is such a law as that of repulsion, we have nothing to do with it. People do not know what the action of their vibrations is upon things around them, many times, and thus attract things they greatly dislike.

Let us be thankful for everything that comes to us; if it ought not to come, it would not come. It is the effect of a cause. If we did not attract it, we should not have it.

In the same way that the physician draws towards him the sick, will the wise person draw toward himself the foolish; the moral will draw the immoral, and so on; because we can help others thus.

Only the outward form of a work can be regulated by what we call circumstances.

Why do the ignorant go to teachers? For the enlightenment of their understanding.

We should feel that Almighty God is paying us a compliment when he sends to us people with downward tendencies. What does the Law of Attraction find to work upon in such cases? It works upon the germ of honor, which is like a diamond set in mud.

Those who come into the sphere of pure influence can be affected for good by unconscious influence.

MEDITATION.

We can become related to all that is beautiful in the world, through the Law of Attraction, through a mental process, regardless of what our exterior surroundings may be.

The Law of Attraction explains entirely the wisdom of prayer on a scientific basis.

When you follow the Law of Attraction, you are drawn in a superior degree to a certain place; and if you are at all versatile, you will be sometimes drawn to one place, sometimes to another, but always to the right place at the right time and in the right way.

You say a certain thought strikes you. Why? Because you were in a condition to be struck. Unless you were in a condition to be struck, it could not have struck you.

RECOGNITION OF QUALIFICATION.

The right of every individual is to do whatever he or she can do well. Qualification is the test of ordination. The qualified healer is the ordained healer.

It is recognition of qualification that we need. The very moment people claim anything as a right—the very moment we get to that point—we are ready for something; and we never get it until we are ready for it.

We do not always see how the Law of Attraction honors all who trust it, but that is only on account of our shortsightedness.

Silently, we can become magnets to attract everything we desire. But what is the genesis of desire? There must be a cause for desire. If we had no capacity, no talent, we would never have the desire to express it.

The very moment we can see a thing, we are ready for it—else we could not see it. The very moment we have come to see a higher state, we can begin to make it manifest.

Only those who have had a metaphysical education know how to discriminate between the potential and the actual; they recognize the possibilities within every one and distinguish between the potential and the actual. To recognize the kingdom of Heaven within, is to help that Heaven to shine forth, to actualize.

If you place before the eyes of people—within easy range of their vision—that which symbolizes a state which they have not yet attained, but which they can reach, you aid them in reaching it.

We must affirm that a person has it within him to express what he has not yet attained, whenever we are seeking to aid him in any department of education.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

Wherever there is Qualification, there is a signet of Divine Ordination.

POLARITY.

People who are unsuccessful are not rightly polarized.

Many persons are imperfectly married within themselves; they may be emotional but not intellectual, or intellectual and not emotional. Where intellect and emotion are perfectly united, how much grander and more glorious the results! When the two blend in us, then our spiritual gifts unfold; we attain the highest psychical state. What is brought forth in us as spiritual power is through the blending of these elements—emotion and intellect.

Everybody is susceptible to something—proof against something else.

When we come into knowledge of our inner selves, we shall be conscious of being susceptible to everything we wish to be susceptible to, and proof against everything we wish to be proof against.

One's sensitiveness can be brought so entirely under his own control that he can be open to any influx, and close himself against an influx he wishes to avoid. We are influenced by the erroneous thoughts of those around us, if we are in a negative condition to their influence.

Until you can realize that you have the magnet within yourself to draw to you at any time that which you need, you are in a degree of servitude. When you can declare, "God is everywhere! The Divine Spirit is within me—within you—throughout the universe!" then, you do not have to yield to anything. No one need yield to circumstances.

We hear much about electricity and magnetism. Every thinker to-day is a believer in the unity of force; not two forces, one magnetic and the other electric, but one force which acts in both directions, one law, manifesting itself in a variety of ways. One force, moving in a northerly and southerly direction is magnetism; moving easterly and westerly it is electricity. Force may move in one direction and be magnetic; then in another, and be electric.

People one would call "sweet," and "gentle," may be very easily wounded—have their feelings hurt; they allow their feelings to be wounded. They do not say anything, perhaps, but go to their rooms and have a "good cry," and often go to sleep in that mood. How can they expect to be well! Such persons are weak, far too negative.

There are two wise courses of action; either take no notice of an annoyance, or else have it out with a person. Misunderstandings and misinterpretations are wrong on both sides; it is better to have it out with the one who has injured you or wounded your feelings.

It is entirely unnecessary that you should remain abnormally sensitive.

No one can be too sensitive to spiritual influx of a high order; but sensitiveness is wrongly interpreted. People are sensitive on very different planes.

A negative state of disorder expresses itself in weakness, debility—too little strength; a positive state of disorder, in positive ailments.

Unsatisfied is a purely negative state. Dissatisfied is a different condition altogether. There are many people who are both—confusion of condition. When people are unsatisfied, a new hope, a new desire, a new ardor is growing within them.

Very sensitive people, who are too negative, catch diseases; why not catch something good?

Just as it can be definitely stated on the physical plane, that certain requirements are necessary, so on the mental plane, one's condition is all-important. There is no law that will favor one more than it will another. If one takes the "grippe" and another does not, it stands to reason that if both have been exposed to the same atmosphere, they are not in the same condition.

We are differently affected by things because of the different magnets within ourselves. We can adjust those magnets so that we can go on attracting just what we wish to attract.

All that we attract is in the atmosphere; we become related with it through our thought.

There is all the difference in the world between reading a condition, and taking on a condition. Reading a condition is all right; but taking on a condition is very wrong. Many people, when they go anywhere, take on conditions. Now, we maintain that the scientific clairvoyant or psychometrist will be able to see, without yielding to conditions. There is a normal and abnormal sensitiveness. One may be able to give clairvoyant diagnosis, but, keeping it external, may avoid taking on the condition. We may become sensitive to information; but all the knowledge we make use of is not to sadden us. To see events is all right; but the abnormally sensitive person would feel the fright. The psychic, if duly fortified, would keep deranged conditions external; one must get to this point before he can become a successful mental healer. There is such a thing as the prostitution of the mental faculties!

By holding ourselves external to suffering, we reverse the picture—as all suffering is inversion; we can then help the patient to get rid of it. We should never allow ourselves to come under the influence of a thing, because we see it.

"With God, all things are possible!" "All things are possible to him that believeth." Nothing shall be impossible to such. When a man is working according to law, all things are possible to him. If he ignores the Law of the Universe, he will very soon find that the Law of the Universe will have its own way regardless of his opposition, and his opposition is what will cause his own inevitable suffering.

There are people who take a decided, positive ground, and affirm their own individuality truly, who are never annoyed by outside influences. We must be able to become positive and negative, at will. The line should be drawn resolutely at interference or control of our individuality by any hypnotic influence.

MEDITATION.

Perfect equanimity, mental quiet, is essential to read the Book of Nature. "Be still, and know that I am God!" The mighty silence—and waiting! Blending of fearlessness and calm expectancy is essential to genuine attainment in any direction.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

A person who has attained to the higher carelessness is the one who is ready for every emergency.

ATTAINMENT OF VICTORY.

If you gain a victory on any plane, that victory stands you in stead for all future time. You have risen superior; it is the rising superior to something that is of use to us. If you rise in your own mentality and score a victory once, it is a growth that can be employed for all time to come. Once gain a victory, and that victory is yours forever.

We can change at will the polarity of our own condition. There is a scientific law of action, which can be acted out by all who are industrious and fearless enough to trust their intuitions.

One cannot be happy, harmonious or well, so long as he allows the caprice of any being to make or mar his harmony.

One who can hurt my feelings is above me, and will not attempt to do so; one who would hurt my feelings is below me, and cannot hurt me.

All feeling of mental uncertainty makes the sight uncertain. Cultivate certainty within by finest meditation.

HARMONIOUS VIBRATION.

Peace is from the heights above; discord is from below.

We can make our surroundings tributary to our needs; this is the Law of Harmonious Vibration.

Through the Law of Attraction we can get from the universe whatever we need. We should so relate ourselves with the universe that we can say with Paul, "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." How very few are the necessaries of life! "High thinking, and plain living!"

If people were living according to spiritual law—understanding and obeying that law—they would be able to change poisons, even, into harmonious food. They would be able to so control the different elements taken into the system as to cause one element to go to one place, and another to go to a distinct part of the body; making different combinations. Therefore, it would be possible—if a person were highly enough unfolded—to really convert usually harmful substances into nourishing food; just as fertilizers are put upon the earth, and serve to increase its fertility. The elements are changed in their relations, through disintegration and reintegration of their constituent particles.

We believe that there is a proper diet. The ideal diet would be a diet of fruit and nuts. The very highest type of man would be perfectly sustained upon fruit and nuts; but until we can put ourselves into that state, we must get out of what we now take, such aliment as we need. This is the law of demand —to make such use of the food and beverages we take, as to get what we require from them. It all depends upon what you do with the coffee after you drink it as to whether it is well for you to drink it at all.

Whenever you go against any force, you make that force your adversary. Go and place yourself in harmony with those elements that you are at enmity with; go and make it up with the east wind, or the rain, or the snow, or the cold; those elements are good for us, provided we put ourselves in harmony with them. There is a psychical force in all Nature which will strengthen and invigorate us, if we put ourselves in harmony with it.

We may so relate ourselves to the universe that we shall be as lamps living upon the atmosphere.

If we know how to relate ourselves to our surroundings, we can keep ourselves in perfect order.

People do not become spiritual in consequence of what they eat; but, as they become spiritual, they relate themselves differently to food—to everything. We act upon the fluid secretions of our systems entirely through our mental or psychical states.

What is the condition of your system? What do you do with the food after you eat it?—that is the important question. If you eat a boiled egg, in a certain mental condition, it may have a totally different effect upon your system than when eaten in another mental condition.

Mental health is all-important.

If we feel opposed to anything, we must bring ourselves into harmonious relation with it, and thus cure our antagonism.

Whatever we hate—whatever we oppose—whatever we antagonize—we give power to hurt us.

We must overcome antagonism and prejudice. Wherever there is antagonism, or wherever there is fear, there is danger. All prejudices and fear must be overcome; because, just as long as these exist, there will be illness.

All remedial agents are useless as long as there is an antagonizing force in the individual. Until we have trained our intellects to act in harmony with our wills, we cannot be well.

There are just two courses of action which are safe; to put ourselves in harmony with our surroundings, and go with them, or to live outside of them. We should never allow ourselves to go against anything —never allow antagonism. There are many whom we need not feel called upon to work with. Do not have any hard feelings in regard to such; merely let them alone.

Every body gets out of things just what he, as a magnet, draws out of them. The ideal state is to be able to relate ourselves harmoniously with everything with which we must come in contact.

A very small act may be an indication of a condition.

Everything has its own rate of vibration.

The question is asked, "How can we learn the rate of vibration of anything we desire, so that we can vibrate with it?" It is not necessary to know the rate of vibration, in order to come into harmonious relation with anything.

Whenever we put ourselves through sympathy en rapport with anything, we vibrate with it—at the same rate of speed.

Whenever you put yourself in relation with anything in the universe, you can attract it. If you choose to believe that your key to the universe is only through another person's magnetism, you will have to believe that that magnetism has reached you in some way before you can be helped. But you should get free from such belief.

God might say, "When did I ever appoint a janitor to open and close the door of Heaven?"

We can have anything we want in our own spheres, if we can only relate ourselves to it. We must realize that it is our own state. It is not the external surrounding, it is the individual himself that needs to be effectually dealt with.

If evolution and revolution are twins, astronomical revolution combines both. There are ever two movements of the heavenly bodies; the one, round and round; the other unceasingly forward. Man travels as the planets travel, and the planets travel as man travels; man cannot separate himself from the rhythmical motion of the heavenly spheres.

A person vibrating outside the ordinary circles is not appreciated by the masses; it is a circle that the majority of people do not know anything about. One will be healed and blessed by being brought into any circle if it be a superior one to the one in which he has been revolving.

The vibrations which give one pleasure may give another pain.

One should never place one's self in an attitude of antagonism, because this attitude always injures the one who holds unlovely thought.

You can put yourself in harmony with anything by mentally going with it; make yourself its friend, and it will be your friend.

We are susceptible to the mental influence of those we make heroes of, if we associate with them. We can also relate ourselves with them, through the Law of Vibration—even in absence.

If you get into a mental condition which causes more rapid circulation of the blood, the rate is increased—the blood flows more freely. The mental condition is the only thing to calculate.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

Will yourself into a serene mental state, and you need never trouble about external things, as they will all come right without your worrying.

TELEPATHY.

The Law of Vibration is the universal law. Vibrations do not have to reach the tympanum of the physical ear. Acknowledge such a thing as telepathy—thought-transference. Make yourself a magnet to attract the special quality of thought you most desire. You can be that magnet, wherever you may be; it is a mental condition. Your circumstances do not matter at all, provided the thought formed is always held in the receptive attitude; but if you allow the thought to intrude that something is a hindrance, it will be a hindrance to you. By keeping the mental magnet always firmly fixed, you will draw towards you whatever you desire to attract.

Telepathy—the ability to produce mental action at a distance—may be developed by every one who will patiently seek it.

The best time for sending a mental message is just when you feel all aglow with it. Get into a condition where you are full of a thought, then project it.

The ability to send and receive telepathic communications depends upon the development of the persons—and, like everything else, it takes practice. Much is lost by anxiety and striving for results.

You may not find your wires working perfectly, at first; your cables may even break, until you have had wider experience; but the time is coming when all these difficulties will pass away.

Almost invariably, people put themselves into the most uncomfortable attitudes when endeavoring to give a mental treatment, or to send or receive a mental telegram; instead of being perfectly easy and natural about it, they are usually in an unnatural attitude, and endeavor to force themselves into difficult positions.

The ability to work wonders is not through technical knowledge, but through psychical development which produces a higher rate of vibration.

Those who are not yet developed to the point of being able to project their thought, for them there is not any credible proof of the power of sending thought long distances. Long-distance telepathy is, however, abundantly proved by constant practice on the part of the serene-minded.

Hold yourself firmly where you are; encourage your perception to extend itself. Many people develop hysteria by trying to get out in the astral body, and do things they are not yet prepared for.

CORRESPONDENCES.

Everything external is the correspondence of some internal condition.

Our own souls are in correspondences with Divine Good—in each working out our own salvation.

This world is only a world of effects and correspondences.

Christ builds his church upon the rock (Peter) of intuitive perception of truth.

Jesus Christ means goodness and truth—goodness, the love of right; truth, the knowledge of right.

"A stone for his pillow," signifies resting on the rock of truth.

All external things are correspondences; sweet fruit is a correspondence to some good within us, of which it is the ultimate.

When a man is bald, it signifies, in correspondence, that he has nothing to conceal, or that he is unable to conceal.

In correspondent language, snow-white hair means that one has come into a condition where, from good and pure internals, one has come to express pure externals.

There is the same adapted relation between the psychical body and the psychical world that there is between the physical body and the material world.

Because the interior existence of all things is spiritual, the exterior existence may be spiritualized so as to bring it into perfect conformity with the inmost.

There is a perfect analogy between subjective and objective experiences.

The "white stone and new name written therein" granted to those who are "sealed in the forehead," is the clear perception of truth which an individual enjoys who has earned illumination through fidelity under all provocation.

ASSOCIATION AND ORGANIZATION.

Association and organization are words vastly different in their signification. An organization must be a perfect whole; a body having its different members, each important in its place.

There is not a single religious organization that does not in some way cramp its members. Can you form a Spiritual Organization? If you can form a spiritual organization without a material head, you can obtain the most remarkable results.

Real spiritual work does not involve business management.

A company of people, attracted to each other by the law of psychical affinity—held together in the embrace of true brotherhood and sisterhood—these might meet, in each other's homes—no initiation fees—no dues—such might attain true spiritual development. If you come together with one accord, your purpose shall be granted.

MEMORY.

Loss of control over memory is a sign of insanity. People strong mentally have good control over their memories.

We do not ever forget, but something comes between our mental vision and the recollection of an object.

No one ever forgets anything. Instead of endeavoring to strengthen memory, we must undertake to gain an adequate, where we now have a very insufficient command over our memories.

Take the mental attitude, "I will remember whatever I will to remember."

Will the memory of our follies remain forever? No; not when we have overcome them. The sight of evil is our penalty; if we create discords, they will ring in our own ears. We should endeavor to interpret the doctrine of Karma broadly. If I make a discord in my own psychical sphere, that discord rings in my own ears—just as our individual environment is of our own making. If I throw into my own individual sphere that which makes me suffer, I need to change my own state. Outside things are well enough; we must change ourselves inwardly before we can rightly relate ourselves to any surrounding.

There is a universal Book of Remembrance, where everything is recorded. This volume is the interstellar atmosphere.

"Absent-minded" expresses many a case exactly; absent-minded here, present-minded somewhere else. Our objective and subjective entities are not fully connected on this plane of existence, and until they are, remembering and forgetting must perpetually exist as phenomena in our experience.

KARMA.

When we consider man as the child of God, we find the true basis of incarnation.

Changeful Karma has an existence; it has no subsistence. It is so with all evil or error.

We may accept the doctrine of Karma, but not all modern interpretations of it. Karma is simply sequence, the inevitable connection between cause and effect, not a force which is bottled up and awaits one at the threshold of a new incarnation; for we are sowing and reaping every moment we live. Karma is continually operating: we are making it—modifying it—changing it—not only by every act, but by every thought we entertain. We cannot interfere with Karma, but we can learn to make it serve us.

A person may be treated mentally, by hypnotism; if a person is willing to be hypnotized, he can be hypnotized. Not that any one yielding to mesmeric or hypnotic influence has his Karma interfered with thereby; but the Karma of the different phases of existence—the consequences of past life, remembered or unremembered—is what permits this influence.

In mental treatment, some people seem to yield at once, others much more slowly, or not at all; they are impenetrable, like a rhinoceros' hide. Karma is made manifest by their different degrees of susceptibility. Their Karma cannot be interfered with!

One person may require treatment, another may be able to give treatment to others; there, again, is a manifestation of Karma. The susceptibility to disease shows an evidence of Karma. Again, we see an evidence of Karma in susceptibility to temptation. We have the power to call out from those easily influenced any phase of character we will. The Karma of different individuals is made manifest by these various degrees or conditions.

If persons come to you who are capable of being helped in any way, don't leave them to their Karma! It is your Karma as much as theirs that has brought you together. If you help them, you are not only making good Karma for yourself, but helping them also to make good Karma for themselves. Do not leave people to their fate! The most pestilential doctrine is that of leaving people to their Karma. No one is making anything that could be called good Karma unless he is doing all he can to uplift humanity. The wave of mental influence that goes to help others, must help one's self also.

Resignation to a supposed inevitable condition—if a person is suffering from anything—on the plea that it is his Karma, merits no sympathy whatever.

When bad Karma makes itself manifest; the way to get rid of it is to work in some good Karma.

All talk about souls dying out, or losing a soul, is mediæval rubbish! The doctrines of Karma, and of reincarnation can be stated in such a manner as to prove acceptable to all deep thinkers. The real doctrine is, that every human soul has a history. If there are cannibals on earth to-day, they will rise to the heights we have attained; we shall never go down to their level, but they will rise to ours. We may have been where they now are. We never go down in the scale of development. When we speak of the evolution of mankind, we mean that the human race is continually rising. We hold that individual man rises as the race rises, that each has a past which has led up to his present.

When the soul seeks another expression on earth, Karma will cause it to seek those parents appropriate to its further development. Choice manifests our intelligence; choice is one thing, freedom of choice is a growing quantity.

It is not at all strange that souls should precipitate themselves into very disastrous surroundings. That the soul to be reincarnated has the opportunity of choosing its own environment, and deliberately makes choice of its parentage, is the doctrine promulgated by many wise minds. Mistakes are made again and again, through inexperience. There will be final triumph over these obstacles. Every one rises by gradual stages to the accomplishment of noble results.

On the basis of Astrology, a person born at a certain time will have certain opportunities peculiar to himself; those opportunities may be embraced, or not, as the individual may elect.

There is such a thing as relative human freedom.

Some say it is not right to interfere with Karma. Karma cannot be interfered with, because it is the law of cause and effect.

If we make our Karma, we can unmake it. To affirm that a person cannot turn around and make good Karma appears ridiculous.

Those people are entitled to no sympathy who say, if their Karma has brought them into the pitiful condition in which they now are, they will have to wait for it to work itself out, for it is only their own activity that can relieve them.

If you have a bad tenant in your house, you must get him out.

Every one has it in his power to repair the damage done by himself. No human act is irrevocable, but he who did the deed is the only one who can undo it. Evil deeds are only overcome by good deeds.

EMANATIONS.

Every one throws out a psychical and a physical magnetism—and must, just as flowers, throw out their odors.

We can produce such a chemical change in our organism, by improved thought, that it can be detected by those around us.

Every one gives out a psychic force, and that force penetrates everything he touches.

When people gather in any place, they produce a psychic condition therein, which can be felt by all sensitives.

Man is constantly evolving that which is within him. The very atmosphere is being saturated with our emanations; everything is permeated with the flux of our mentality. We are giving character even to the utensils which we employ; and, go where we will, we are constantly characterizing everything with which we come in contact.

How do we give out our psychic emanations? In the same way that we breathe, in the same way that we perspire. Different people give out different emanations; and the same people give out different emanations at different times. Your emanations can be analyzed. One in a sensitive condition can detect emanations—just as when we come in contact with the perfume of a flower.

Decisive people give out distinct emanations. According to the individuality is the force of the emanation—like the odors of flowers, differing in quality and degree.

We, every one of us, endow even inanimate things with psychical influences; there is such a thing as a virtuous pocket-handkerchief. You can throw something of your goodness into your apron, so that others who may chance to wear it will feel the influence. Some of our psychical force goes into all the things we touch.

By our thoughts—by our atmosphere—we can consecrate the very air of our dwellings, and make them abodes of blessing.

People in the best thought have only to go into a room, to consecrate it.

Every thought we think in any place influences more or less the atmosphere of that place, and, to some extent, influences every one who comes into it, according to the degree of sensitiveness of the person.

People in a sad condition render the air depressing.

Spirit, we admit, works through material means to ultimate expression.

There is the great metaphysical demonstration—to use material things, and then show how, through ordinary material channels, mental effects may be produced. The psychical principle enables us to work cures, even through the use of material means.

In regard to emanation from psychical power, the intention regulates the psychical force thrown out.

Endow everything you give out with an electrical principle, then you can effect cures with external things; but unless you can endow them with the psychic principle, they will not produce cures.

The true basis of healing scientifically is to be something, and then do something because you are something. It is utterly impossible to carry a spiritual influence anywhere without that spiritual influence doing its work. The emanation from an individual is what it is because he is what he is. It does what it does because the individual is in the condition he is. All the work of giving treatments, as usually practiced, is a limited phase of the "gift of healing."

We can endow whatever we touch with a psychical quality which we impart to it; and this psychical quality can be imparted by the administerer to the receiver. A great many people are healed through these agencies.

It is this psychic faculty which has made it possible for the performance of the cures ascribed to shrines, amulets, magnetized paper, and fetiches of every sort.

People are influenced by both the mental and physical emanations which others have thrown into these receptacles.

Every person gives out a psychical emanation, which is the direct result of his present condition.

On the spiritual plane, one who is living in the higher thought constantly, projects that thought continually—just as beautiful flowers give out the fragrance which properly belongs to them. But you cannot get the odor of a rose from an onion. Aura partakes of the chemical constitution of the individual, exactly as in the case of a flower. It is just so on the plane of thought—one must be something in order to do something; and being what he is, he does what he does. You simply give out what you have within—the result of what you really are.

We always get our best thoughts most readily in tranquil places where people have thrust out good or wise thoughts.

MEDITATION.

We give out whatever we possess; we cannot help it. Our emanations must be in accordance with our centre. We do not lose anything or become depleted by giving out emanations, for we receive on the one hand as we give on the other.

THE REAL EGO—ATMA.

There are four distinct planes of life: the sensual, the intellectual, the moral and the spiritual.

In the region of sense-consciousness, man lives a physical life; a well-ordered physical life is proper, on the physical plane.

There are two distinct elements manifested on all planes of human nature; the one the emotional, the other the intellectual; both of which need to be taken into account.

What is life? We are not inquiring What are lives? but What is the one life? and how may we discover it? Man is to reveal his soul. The soul is within, but is capable of unlimited expansion. The spirit cannot be put into man, but must be brought out of him. It is not as though the Holy Spirit were a surgeon, going to perform a surgical operation and take an old heart out. Within the old nature of the man is to be found the new. Like the evolution of the butterfly from the grub.

I shall never find all there is to find in my soul—in this stage of existence.

When you are introduced to your own soul, you will find it is simply your own higher self.

Properly speaking, there is no such thing as a physical sense or a physical faculty. The five so-called bodily senses are only five modes of sensing things which can be sensed spiritually.

It is I who smell—not my nostrils. I may feel through my fingers, etc.; but I am the seer, the hearer, etc. My body has no ability to do anything.

There is but one sensorium: there are five distinct ways by which unitary sensation expresses itself.

The whole intellectual process is summed up when you say, "I know it!"

"Melchizedek" does not refer to an individual, but to the life principle of man—the real Ego.

Whatever is from eternity, is to eternity!

Does everything live forever? No; only that which partakes of the quality of Divinity can live forever.

Man is immortal by virtue of his possession of the in-dwelling principle of Divinity.

Man has but one being, but he may have many existences.

The true Ego works through the brain, whether it be in a healthy or unhealthy condition. The brain is simply the vehicle through which the intelligent entity expresses itself outwardly.

"Atma" is the term for the Divinity within.

Atma—the essential spiritual principle—may become so unfolded that it will entirely dominate the material senses,—it is thus unfolded in those who may be called "Mahatmas." Mahatmas are those in whom Atma (Divine principle) is unusually unfolded. Those through whom the soul is more than usually expressed. They stand upon mountain heights. A mountain is climbed through continuous, persistent effort. Upon the top of the mountain a vision is obtained which cannot be viewed by those on the plains; from this similitude arises the title "Himalayan Brothers."

To speak something into manifestation is to cause its inward form to appear in external shape. There is a distinction between form and shape. The external shape is the outward similitude; the interior form remains forever the same. Therefore, shapes come and go, form never changes.

As form ever exists, there never will or can come a time when there will be no human form.

The shape can be spoken into existence through the operation of the Law of Vibration. Man can create and destroy shapes, but man has no power over form —either to produce or annihilate it.

Form itself is eternal, immortal; and the corresponding shape answers more or less perfectly to that form.

Things which are unseen by the mortal eye are easily seen by the eye of the spiritual body. Things unheard by the fleshly ear are clearly heard by the spiritual ear.

If people would only study the interior meaning of things, they would greatly improve their phraseology.

The human structure renews itself from within. When our work on this plane is completed, we shall pass away; not that you will be obliged to go, your body will not be taken from you. There will be no ravaging disease, no pain; you will simply let your body go. It will be immediate yet tranquil disintegration.

There is no such thing as a separation of principles at physical death. Death simply means dropping the material body. Death to old conditions and birth to the new, is a change which may take place in this world—a death unto carnality and birth unto spirituality.

There is no separation of principles in reality, but the transmutation of the lower into the higher. The moment we can see that there is a transformation or transmutation of the lower into the higher, we have solved the mystery, we have overcome death!

There is no essential difference between the condition of the spirit after dropping the body and the sleeping condition every night. If we could but understand what we do when we are asleep—where we go when asleep—we could very well say that what is called death is but a continuation of sleep.

According to the teaching of electrical physiology, the germ of our organization does not change; it vitalizes the new organization, which will be made up of new combinations of elements.

All that is necessary to restore a person to health is to arouse the electrical germ to activity. A person in a state of perfect health—in what condition is he? The electrical germ at the centre of his being is so active that it fully vitalizes the whole system, and then life overflows; the individual is so vitalized, so electrified, that he radiates life wherever he goes. He is in a harmonious electrical condition. If such a one comes into your room, he will leave his psychical emanations there—wherever he has stopped, upon whatever he has touched. You feel much stronger than before, much brighter and more cheerful, after the visit of such a person.

One who lives according to Divine Law, must have this overplus of vitality, and therefore is a spontaneous healer.

MEDITATION.

Man, while a unit, manifests on many different planes.

"King of Salem" means he who rules in Peace. No one can attain to this peace until he has found his soul.

Our own soul is God's messenger in us!

Do as God tells you in your own soul! Take any question—no matter how trivial the inquiry may be—into the silence, and receive the Divine response. As people come more and more into the presence of their own higher selves, they will know where to find a counsellor and advisor, at all times.

A man must get acquainted with his own soul before he can be truly influential. One who does this can discover how to live in divine harmony in all conditions.

Every psyche can take care of its own body if left to its work uninterruptedly.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

Whatever we cannot destroy is good, for good only is permanent.

DREAMING TRUE.

In dreams and visions to-day, as in olden times, man may see what is before him. Any one may be as Joseph.

But anybody can dream—anybody can have a vision, like Pharaoh and his butler and baker- they could dream, but knew not the meaning thereof. Joseph not only could dream, but was able to see the interpretation of his own dreams, and theirs also.

Some will say, "If a deluge is coming, what good does it do for us to know it? Are we benefited by crossing bridges before we come to them?" Such reasoning is no reasoning at all: it is specious fallacy and mere sophistry, for there is no analogy.

In regard to the approaching seven years of scarcity: during the seven years of plenty, enough might have been saved up to last the nation through the years of famine; all might have made the same provision that Joseph did. This is a pictorial lesson of vast import.

The state of dreaming is an evidence of man's psychical consciousness. While most of us dream false or imperfectly, there are some who dream true; we all dream true occasionally.

We talk of composing ourselves to go to sleep. You can go to bed with an uncomfortable thought, but do not allow yourself to go to sleep with it.

No one should ever allow himself to sleep without first putting his mental house in order. Never allow the shadows of night to fall until you have put out of your mind every discordant thought. Fumigate your mental apartments by putting yourselves into right mental attitude; cleanse your mental apartments; banish mental microbes!

Do not most of us retire at night in a flippant way? How many people think that it is really necessary to take thought about it? How many of us are careful about our mental clothing? We are very particular as to the care of our bodies, priding ourselves upon our cleanliness, putting on clean linen every day, etc.; but that is only skin deep. What about our thoughts? Of the two, it is better to have a clean heart and dirty hands, than clean hands and a dirty mind. A person's occupation may be of such a character that he is obliged to get his hands and clothes soiled; circumstances greatly control these things. But there are no conditions in which we cannot govern our thoughts; circumstance, surrounding environment, matters not at all in this regard.

Again—about sleeping with your head in a certain position—this cannot always be regulated, as when travelling. People must give up all such puerilities, if they wish to become rightly related to the spiritual universe. It is bondage to things which causes all the sickness in the world. The mental condition attracts all things—according to its attitude. The mental condition must have its corresponding effect upon the physical condition.

About dreams: bad dreams are usually attributed to late suppers, etc.; it may be so, if a person is in the mental condition to make a supper disagree with him. It depends altogether upon the mental condition. But one thing is certain: it is never safe to retire to rest with even an uncomfortable thought!

During the night—in the subjective, negative state—people do not know what influences they are open to. No end of mental and physical ailments result from bad dreams and insomnia. Wrong thought makes people ill through their dreams, causing a feeling of illness or languor in the morning.

We not only must remain positive during the day, but must maintain that mental attitude upon going to sleep.

At night, we are in the condition to draw towards us whatever we please—by going to sleep in the proper mental state.

We are magnets! Take a mental bath every night before going to bed. Put away from you everything that could be a magnet to attract what is bad or unpleasant.

The mind in a chaotic condition will cause confused dreams. One needs to be in a perfectly healthy, well-balanced condition, to be able to dream true—not dreaming of missing trains, and a good deal else that is hysteria.

You cannot get into a condition for dreaming true until you are in peace and harmony with all around you.

Instead of always jumping to the conclusion that people you misunderstand are unkind, calmly ask for an explanation; when you do this in a quiet, calm way, errors may very often be explained away. This calm, quiet attitude prevents great misery.

It is a most dangerous thing to go to bed having a good cry over some grief or misunderstanding, drawing all the depressing influences that such a state must needs attract. The best way is to have an understanding—clear the atmosphere; sometimes it takes an electrical storm to do this.

Thinking that people wish to injure us is usually a symptom of hysteria. Hysteria is the high road to insanity.

If cats keep one awake, his mental state is not very far developed. We should not throw a boot-jack at the cats, but throw it at ourselves—mentally.

By placing ourselves en rapport with any thing or any place we choose to select before going to sleep, we can draw to us during sleep the influences which we desire to relate ourselves with.

A dream, ordinarily, is not a vision. A dream is a reflection; whatever we dream or image, we reflect. A true dream is a true reflection, while a false dream is a false reflection. The original meaning of a dream was "a vision of the night"—not what people usually call dreams in their present ignorance.

Vision means a sight of something. We may have visions in the night—and also in the day, when we are awake. There is undoubtedly a distinction between a dream and a vision. Now, what is a dream? There is actually a dream-life. We travel while we sleep.

We may travel, or remain stationary where we are; but we can become related to anything we choose by concentrating our thought steadily upon it.

Man is capable of living in other worlds during sleep.

When people talk of another world, they often think of a long, attenuated cord stretching out into space to other worlds.

We should not say "the other world and this," but "the other side of this."

Let us understand the distinction between the subjective and objective—man's dual mind. Let us go over onto the other side. When we are in the subjective, let us go over to the objective; and when we are in the objective, let us go over to the subjective state. The subjective is simply the unseen.

The word "unconscious" is greatly misapplied; instead, we should say, a person passes from one plane of consciousness to another.

When people give puerile little interpretations to great words, they do things as absurd as did the Millerites.

Extended perception—the definition of this faculty of going to chosen places during sleep—may be developed. When liberated from the mental state of thraldom, the mind can travel where it will. Thus, it is well to use the night-time for the process of attraction.

Do not try to go anywhere, in the sense of making a journey, but resolve to relate yourself with what you wish to know. We can relate ourselves with anything in the universe; but full expectation must go with this effort.

At night, we have withdrawn from the ordinary occupations of the day. That simple withdrawal gives us a chance to contemplate spiritual things, causes us to be receptive to the spiritual; it is thus that people have experiences during the night, which they do not have during the day.

In regard to going to sleep in order to see one's self in some other position or plane, it is sometimes asked, "Why do we not see the angels during the day, as well as during the night?" Why do we not see the stars during the day?

When we speak of regulating our dreams, we must always recollect that we cannot govern everything at first—on a psychic plane—as long as we are living here on the material plane in states of comparative bondage.

We have first to gain victories over things lying nearest to us.

We can get anything during sleep by holding for it before going to sleep—persistently. People may relate themselves, on the psychical plane, to the very sources of knowledge, and so absorb information at night that they can use it by day.

Knowledge during sleep soaks into one, as it were. It starts with the interior and works out if not interrupted, to the extremest plane of objective consciousness.

These things which are taken into the subjective entity during sleep may not be apparent to the outer consciousness at first, but they will come forth as they are needed.

Many things are not remembered on the objective plane, but the effect of our having undergone an experience is just as real, whether we have any recollection of it, or not. This is true in relation to true dreaming, when consciousness is functioning on the psychical plane.

"We are such stuff

As dreams are made of, and our little life

Is rounded with a sleep."

PSYCHICAL UNFOLDMENT.

Anybody can develop the psychic temperament who chooses. Some people are born with a much greater development than others, but it is embryotic in us all. We all have it potentially, but to express it is a matter of unfoldment.

There are far more distinct temperaments than are usually regarded; very few people understand the psychic temperament. The psychic temperament is peculiar to itself; it is one which has to be judiciously cultivated, in order to get the best effects. It is the temperament which is necessary for unusual success along psychical lines.

It requires some development of the psychical faculty to give mental treatments. The ability to give mental treatments successfully is a result of growth or development.

Some children are born with the psychical faculty developed to a marked degree. People who possess this temperament are usually considered highly nervous; but their nervousness is normal, not abnormal. It is simply that their nerves are unusually active; they may be highly strung. This unusual sensitiveness may prove either a blessing or a curse. If it is physiological, it is a very great blessing; if pathological, it is a curse. The rate of vibration with such people is decidedly higher than the average; their pulses beat more quickly; their blood circulates more rapidly. If you take the temperature of the body of a person of the psychical temperament, you find the temperature and pulse above the normal standard. The pulse beats quickly, yet the person is perfectly well; it is not a pathological condition, it is purely physiological.

It has been proved that some psychics can play tricks—for the sake of experiment—with their own pulse, putting it up very much higher than usual, and also putting it down below the normal rate with them.

The development of the psychic faculty is of the utmost importance to the human family, because it can show us the inside of things we come in contact with. It teaches us to be utterly unprejudiced; not to judge from appearances in reading people, but through discernment of interior qualities.

Woman, from her introspective position, has had more opportunities to unfold her psychical power than man; this explains why she has come to the front, in many directions at the present time.

Woman's function of maternity gives her a psychic development that man does not naturally so soon unfold, owing to his different capacities.

The opening up of the psychic faculty is sure to take place naturally when one is truly individualized.

When we come into realization of our psychic power, we will find it only the intensification of powers already possessed.

The more we trust in any faculty the more we unfold it. Allow the faculties to grow and increase naturally and normally, in the same way that everything in nature appears and develops.

Instead of looking upon what we call psychic endowments and spiritual gifts as the property of the few, these will be revealed in the majority, in times to come. What are now called exceptional psychic endowments will become universal. Psychical endowments belong to the race, they pertain to humanity; but such powers need, as seeds require, opportunities for development.

The psychical element in man is as natural as the physical vision, or taste, or smell, or touch.

The masses of people do not need special psychic gifts. Those who are satisfied without them do not need them; but just as soon as we desire psychical powers, then we require them.

There comes a time when these gifts within us stir themselves; they make themselves felt.

If psychical perception becomes universal, it will be of no use for any one to tell an untruth, because no one will be deceived by it. And it will be exactly the same in any endeavor to palm off the false for the true, in any case. Forgery, therefore, will be a lost art.

The modus operandi of psychical development is exactly similar to that of physical development—constant use, but never over-exertion. Never strive to do work that is too difficult; no straining of the faculties, but constant use and steady thought, fixity of purpose. Sight unfolds through recognition and exercise. Even physical sight may be brought to phenomenal functioning by recognizing the gift—allowing it to develop by constant use and expectation.

All the physical senses may be largely developed by training, even to a phenomenal degree.

But, in all culture, there must be no strain after arduous effects; the moment of strain results in injury.

The psychic faculty unfolds wherever it has the opportunity to do so. The power is within every one; so there is no process for acquiring it, but there is a process for unfolding it.

Many people organize what they call "developing circles." They "sit" together, holding each other's hands; and expect—by some kind of physical contact —to develop some special spiritual gift. They are looking for the so-called psychical phenomena, which are producing so profound an impression upon many minds of the present age. But we find, to-day, that the more intelligent people who are interested in psychical research, are dispensing with extraneous methods. The gift merely needs to be permitted to unfold.

Permission to unfold the psychic faculty is what every natural child wants when that child demands mental liberty.

We do not recognize any danger in seeking psychic development. There is no danger when we learn to discipline our forces. But it is better to get beaten once in a while than never to obtain knowledge. There is danger in being prompted by an unworthy motive; and that is all the danger there is.

By deliberate cultivation of the psychic power, one can do a greater amount of work with a smaller amount of energy.

Whenever you endeavor to unfold any psychical power within you, put yourself into the easiest attitude possible. There is no need of making any effort. Do not take any strained mental attitude.

Wearing too much clothing, or anything which binds or presses, wastes the forces or prevents their harmonious outflow.

It is not what we do, in the sense of our occupation, but it is the frittering away of our forces which wearies us. Some people are always moving their hands or their feet. This occasions loss of psychic power, shows an abnormal state of the mind, depletes the psychic force.

It is certain that one can give undivided attention to only one thing at a time.

We are not conscious of the subjective life going on all around us, when engaged with our usual avocations.

On the psychical plane, we cannot be judged by our dress, or by any external appearance.

As the universe expands to us, we shall enjoy all we have already had, and vastly more added. As our faculties ever grow, more and more transcendent revelations will come to us, so that we shall grow to be so completely at home in the psychic realm that the veil of mystery will be rent in twain, and what was formerly regarded unknowable will be freely known.

The possession of spiritual power of attainment is universal. It is not necessary that we should be acquainted with all the contents of our being. The containment of our nature is vastly more than our knowledge of that containment. We have within us abilities that we know not of. As we come to know these more and more, the universe becomes wider to us.

On the psychical plane—on the subjective plane—the more you can see and hear the better. There are those who say it is wrong to attempt to pry into God's secrets. If God has any secrets that he doesn't wish us to know, we may be sure that he has guarded them so carefully that we could not pry into them if we wished.

Whatever psychic endowment one may possess, let him give it freedom, and never allow himself to be influenced by the scarecrowism in the world. There is no danger in searching into the psychic realm, if one's motives be pure. It will unfold more and more.

It will drive away the blues and sickness; it will do away with all sense of loss and bereavement; and it will enable us to acknowledge that every wonder of the olden times can be duplicated at the present day.

Wherever you can have the most privacy—whenever you can feel quiet, alone, or in company with some congenial friend or friends—put yourself into the most comfortable attitude, and allow yourself to drink in whatever may come to you. Let there be no straining, no forced exercise of the will, no trying to grasp something difficult to catch, but a perfectly quiet, receptive attitude, as of one who enters a theatre to witness dissolving views. The curtain has not yet risen, you see now only the blank screen; as you sit quietly in your place, you make observations.

If you like, take—in the bright light—a glass of pure water, and watch for what may appear upon its surface. The fixing of the eyes on the water secures the needed concentration. All such things may be of some aid, for the sake of helping the concentration of the mind.

Sit quietly waiting for what may come; make observation of what comes. Make no definite statement until it has already appeared; then, when it has clearly come, merely make note of it.

MEDITATIONS.

We carry onto the psychic plane exactly what we encourage and foster on the material plane.

When a man is unfolded on the psychic plane, the powers he has heretofore possessed become infinitely expanded.

Every spiritual endowment is just as naturally the right of mankind as intellectual or physical endowments.

Every man who truly seeks it shall find the mystic key, whereby he can cause the spiritual gate within him to turn on its hinges and reveal to him his real immortal selfhood.

It is of no use for anybody to attempt to use psychic power until he is truly individualized. When you are truly individualized, you have realized that you dare to go directly to the heart of the universe—directly to the Infinite Spirit.

As long as one submits to any form of tyranny, one cannot become truly psychic, much less spiritual in the higher sense.

All processes are mental; all victories are mental, and all defeats are mental. That cause which appears material can be at most only a secondary cause. Accompanying phenomena should not be confounded with consequent phenomena.

There is no use in trying to force anything until its time comes. When the hour for anything strikes the will to procure it is present.

SPIRITISM.

Clairvoyance and clairaudience have always been conspicuous among those who were prophets. Clairvoyance may cover nearly all the territory of spiritualism.

It is not probable that spirits on higher planes know anything about our material conditions, but they read our thoughts.

When people endeavor to become mediums—as generally understood—the manifestations they receive may be genuine, but they try to get the spirit world to come down to their state, not to bring themselves to a higher plane. The higher spiritualism is the reverse. Only the lower spiritualism is trying to bring the spirits down to the earth plane. Instead of trying to get the spiritual to manifest to the senses, we should endeavor to ascend—not asking the spiritual world to descend.

The lower spiritualism is merely catering to our senses.

The most truly spiritual persons never get any physical manifestations whatever, never see anything with the material eye.

When you come down to material sense, what messages do you receive? Only platitudes!

Think of the knowledge to be gained from the higher relationship! When we come into that higher spiritual relationship, we may become inventors, artists, authors, on planes not yet imagined.

The mere fact of people going into particular places will not attract spiritual influences. It is the mental state, the motive, which always serves as the magnet.

The ordinary theory in the world is that there is necessarily invocation, in order to bring the spirits near to us; we hear of "spirit return," etc. If people only understood how to express themselves, they would be able to approach the subject intelligently.

We have nothing whatever to do with inviting "spirit return." The whole thing that concerns us, as scientific investigators is a change in our own consciousness, affording conditions for spiritual perception and demonstration. It is only a question of the opening up of our own perception.

There is an element of disordered imagination, a great deal of hysteria, in so-called spiritual and psychic experiences, until the desire for mere phenomena yields to a genuine craving for absolute truth.

Beware how you have any dealings with the "familiar spirits" of self-seeking persons. The expression "familiar spirits" is a very significant one. This is applicable where the motive is money, or other unworthy object.

Speaking of "obsession," it is because people acknowledge everything but the universal spirit of good that they are subject to obsessions.

It is not to be denied that the phenomena of obsession are genuine. We believe the accounts in the Bible—that undeveloped influences were present and that Jesus and his apostles turned them out. But the cause for any such experience is nothing but false belief. The recognition of truth is the only antidote.

Supposing one is very sensitive or mediumistic, why cannot such an one polarize himself, so that he will draw toward him always the good? Right polarization is most important in mediumship.

Let people place their confidence in the good and in the true. This is what everyone must do in order to put himself into right relationship with the universe.

Divided attention has a great deal to do with all unpleasant psychic phenomena. When we put ourselves into the subjective condition with the deliberate intention of gaining knowledge, it will come to us.

You have only yourself to blame if you have disagreeable influences around you; you can keep only what you attract.

It is not to be understood, however, that these influences might not still be in your vicinity; they could be near that you might teach them.

We are sure that there are individual communications with spirits as we are sure of anything.

MEDITATION.

If people are spiritually developed, they cannot be deceived; when holding for the truly spiritual and nothing else.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

We cannot conceive an idea of a state of life that is not expressed somewhere.

ELECTIVE AFFINITY.

Once grasp the Law of Elective Affinity, and the cause of spiritual phenomena will be clearly understood.

We do not usually come into psychical relation with things, but with people; and we may often see objects surrounding the persons in psychical relation with us.

We may not be able to put ourselves en rapport with mere things, but with persons who may be in certain places, at certain times; and through our harmony with them we can become familiar with their surroundings.

We should endeavor to put ourselves in relation with some person and go with him, when we wish to see a certain place, or obtain certain knowledge. It is one human being en rapport with another human being, not a man with an inanimate object. This rapport may be entirely unconscious or involuntary on both sides.

Two persons may be in natural affinity, like two harps attuned together; if one is struck, the other responds. This sympathy or affinity is not the result of flesh and blood relationship; it is a spiritual kinship. We can encourage it; we can intensify it, perhaps; but it must be inate to begin with.

We get results proportionate to our mental states. We can put ourselves en rapport, at will, with whatever we desire to communicate with, if we take the right mental attitude.

REFLECTION.

One prime requisite is always necessary—the perfect love of truth; we are then invading the psychic realm in safety.

AURAS—PSYCHICAL ENVIRONMENT.

Most people when they talk of environment, surroundings, and circumstances—which all mean the same—refer to these things as something over which they can exercise no control, as governing factors in their lives. You can make your own environments, surroundings and circumstances. You are surrounded with a psychic envelope which is primarily your encircling habitation.

The aura belongs to the individual just the same as feathers belong to a bird.

It is the particular aura of the individual that conditions his work. If you know how to generate an aura, you can go to work and generate any circumstance you please.

You can bring into your daily life the things and places you will, if you go out on the psychical current. You will find many circles, many planes of existence. When you get onto a plane above your ordinary one, your soul is at home on that plane; to the psychical faculty that plane is real and seen.

If you allow yourself to go out onto the psychical current—if you go naturally—you will feel a great deal stronger, have a much greater power of endurance, with much less expenditure of force; you will generate force much more rapidly and recuperate much more readily.

When you can read the auras of different people, you can tell at once if you can help them. If their auras blend with yours, there can be psychical relation to mutual advantage, but not otherwise.

Those with coarse auras may heal a great many people on the animal plane; but in all cases of high-strung people they would fail. Very sensitive people could not bear such a one to come into their presence. Different people are reached on their different planes; that is why no ordinary healers can reach all cases.

When you feel your aura draw back into yourself, the conditions are not harmonious; you will not blend with any person from whom you feel like drawing away instinctively. It is always well to respect this instinct.

If you can realize the aura, where the auras of different individuals blend, there it is easy to effect telepathic communication; and the same applies equally to mental healing.

We find as we study into the psychic realm that we can wear just what we please psychically.

On the external plane, everything corresponds exactly to the psychical plane.

The word "raiment" is a varied form of "*ray*ment." It is, properly speaking, rayment, radiation. The halo or nimbus encircling the head of a saint is in accord with this idea.

This radiation must proceed from the individual himself.

A person can be mentally surrounded by whatsoever radiation he himself gives out.

Nothing is here for us that we do not take in through our own perception.

Every one can make his own immediate environment. Can clothe himself with his own shell.

We can also, by means of this aura, gain access to the external world, so that we can take into our own world what we wish, and keep out whatever we do not desire. Man may really be compared to a bivalve; he can shut out or take in whatever he pleases.

We make our own world in two ways. By radiating we develop from within outward; we unfold and give out, and surround ourselves with our own radiations. Also, we attract to us whatever we desire to possess, provided we confidently expect it.

Just as we can take what suits us from the different kinds of food placed before us, so we can draw from the atmosphere the kind of emanations suited to our various needs.

Any one can choose his own surroundings, on the psychic plane.

There is a spiritual world in which we are now living. When we are concentrated upon any special object, we are oblivious to all other objects for the time being. There is a scientific reason for this which immediately suggests itself to the reflective student.

MEDITATION.

Whatever we want is a little more than what we already have—something that if we did not have it within us, we should not conceive of.

The moment people undertake to make their own world, they can have any kind of a world that they like, for one's own world is a surrounding atmosphere, a portable environment.

GOLDEN MOTTO.

The reality of everything is spiritual.

In the Quarries.

There lie many gems of eloquence, many sparkling rays of genius, many practical thoughts and expressions, which if brought to the surface would prove of essential service to the Craft. These valuable treasures should not be left to lie in the rubbish and be covered with the dust of ages and forgotten. These writings of the wisest and best Masonic scholars, words of wisdom expressed by men of age and experience, ought to be garnered into storehouses where all can have access whence to draw "more light" to illuminate the pathway of the worker in the Masonic quarries. A library of rich treasures of Craft literature, would prove of essential benefit to the seeker after knowledge, and would be to him a school of instruction, whence he could derive inspiration as refreshing as that to the weary traveler who slakes his thirst at the fountain of sparkling waters.—Comps. George J. Gardner and Charles T. Mitchell.—Cor. Report Grand Chapter, New York, 1890.

Directions for Ordering.

Send Express or Post Office Money Order for the amount of your purchase, and the goods will be sent immediately, subject to approval. They can be exchanged or returned when your money will be refunded; or, by sending one-fourth of the amount, on deposit, they will be sent by express subject to inspection and approval. Or if desired for use on our Circulating Library Plan; send us the price of the book, and we will prepay postage to you. After reading return it to us carefully protected and we will return the money (except on paper bindings,) less the postage we have paid on it, and 10 % for the first month's use, and 5 % for each additional month. (For further infomation regarding "Library Plan" see last page of this catalogue.

All goods are guaranteed to be as represented.

MASONIC HISTORY
and
VALUABLE LITERATURE

Ancient Mysteries and Modern Masonry. The Mysteries-Egyptian, Hindu, Persian, Druidical, Gothic, Grecian, Jewish and Christian, their Origin and Objects; the Meaning of True Initiation, Origin and History of Freemasonry, Knights Templars, Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite, and the Symbols and Legends of Masonry; in 12 Lectures, given in Pullman Memorial Church, Albion, N. Y., Rev. Charles H. Vail, 32°. Over 200 pages. Extra fine binding, silk cloth and gilt stamps. No. 22056.....$1.00
Paper 22060 ..... .75

Ancient Mystic Oriental Masonry. Its Teachings, Rules, Laws and Present Usages which govern the Order at the present day. Dr. R. Swinburne Clymer. Cloth, No. 22086..... 1.50

Ancient Constitutions of Freemasons. Verbatim copy of the original edition of 1723, containing the History, Laws, Charges, Orders, Regulations and Usages, together with a collection of old Masonic Songs and Music. Anderson. (An orignal in good condition is worth $65.00.) No. 22081.....1.00

Antiquities of Freemasonry. Comprising Illustrations of the Five Grand Periods of Masonry, from the Creation of the World to the Dedication of King Solomon's Temple; including chapters on Masonic Tradition, Masonry from the Creation to the time of Enoch, Origin of Arts and Sciences, Masonry from Enoch to the Deluge, Idolatrous Mysteries as contrasted with Freemasonry, Masonry from the Deluge to Isaac, Symbolic Instruction, Masonry from Isaac to the Deliverance from Egyptian Captivity, Five Points of Fellowship, Masonry from the Deliverance to the Dedication of King Solomon's Temple. Illustrated. Rev. George Oliver, D. D. Blue cloth, gilt, 5½x8¼, 242 pgs, No. 22091.....1.50

Cyclopedia of Fraternities, The. Including the Origin, Purposes, Growth, History and Statistics of 600 or more societies. By Albert C. Stevens assisted by more than a 1000 members of various Orders. Complete in one Vol., 468 pgs. Illustrated by Charts and Maps. Cloth, No. 22411.....4.50

Egypt the Cradle of Ancient Masonry. Comprising a History of Egypt, with a comprehensive and authentic account of the Antiquity of Masonry, the result of many years of personal investigation and exhaustive research in India, Persia, Syria and the Valley of the Nile. Norman F. de Clifford. Beautifully illustrated,
Art Canvass binding, 2 vol., 9x12. 644 pgs, No. 22421.... 6.75
Half American Morocco, 2 vol., " " " No. 22423.... 7.50
Full American Morocco, 2 vol., " " " No. 22424.... 10.00
Full Persian Morocco, 1 vol., " " " No. 22425.... 10.00

Egyptian Symbols, A Comparison with those of theHebrews. Including Principle of Symbology, Application to Egyptian Symbols, to the Symbols of Color and to the Symbols of the Bible. A clear, concise exposition of a most interesting subject, by Frederick Portal. Translated from the French, by John W. Simons. Illustrated.
No. 22381..... 1.00

Encyclopedia. By A. G. Mackey, D. D. Revised and enlarged with new Subjects, Pronouncing Dictionary. Masonic Scripture Names etc. C. T. McClenachan. Cloth No. 22401.....4.50
Library Sheep, No. 22402.....6.00
Half Russia, Gilt Top, No. 22405.....6.50
Full Morocco, No. 22404.....8.00
Two Vol. Edition, No. 22406.....11.00

Genius of Freemasonry, The, and the 20th Century Crusade. For the good of Masonry, and in the interest of Freedom and Fraternity, Light, Liberty and Love; against Ignorance, Superstition and Fear, Despotism and Jesuitism. J. D. Buck. Cloth. bound.
339 pgs. No. 22656.....1.00

History and Cyclopedia, Illustrated. An Account of the Rise and Progress of Freemasonry. Definitions of Technical Terms used by the Fraternity; also "A Complete Dictionary of Symbolic Masonry" George Oliver, D. D. and Robert Macoy, 33°,
717 pgs, 222 engravings. Full Art Canvass, No. 22391.....2.75
Library Sheep, Marble Edge, No. 22392.....3.00
Half American Russia, Gilt Top, No. 22395.....3.25
Half American Morocco, Full Gilt, No. 22393.....3.50
Full American Russia, Full Gilt, No. 22397.....4.25
Full American Morocco, Full Gilt, No. 22394.....5.75
Full Persian Morocco, Full Gilt, No. 22398.....8.50

History of Initiation. In Twelve Lectures: General Introduction, History of Initiation in Hindustan, Philosophy of the Eastern Mysteries, Initiation in Persia, Initiation in Greece, Ceremonies of Initiation into the Mysteries of Bacchus, the Celtic Mysteries, Ceremonies in Britain, Symbols and Doctrines of the Druids, Gothic Mysteries, Doctrines and Morality, History of Initiation in America, comprising the Rites, Ceremonies and Doctrines of all the Secret and Mysterious Institutions of the Ancient World. Rev. George Oliver, D. D. Illustrated, 218 pgs. Blue cloth and gilt stamps, 5¼x8¼, gilt. No. 22801..... 1.50

History of Freemasonry, from the Building of the House of the Lord, and its progress throughout the civilized world, down to the present time; to which is added a History of the Craft in the United States, J. W. S. Mitchell, M. D., P. G. M., P. G. H. P., and P. E. C. Two magnificent volumes of 1500 pgs., royal octavo, 6½x9½ inches, bound in Emblematic Blue Silk Linen. Embossed with jewels in silver, complete, No. 22781.....4.00
Sheep, Library style, No. 22782.....5.00
Morocco (dark red) Jewels in gold, No. 22784.....6.00

Historical Landmarks, Geo. Oliver. The body of this work is of itself one of the greatest contributions to Masonic literature; while the annotations on the original text, by Dr. Oliver, add immensely to its value. There is a fine steel likeness of the author expressly engraved for the American edition, besides the many beautiful illustrations with which this great masterpiece of Masonic writing abounds. Two volumes in one. 1000 pages, 6½ x 9½ No. 22723.....4.00

History of the Knights Templar. C. G. Addison. A condensed narrative or History of the Great Crusades; a thrilling account of the longest and hardest struggle for freedom of Christian principles that the world has ever known. No such zeal and ardor have ever been recorded; no such battles have ever been fought in ancient or modern times; no such persecutions, martyrdom and suffering for any cause as those endured by the Crusaders to whom we owe our beautiful system of Templarism.

The work is also a record of events in connection with the Orders, from those strenuous times to the present date, containing the proceedings of Triennial Encampments down to and including the 30th, at Saratoga in 1907. Some of these original proceedings are very scarce, and only to be found in rare collections.

Full art canvas No. 22811.....3.25
Library sheep. No. 22812.....3.50
Half American Russia. No. 22818.....3.75
Half American Morocco. No. 22813.....4.00
Full American Russia. No. 22819.....4.75
Full American Morocco. No. 22814.....5.00
Full Persian Morocco. No. 22817.....8.75

History of Freemasonry, A Concise. Robt. F. Gould. A most reliable comprehensive and valuable book. 559 pgs. 36 Columns of index. Nearly 200 illustrations, many of them beautiful half tone engravings. Cloth. No. 22771.....2.75
Library Sheep, No. 22772.....4.00
Half Moroco, No. 22773.....3.75
Full Morocco, No. 22774.....4.75
Levant Morocco, No. 22775.....8.50

Irish Prince and Hebrew Prophet, a Masonic Tale of the Captive Jews and the Ark of the Covenant. A most interesting book. By the author of "The Jericho Papers." 300 pgs., 6 x 9½, No. 23001.....1.50

Lexicon of Freemasonry, containing a definition of all its Communicable Terms, notices of its History, Traditions, and Antiquities, and an account of all the Rites and Mysteries of the Ancient World. A. G. Mackey, 526 pgs. No. 23161.....3.00

Lights and Shadows of the Mystic Tie. Consisting of absorbing Masonic tales—romantic, tragic and humorous; a few of which are: The Masonic Breastpin, a thrilling Indian story; Death on the Sierra Nevada; Catherine Williams or Husband and Wife; The Church Trial, or "Jynin," the Masons; Stone-Squarer's Lodge No. 91; The Broken Tessera; Three Buds of Sweet Briar; The Echo and the Flute; and more than a hundred other stories, sketches, anecdotes, opinions, songs and poems, illustrating the character and tendency of Freemasonry, including Robert Burns' Farewell to Masons. Rob. Morris and Albert G. Mackey, 624 pgs. illustrated, beautifully bound in blue and gold. No. 23181.... 2.50

Lodge Goat and Goat Rides, The. More than a thousand anecdotes, incidents and illustrations from the humorous side of Lodge life. Compiled and edited by James Pettibone. 600 pgs. Cloth. No. 23191.....2.00

Low Twelve. Edward S. Ellis, A. M. A book of thrilling and impressive stories of Masonic bravery and loyalty, told with that accuracy and charming style which has given Mr. Ellis such world-wide popularity. Half-tone Illustrations. No. 23221....1.50
Full Leather, a fine gift book. No. 23224.....2.50

Lost Word Found, The. "The most compelling bit of literature yet presented by Dr. Buck, and unlike anything ever written concerning the mystery of the Lost Word." J. D. Buck. 32° No. 23196..... .50

Man of Mount Moriah, The. From Symbolism and Prophecy to Sacrifice and Fulfillment—a wonderfully interesting story of the Grand Architect at the Building of King Solomon's Temple. C. M. Boutelle. Beautifully illustrated, followed by forty pages of the best Masonic and O. E. S. poetry, including Esther, a sacred drama. 334 pgs. Edition after edition has been sold, which enables us to greatly increase the quality and style of the book for serviceable wear and richness of appearance. A choice gift book.
Half Morocco and full gilt. No. 23488.....4.00
Half Russia and full gilt. No. 23487.....3.60
Half Morocco, marble edge. No. 23483.....2.80
Half Russia, marble edge. No. 23486.....2.80
Full Cloth, marble edge. No. 23481.....2.40
Heavy Paper Sides, marble edge. No. 23485.....1.60

Masonic Gem. A collection of Masonic Odes, Poems, etc. A sketch of Esoteric and Exoteric Masonry. Rev. A. E. Alford. Illustrated. No. 23541.....50

Masonic Sketch Book, or Gleanings from the Harvest Field of Masonic Literature. By E. du Laurans. This book covers a great variety of subjects and includes some of the choicest work of our best Masonic writers, as well as many valuable and interesting articles by the author. Full gilt sides and edges. 345 pgs. 6 x 9 Illustrated. No. 23291.....2.00

Masonic Token. William T. Anderson. A gift book for all seasons. Full gilt sides and edges. Embellished with upwards of thirty illustrations, the letter-press being from the pens of a large number of our most gifted authors; especially intended for Masonic home reading. 289 pgs. No. 23311.....2.25

Memphis, Ancient and Primitive Rite. Origin, Introduction and Summary of the History; Excerpts from the Landmarks of the Order, Institution in America, Manifestos, Withdrawal from Orient of France, Treaty, Confederation, Present Status, Degrees, Seals, Emblems etc. J. A. Gotlieb M.A., M.D., L.L.D. No. 22821 1.00

Mission of Masonry, The. Rev. Madison C. Peters. Cloth. No. 23356.....50
Paper. No. 23360.....35

Morals and Dogma, Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite from the 1st, to 33d Degree, by Albert Pike, Grand Commander. This valuable work is the result of years of study, translations from ancient and modern languages, and thousands of dollars expenditure by the author. The Masonic and Theosophical student will find in it a mine of knowledge that can be found nowhere else, and heretofore within the reach of but few. The greatest book ever written or printed about Free Masonry. 861 pgs. 6½x9½. Cloth binding with gold stamps. No. 23361..... 5.25

Mystic Masonry. Explains the Symbols of Freemasonry and their connection with the Greater Mysteries of Antiquity, in which, for centuries, have been concealed the grandest achievements in knowledge ever gained by man, that, through the efforts of Freemasons, may be and are being understood and restored to the world. J. D. Buck, 32°. Illustrated. 260 pgs. No. 23421..... .50

Poetry of Freemasonry. Rob. Morris, L. L. D., Masonic Poet Laureate, with Portrait and Biography of the Author, by his son. Introduction by the Author, and his favorite poem—"We Meet Upon the Level, and Part Upon the Square"—in the original words and later changes, followed by over 500 poems, notes and illustrations, 400 pgs. Of finest book paper. Beautifully embossed cover, 8 x 10½ inches. No. 23281.....2.75
Gold and silver leaf stamping, gilt edges. No. 23285.....3.50

Rose Croix, The. A story of Two Hemispheres. A most interesting novel. David Tod Gilliam. 369 pgs. No. 23946.. 1.60

Rosicrucian Cosmo-conception, The, or Christian Occult Science. An Elementary Treatise upon man's Past Evolution, Present Constitution and Future Development. By Max Heindel, who includes a note of thanks to Dr. Rudolf Steiner and Dr. Alma Von Brandis. "Prove all things."—Paul. 5½ x 7½ 536 pages 14 of Index, Color plate, Illustrations, Diagrams, etc. With Red under Gilt Edges, Green Cloth, Gold and Color Stamps. No. 23896 (A Master Work, worth many times its cost.).... 1.15

Rosicrucians, The. Their Teachings and Mysteries according to the Manifestoes issued at various times by the Fraternity itself. Also some of their Secret Teachings and the Mystery of the Order explained. Bro. R. Swinburne Clymer. 304 pgs. No. 23906..... 3.00

Rosicrucians, Their Rites and Mysteries. Founded on their manifestoes, and on facts and documents collected from the writings of initiated brethren. Hargrave Jennings Illustrated. 464 pages. 6 x 9 No. 23881.....3.50

Sacred Mysteries. Freemasonry in times anterior to the Temple of Solomon. Relics of Mayas and Quiches, 11,500 years ago, their relation to the Sacred Mysteries of Egypt, Greece, Chaldea and India. Augustus Le Plongeon. No. 23956.....2.50

Scarlet Book of Freemasonry. Contains an authentic and thrilling history of the seizure, imprisonment and martyrdom of Free Masons and Knights Templars from A. D. 1275 to the present time; history of the life of the renowned philosopher, Pythagoras, his extraordinary career and tragic death; an account of the late remarkable discoveries of Masonic emblems under the pedestal of an ancient obelisk in Egypt, together with a case of recent persecution and death in that country; also an account of the recent discovery of an ancient temple in Mexico with Masonic emblems. Beautifully illustrated. 548 pages. 6½ x 9
In fine satin cloth and gilt. No. 23981.....3.00
Morocco, gilt edges, very rich. No. 23984.....4.00

Signet of King Solomon, or the Freemason's Daughter. A. C. Arnold. A charming and fascinating story of a "Knight of the Temple" in modern times. Beautifully illustrated. 288 pgs., 6 x 9½. No. 23976.....1.50

Signs and Symbols. Dr. George Oliver. Illustrated and explained in a series of twelve lectures. No. 23986.....1.50

Singular Story of Freemasonry, The. A most attractive concise and interesting little book. W. B Sibley. 4 x 6, 100 pgs. No. 23916.....75

Solomon's Temple. Its History and Structure. Rev. W. Shaw Caldecott, No. 24026.....2.50

Spirit of Freemasonry. Comprising Lectures on the State of Freemasonry in the Eighteenth Century, the Design, Rites, Ceremonies and Institutions of the Ancients, Nature of the Lodge, Furniture, Apparel and Jewels of Masons, Temple at Jerusalem Geometry, Master Mason's Order, Secrecy of Masons, Charity, Brotherly Love, Occupations, and a Corollary; followed by an Appendix containing Charges, Addresses and Orations on various Masonic occasions. William Hutchinson. With copious notes, critical and explanatory, of great value, by the Rev. George Oliver. No. 24021..... 1.50

Swedenborg Rite, and the Great Masonic Leaders of the Eighteenth Century. The Masonic career of Swedenborg and his followers, and the relation between the symbolic system of Swedenborgianism and Modern Freemasonry. Samuel Beswick. No. 24051..... 1.00

Symbolism of Freemasonry. Illustrating and Explaining its Science and Philosophy, its Legends, Myths and Symbols. Mackey. 360 pgs.. No. 24071..... 2.25

Symbol of Glory, showing the Object and End of Freemasonry, in a valedictory and thirteen lectures: Masonic Science, Poetry and Philosophy, Knowledge, Doctrines, Circle and Parallel Meaning, Great Lights, and Masonic Ladder, Theological Virtues and Masonry, Clouded Canopy and Ladder Symbols, Application, Blazing Star, Symbol of Glory, etc. Rev. George Oliver. 298 pgs., cloth, black and gold stamps. No. 24061..... 1.50

Tradition, Origin and Early History of Freemasonry. An elaborate account of the traditions which form the basis of the degrees in Freemasonry and their coincidence with the Ancient Mysteries; also the origin of the Society of Operative Masons and its transformation into a Speculative Fraternity; with a brief history of the Order, and its rituals and customs. By A. T. C. Pierson and Godfrey W. Steinbrenner. 540 pgs. 6½ x 9¼ Illustrated. No. 24213.....2.50

Washington and His Masonic Compeers. An interesting and reliable work, abounding in facts and incidents pertaining to Washington's Masonic life. A part of his history, entirely omitted by most of his biographers, brought to light by diligent research among the Masonic records and documents of the past century. Containing fine Masonic portrait of Washington and numerous other illustrations. No. 24301.....1.75

A SELECTED ASSORTMENT OF BOOKS

Historical, Fraternal, Symbolical, Mystic, Astrologic, Occult, Psychic, Spiritualistic, Optimistic, Philosophic, Masonic, New Thought, Etc.

Ahrinziman, The Strange Story of. As told by himself, after a period of over 2000 years; through the super-consciousness of Anita Silvani. The philosophy of this great Mystic and Persian Ruler, what Life hath taught him of the soul—on Earth, in the Abyss, and in the Heavens—A New Pilgrims Progress Arabian Nights, Paradise Lost, Wanderings in Spirit, and Paradise Won. No es on Obsession and Mediumship. Preface by Frederick W. Thurstan M. A. of Christs College, Cambridge.

"To each one comes life's lesson in a different form: Let him that would learn the meaning of this story attend to these words that he may the better understand, and let him that is the idle hearer of a tale pass them by." Two volumes, combined in one book of 49 chapters. Illustrated with a portrait of Ahrinziman and a Vision in the Desert. 284 pages 5½ x 7½ No. 22026 ..... 1.00

Altar in the Wilderness, The. In seven chapters—The Golden Age, The Exile, Life in Death, The Conflict. The Wilderness, Illumination, The Temple,—representing the Seven Spiritual Ages of Man. Ethelbert Johnson. Cloth, No. 24231,..... .50
Paper, No. 24235..... .25

Ben Hur, a Tale of the Christ. The Great Christian Drama. Gen. Lew Wallace. No. 22076..... 1.50

Book of the Master, The. A clue to the mysterious religion of Ancient Egypt. W. Marsham Adams. Cloth, No. 22166... 1.25

Brotherhood. Nature's Law.. Burcham Harding. No. 22176 .50

Brother of the Third Degree. An interesting and facinating story of the thrilling experiences of an earnest occult student on his way upward to those sublime heights of Universal Love and Devotion to Humanity, attained only by the true Initiates of the Great White Brotherhood—a vivid picture of life in the famous occult schools of Paris and the Far East; explaining much which has so long been veiled in mystery. W. L. Carver. 377 pages, Cloth. No. 22161..... 1.50

Constructive Psychology. The Constructive Principle of Character Building. Dr. J. D. Buck. 32° No. 22296..... 1.00

Culture of Concentration. Occult Powers and their acquirement. Wm. Q. Judge. No. 22266..... .10

Discovery of the Soul, The. Throwing light on the path of progressive man; leading through mysticism to the discovery of those unused powers within the soul, which duly appropriated give expression to the Divine in Man. Floyd B. Wilson. No. 22306..... 1.00

Harmonies of Evolution. This work marks out a new path in the treatment of the so-called Occult in Nature, attempting to explain rather than to mystify and to illustrate and elucidate the correlation of spiritual and physical forces in Nature. Florence Huntley. 463 pgs. No. 22716..... 2.00

Hermes and Plato. The mysteries of Egypt and of Eleusis. Edouard Shure. No. 22856..... 1.00

Initiation, The Way of, or How to Attain Knowledge of the Higher Worlds. Rudolf Steiner, Ph. D. Americanized from the translation by Max Gsyi. Notes by Edouard Schure. A most valuable and natural guide in a matter between you and yourself. New large type. Paper. No. 24280, .75 No. 24276.... 1.00

Initiation and its Results. Rudolf Steiner, Ph. D. A sequel to the Way of Initiation. These works, in the plainest and clearest way, give more instruction in occult knowledge than any yet published. Mystics, and the Theosophic Press indorse them in the highest terms. New large type. No. 22976..... 1.00

In Tune with the Infinite. Ralph Waldo Trine. Bound in Japanese style or special silk. No. 22996..... 1.25

Isis Unveiled. About 1500 pages. Portrait of the Author. H. P. Blavalsky. No. 23016 2 Vols. 6 x 9..... 7.00

Josephus. The authentic works and life of this great Jewish historian and celebrated warrior. Translated by Wm. Winston, M. A. 1055 pgs., attractively bound and illustrated. 7½x9½. No. 23061..... 1.75

Kingdom of Love, The. Henry Frank. Beautifully expressed, wholesome, helpful and inspiring essays. 245 pgs. No. 23086..... 1.00

Koran, The. Commonly called the Alkoran of Mohammed (the Mohammedian Bible). 559 pgs. No. 23071..... 1.50

Kirshna and Orpheus, the Great Initiates of the East and West. Edouard Schure. No. 23106..... 1.25

Last Great Initiate, Jesus the. Edouard Schure. The Essenes, St. John, etc. No. 23056..... 1.00

Life and Writings of Dr. Rob't. Fludd, the English Rosicrucian. I. B. Craven. Cloth. No. 23206..... 2.50

Light on the Path. A treatise for the personal use of those who are unfamiliar with the Eastern Wisdom but desire to enter within its influence. C. M. Cloth. No 23166..... 50
Leather. No. 24167..... 75

Man Limitless. "A study of the possibilities of man when acting under infinite guidance with which he is in absolute touch." Floyd B. Wilson. No. 23531..... 1.25

Mastery of Mind in the Making of a Man, The. A searching analysis and exposition of the power of mind in body-building and the forming of personality. Henry Frank. 250 pgs. No. 23306..... 1.00

Myrtle Baldwin. A novel of great interest, especially to the Fraternity, as it is full of Masonic principles. Bro. Charles Clark Munn, author of The Hermet, etc. 510 pgs. 5¼x7½. Illustrated, green cloth, black and gold stamps. An excellent gift. No. 23586..... 1.50

Mystical Life of Ours, This. Ralph Waldo Trine. No. 24236..... 1.00

Occult Science in India, and among the Ancients, with an account of their Mystic Initiations and History of Spiritualism. Louis Jacolliot. Cloth. No. 23715..... 2.50

Occultist's Travels, An. Willy Reichel. Cloth. No. 33726..... 1.00

Paths to Power. "The struggling will gain strength—the doubting assurance—and the despairing hope, from this book." Fifteenth edition. Floyd B. Wilson. No. 23796..... 1.00

Philosophy of Fire, The. "There is nothing new under the sun." Fire Philosophy is the foundation of all True Initiation, and all Mystic and Occult Fraternities, as well as the Secret Doctrine and Ancient Mysteries. Atlantis, its Beauty, and its Fall. The Templars, and Fire Philosophers. The Therapeutae and Essenes and their Initiation. Second and very much enlarged edition, contains the Rosicrucian Fire Philosophy according to Jennings. R. S. Clymer. About 250 pgs. Silk Cloth. Symbol in gold. No. 23806..... 1.50

Pythagoras and the Delphic Mysteries. Edouard Schure. No. 23811..... 1.50

Queen Moo and the Egyptian Sphinx. A most interesting and valuable work—the result of extensive research among the ruined palaces, tombs and temples, and careful study of the signs, symbols and ancient manuscripts of the Mayas of prehistoric Yucatan; showing evidences of a civilization antedating, by centuries, that of the Eastern Hemisphere, and giving a reasonable solution of that mystery of the ages—the Origin and Meaning of the Egyptian Sphinx. Augustus Le Plongeon. Beautifully illustrated with full page half-tone prints, from photographs taken by the author while exploring those ancient remains. No. 23851. Reduced from the Authors price 6.00 to..... 4.75

Queen Moo's Talisman. The Fall of the Maya Empire. A beautiful Poem with Introduction and Explanatory Argument. Alice Le Plongeon. Profusely illustrated. Cloth. No. 23841..... 1.50

Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, The. With 12 full page illustrations in colors and tinted border designs, 6x9. Deckel edge, No. 23936 1.25. Watered Silk, No. 23940..... 2.00 Limp Leather, No. 23937..... 2.00

Secret Doctrine, The. The Synthesis of Science, Religion, and Philosophy. 6 x 9 About 1500 pgs with Index. Vols. I and II No. 24066... 10.00 Vol. III No. 24067... 5.00

Secret Doctrine, Abridged. Hillaid. No. 24031... 2.00

Sermon on the Mount, and other Extracts from the New Testament. A verbatim translation from the Greek with notes on the Mystical or Arcane Sense. James M. Pryse. Cloth. No. 24076..... .60

Servant in the House, The. A beautiful and uplifting drama of Brotherly Love Charles Rann Kennedy. No. 23966... 1.25

Sixth and Seventh Books of Moses, The. The wonderful arts of the old wise Hebrews, taken from the Mosaic books of the Kabbalah and the Talmud, for the good of mankind. 100 pgs. Paper, No. 24040..... .75

Story of the Other Wise Man, The. A beautiful narrative. Henry Van Dyke. Exquisitely printed and bound. Cloth, No. 23961, .50. and Limp Leather. No. 23962..... 1.00

Temple, The. Its Ministry and Services at the Time of Jesus Christ. Rev. Dr. Eidersheim. 308 pgs. No. 24201..... 1.50

The Tabernacle. Its History and Structure. Rev. W. Shaw Caldecott. Cloth, 5¼ x 7½, 230 pgs. No. 24176.....1.75

Thoughts for the Occasion. A Manual of Historical Data and Facts, Helpful in Suggesting Themes and in Outlining Addresses for the Observance of Timely or Special Occasions of the Masonic, Odd Fellows and various other Orders. Compiled by Franklin Noble, D. D. 576 pgs. cloth. No. 24216.....2.00

Through Silence to Realization. This work embodies a system of instruction for mental growth and attainment of ideals. Floyd B. Wilson. 5½x7½. No. 24241..... 1.00

Voice of the Silence, and Other Chosen Fragments from the Book of the Golden Precepts for the Daily Use of Lanoos. B. P. Blavatsky. Cloth. No. 24266, .50. Leather. No. 24267 .75

W. J. COLVILLE'S BOOKS.

A Selection of the Most Popular Works by This Great Author and Well Known Lecturer in Europe, America, and Australia.

Ancient Mystery and Modern Revelation. A wonderful new work. By W. J. Colville.—The book, which will be of considerable size, will aim to introduce selected gems from Oriental literature together with philosophical interpretations of the most disputed Bible texts, and it will also present highly condensed biographical accounts of the Esoteric Schools of Antiquity and the characteristics of their founders. To every liberal-minded Bible student and to all who are investigating the psychic problems of to-day the work as a whole must appeal as one of more than average interest.

A rigidly restricted subscribers' edition will be published as soon as 1,000 subscriptions have been received. All who wish to add their names to the roll are invited to send $1.00 with full name and post-office address. Immediately on publication the book will be forwarded postpaid to every subscriber throughout the world.

Six copies to any single address on receipt of $5.00.

Birthdays, The Significence of, or Our Places in the Universal Zodiac. W. J. Colville Leatherette. No. 22191 .50
Paper No. 22195.....40

Dashed Against the Rock. A scientific novel, illustrated with many remarkable diagrams. W. J. Colville. Cloth. No. 22316..... .75

Fate Mastered-Destiny Fulfilled. Three stirring essays on live issues. A very tasteful presentation volume. W. J. Colville. Cloth: No. 22476..... .30

Glints of Wisdom, or Helpful Sayings for Busy Moments. Abstracts from Lectures by W. J. Colville. An encyclopedia of psychological laws contained in an endless variety of subjects. Leatherette, flexible. No. 22671. .40. Paper No. 22675 .30

Health from Knowledge; or the Law of Correspondences as Applied to Healing. W. J. Colville. Leatherette. No. 22745 .50

Life and Power from Within. An excellent book, embracing the most advanced mental-physical teaching and the simplest rules for the guidance of daily life, according to New Thought standards. W. J. Colville. Cloth. No. 23151..... .75

Living Decalogue, The. 12 Expository Lectures. W. J. Colville Leatherette. No. 23156..... .50

Lectures, by W. J. Colville, on various subjects: Atlantis, The Way of Initiation, Initiation and its Results. Symbolism—Its use and Value, etc. Send for list, each 10¢. 3 for..... .25

Mental Therapeutics, Elementary Text Book of. Twelve Practical Lessons. W. J. Colville. No. 22420..... .25

Old and New Psychology. Twenty-four chapters, including explanatory essays on many subjects of vital interest to all teachers and students. W. J. Colville. Cloth. No. 23766..... 1.00

Onesimus Templeton. A vivid romance, tracing the evolution of a soul from bondage to liberty. W. J. Colville. Cloth. No. 23771..... .50

Throne of Eden, The. Twenty-six chapters presenting important teachings entrusted to the writer's charge; also a record of extensive travel in the Southern Hemisphere; and a rational system of preventing as well as healing diseases. W. J. Colville. Cloth. No. 24186..... .. 1.00

Universal Spiritualism. Spirit Communion in all ages among all people. The work has two distinctive features: (1st) A resume of the Spiritual faith and practice of Egypt, India, Persia, Greece, Rome, China, Japan and other ancient nations, not excepting Europe, during Christian centuries. (2nd) A summary of recent experiences in America, Great Britain, Australia, France, Germany, Italy and other modern lands, all tending to show the persistent continuity of spiritual revelation. Clairvoyance, Telepathy and Psychic Phenomena in general are dealt with in separate chapters at the close of the volume, which extends to 352 pages, making it a highly useful text-book for all who are interested in the question of human immortality. W. J. Colville. Cloth. No. 24256..... 1.00

JAMES ALLEN'S BOOKS.

A Foreword. "I looked upon the world, and saw that it was shadowed by sorrow and scorched by the fierce fires of suffering- I looked for the cause, but could not find it until I looked within, and there found both the cause and the self-made nature of the cause. I looked again, deeper, and found the remedy I found one Law, the Law of Love; one Life, the Life of adjustment to that Law; one Truth, the Truth of a conquered mind and a quiet and obedient heart. And I dreamed of writing a book which should help men and women, rich or poor, learned or unlearned, worldly or unworldly, to find within themselves the source of all success, all happiness, all accomplishment, all truth: And the dream remained with me, and at last became substantial, and now I send it forth into the world on its mission of healing and blessedness, knowing that it cannot fail to reach the homes and hearts of those who are waiting and ready to receive it."

As a Man Thinketh. Inspiring and helpful "New Thought."

The Path of Prosperity. A way leading out of undesirable conditions to health, success, power, abounding happiness and the realization of prosperity.

Out from the Heart. Most optimistic and uplifting.

Entering the Kingdom. That heavenly kingdom within the heart of man, where perfect trust, knowledge, peace and love await all who will enter its Golden Gateways.

The Way of Peace. It's realization and attainment.

The Heavenly Life. How to attain its supreme happiness in this life, on this earth, here and now.

Morning and Evening Thoughts. Allen's rare jewels.

Through the Gate of Good. Leading from the complexities of ignorance and formalism to the joyful simplicity of Enlightenment and Faith.

Any of the above in either style of binding as follows:

Paper Covers, size 4¼x7¼	.15
Cloth Binding, " " " " " " " "	.50
Leather Binding, " " " " " " " "	.75
Watered Silk, " " " " " " " "	.75
Special Gift Editions, with colored borders, 5½x7¾, imbossed	.75

Life Triumphant. Man's Divine Destiny. Cloth. 1.00

From Poverty to Power. The Path of Prosperity and Way of Peace. The two books in 1 vol..... 1.00

Order and read one of the books—say The Path of Prosperity, and you'll ask the price per dozen, wanting all friends to have one.

Condensed List of New Books, Regularly in Stock, for Sale, Exchange or Circulating Library Use. May be Exchanged if not Found to be What is Wanted. Order By Number.

22001	A. A. S. R., Book of the. McClenachan.....	3.00
22011	Adoptive Rite, revised, enlarged. Macoy.....	1.00
22021	Ahiman Rezon, General. Sickels.....	2.00
22024	Morocco binding, gilt edges.....	3.50
22026	Ahrinziman, An Occult Story. Anita Silvani....	1.00
22036	Akin's Manual of the Lodge	1.25
22006	All These Things Added. Allen.....	1.00
24231	Altar in the Wilderness. Johnson. Cloth.....	.50
24235	Paper	.25
22051	Amaranth Odes.....	.20
22055	Paper	.15
22041	Amaranth Ritual, revised, enlarged. Macoy..	1.00
22081	Ancient Const. Reprint 1723. Music. Anderson	1.00
22056	Ancient Mysteries and Modern Masonry.....	1.00
22060	Paper. Rev. Charles H. Vail.....	.75
22071	Annotated Constitutions. Simons.....	1.00
23726	An Occulist's Travels. Reichel. Cloth.....	1.00
22086	Ancient Mystic Oriental Masonry. Clymer....	1.50
22110	Ancient Order of Hurcules (Burlesque), 6 copies	5.00
22096	Ante Room Talks, Bloomer,.....	1.00
22091	Antiquities of Freemasonry. Oliver.....	1.50
22101	Antiquities of the Orient Unveiled. Redding...	1.50
22146	Arcane Schools-Hist. of Fmsy. John Yorker...	4.75
22016	As a Man Thinketh. J. Allen. Cloth, 4¼x7¼.	.50
22017	Leather	.75
22018	Watered Silk	.75
22019	Special Gift Edition	.75
22020	Paper	.15

22076	Ben Hur. Wallace	1.50
22141	Bible Testimony to Theosophical Truths	.10
22175	Biography of Mrs. Babington	.25
22191	Birthdays, Their Significance. Colville	.50
22195	Paper	.40
22001	Book of A. A. S. R. McClenachan	3.00
22146	Book of I. O. O. F. Forms	1.00
22151	Book of the Chapter. Mackey,	1.60
22166	Book of the Master. Adams. Cloth	1.25
22176	Brotherhood. Harding	.50
22186	Brotherhood of Healers. J. Macbeth. Cloth	.50
22161	Brother of Third Degree. Carver,	1.50
22067	Buechners Fraternal Register, vest pock. leather	.60
22181	Busbee's Digest, I. O. O. F.	4.00
22151	Chapter, Book of the, Mackey, Cloth	1.60
22221	Chapter Music. Ilsley	.15
22230	Charges of a Mason. Chase	.15
22201	Christmas, Easter and Burial Services, K. T.	.45
22202	Leather. Rev. Cornelius L. Twing	.75
22204	Morocco	1.00
22205	Paper	.35
22210	Coles Initiation Ritual (Burlesque), 6 copies	3.75
24011	Colorado Grand Lodge Monitor. Foster. Cloth	.75
24012	Leather	1.00
22246	Concise Cyclopedia of Freemasonry. Hawkins	1.00
22211	Concordia, words only Ilsley,	.25
22281	Constitution and History, A. A. S. R.	2.00
22295	Constitutions, O. E. S., Africa, paper	.25
22236	Cosmogony of Evolution. Ingalese. Cloth	2.00
22266	Culture of Concentration. W. Q. Judge	.10
22296	Constructive Psychology. Buck	1.00
22231	Council Monitor, Chase,	1.00
22241	Council Monitor. Mackey,	2.00
22251	Craft Masonry. Cunningham	1.00
22254	Morocco	1.50
22261	Cross Masonic Chart, Revised	1.75
22256	Crucifixion, by an Eye Witness	1.00
22241	Cryptic Masonry. Mackey	2.00
22411	Cyclopedia of Fraternities. Stevens	4.50
22271	Cushing's Manual, Parliamentary Law	.75
22316	Dashed Against the Rock. Colville	.75

22340	Daughters of Sphinx (Burlesque), 6 copies	5.00
22301	Diagram of Parliamentary Rules. Smith	.50
22304	Morocco, parchment chart	1.00
22306	Discovery of the Soul	1.00
22346	Divine Pedigree of Man. T. J. Hudson	1.50
22331	Dream Child. Huntley	.75
22311	Drew's Monitor, small	.60
22351	Early History and Antiquities. Fort,	3.50
22366	Early History and Proceedings, N. Y. Vol. I	2.50
22361	Early History, New York. Ross,	2.50
22371	Eden to Malta. Beller,	1.50
22381	Egyptian Symbols. Portal, Simons	1.00
22421	Egypt the Cradle of Msry. de Clifford, 2 vol	6.75
22423	Half American morocco, 2 vol	7.50
22424	Full American morocco, 2 vol	10.00
22425	Full Persian morocco, 1 vol	10.00
22981	Election and Installation	.40
22985	Paper	.25
22376	Emerson's Essays	1.00
22391	Ency. and History. Oliver & Macoy. Cloth	2.75
22392	Library, sheep, marble edge	3.00
22395	Half American Russia	3.25
22393	Half American Morocco	3.50
22397	Full American Russia	4.25
22394	Full American Morocco	5.75
23398	Full Persian Morocco	8.50
22401	Encyclopedia, Mackey, McClenachan, cloth	4.50
22402	Sheep	6.00
22405	Half Russia, Gilt top	6.50
22404	Full morocco	8.00
22406	Two Volume Edition	11.00
22411	Encyclopedia of Fraternities. Stevens,	4.50
22356	Entering the Kingdom. J. Allen	.50
22357	Leather	.75
22358	Watered Silk	.75
22359	Special Gift Edition	.75
22360	Paper	.15
22396	Evolution of the Soul. T. J. Hudson	1.50
22476	Fate Mastered	.30
22465	Female Masonry, "A la Lease"	.50
22091	Five Grand Periods of Masonry. Oliver	1.50

22471	Five Jewels of the Orient, The. Burton	1.00
22490	Floral March. Simpson	.40
22481	Floral Work. Bunnell	.40
22485	Paper	.25
24006	Florida Monitor, Gr. Lodge Comm	.75
24007	Leather	1.00
22530	Freemasonry and Jesuitry	.15
22571	Freemason's Monitor Sickels	1.00
22572	Same, Lodge, to Comdy., leather	1.50
22511	Freemason's Monitor. Thornberg	1.25
22512	Leather	2.00
22501	Freemason's Monitor. Webb. Cloth	.75
22502	Leather	1.00
22556	Freimaurer's Handbuch. Committee	1.00
22557	Leather	1.25
22551	Freimaurer's Handbuch, small	.60
22581	Fundamental Truths. N. D. Cloth	.50
22156	Funeral Services. Simons—Macoy	.35
22160	Paper bound	.25
22651	Gem of Song, O. E. S. Pitkin & Mathews	.50
22655	Paper	.25
22021	General Ahiman Rezon, a Large Monitor,	2.00
22024	Same, morocco and gilt. Sickels—Macoy	3.50
22656	Genius of Freemasonry. Buck	1.00
22671	Glints of Wisdom. W. J. Colville	.40
22675	Paper	.30
22661	Great Work. T. K	2.00
22645	Guide to Chapter. Sheville, Gould, limp cloth.	.75
22641	Same in cloth and gilt binding	1.00
22642	Leather bound with flap	1.25
22644	Bound in imitation cowhide morocco	1.50
22646	Large library size, cloth bound	1.50
22649	Same in imitation morocco	2.00
22676	Guild Free Masons, Anc. Const. Charges	1.00
22311	Hand Book of Freemasonry. Drew	.60
22711	Harmonia. Music, Cutler,	.25
22716	Harmonies of Evolution. Huntley	2.00
22741	Health from Knowledge. Colville	.75
22745	Leatherette	.50
22851	Heavenly Life. James Allen. Cloth	.50
22852	Leather	.75

22853 Watered Silk ..... .75
22854 Special Gift Edition ..... .75
22855 Paper ..... .15
22746 Hebrew Bible in English. $1.00 to.....20.00
22856 Hermes and Plato, Schure..... 1.00
22721 Hermetic Writing of Paracesus. Waite. 2 vol...18.00
22866 Heroines of Jerico. Ceremonies. Cloth. Dickson .75
22861 Heroines of Jerico. Ritual, Cloth. Dickson.. .50
22723 Historical Landmarks. Oliver..... 4.00
22726 Historical Sketch—Morton Commandery..... 2.00
22731 History and Power of Mind. Ingalese. Cloth.. 2.00
22751 History of A. &. A. Scottish Rite. Folger,..... 3.00
22791 History of Colored Freemasonry. Grimshaw... 1.25
22771 History of Freemasonry, Concise. Gould. Cloth 2.75
22772 Library—sheep 4.00
22773 Half Morocco 3.75
22774 Full Morocco..... 4.75
22775 Levant 8.50
22761 Hist. of Freemasonry & Concordant Orders.... 4.50
22763 Half Morocco. Stillson & Hughan..... 5.50
22764 Full Morocco..... 6.50
22765 Levant..... 10.00
22780 History of Frmsy. Gould, 6 vol. ½ calf.....25.00
22779 Morocco. (Shopworn, sets only) 30.00
22781 History of Freemasonry. Mitchell, 2 vols..... 4.00
22782 Library—sheep 5.00
22784 Morocco 6.00
22801 History of Initiation. Oliver..... 1.50
22811 History of K. T. Revised. Addison..... 3.25
22812 Library Sheep 3.50
22818 Half American Russia 3.75
22813 Half American Morocco 4.00
22819 Full American Russia 4.75
22814 Full American Morocco 5.00
22817 Full Persian Morocco 8.75
22821 History of Memphis Rite. Gottlieb..... 1.00
22831 History of O. E. S. Engle..... 2.25
22841 History of Rosicrucians—Waite..... 2.50
24276. Initiation, Way of. Rudolf Steiner, P. D...... 1.00
24280 Paper ..... .75
22976 Initiation and Its Results. Rudolf Steiner, Ph.D. 1.00

23010	Initiation of a Candidate—6 copies (Burlesque)	5.00
22991	Indian Masonry. Wright	1.50
22986	In Memoriam—Orin Welsh. (Shopworn)	1.50
22981	Installation Ceremonies. Simons—Whiting	.40
22985	Paper	.25
22281	Introduction and History, A. A. S. R.	2.00
22996	In Tune with the Infinite. Trine	1.25
23011	I. O. O. F. Hist. and Manual	3.75
23013	Half Morocco	4.75
23914	Full Morocco	6.50
23001	Irish Prince and Hebrew Prophet. Kissick	1.50
23046	Jerico Road. (I. O. O. F.) Thompson	1.00
22530	Jesuitry and Frmsy. Rameses	.15
23056	Jesus, the Last Great Initiate. Schure	1.00
23076	Jewels of Pythian Knighthood, cloth	3.00
23078	Half Morocco	4.00
23079	Full Morocco	5.00
23061	Josephus, The Works of	1.75
23121	Kabbalah Unveiled. S. L. M. Mathers. Cloth	3.50
23086	Kingdom of Love. Frank	1.00
23120	King Solomon's Secret (Farce)	.35
23092	K. of P. Drill. Carnahan. Leather	1.50
23091	Cloth	1.00
23115	Knights of the Zoroasters (Burlesque), 6 copies	3.75
23070	Knight Templar Melodies, per doz	4.80
23071	Koran. Translated by Sale	1.50
23106	Krishna and Orpheus. Schure	1.25
26045	Labyrinth as a Life Story. O. E. S. Paper	.25
23141	Law of Mental Medicine. T. J. Hudson	1.50
23146	Law of Psychic Phenomena. T. J. Hudson	1.50
23161	Lexicon of Freemasonry. Mackey,	3.00
23151	Life and Power from Within. Colville	.75
23186	Life and Doctrine of Paracelsus. Cloth	2.50
23286	Life and Writings of Dr. Robt. Fludd. Cloth	2.50
23176	Light of Asia. Edwin Arnold	.75
23166	Light on the Path. M. C. Cloth	.50
23167	Leather	.75
23181	Lights and Shadows. Morris—Mackey	2.50
23156	Living Decalogue. Colville	.50
23191	Lodge Goat. Comic	2.00
23201	Lodge Music. Ilsley	.15

23196	Lost Word Found. Buck	.50
23221	Low Twelve. Ellis	1.50
23224	Morocco	2.50
23472	Mackey's Ritualist, leather	1.60
23531	Man Limitless. Wilson	1.25
23481	Man of Mount Moriah. Boutelle	2.40
23483	Half Morocco	3.20
23486	Half Russia	2.80
23487	Half Russia, gilt edges	3.60
23488	Half Morocco, gilt edges	4.00
28485	Paper	1.60
23521	Manual, Lodge of Perfection. Nor. Jurisdiction	1.50
23517	Manual of Lodge of N. J. (New)	1.25
23491	Manual of the Chapter. Sheville and Gould	.75
23501	Manual of the Lodge. Mackey	2.00
23511	Manual of the Lodge of N. J. Illust'd	.25
23512	Leather	.35
23526	Masonic Burial Services. Macoy	.50
23461	Masonic Eclectic, 2 vols., shopworn	1.00
23541	Masonic Gem. Rev. A. L. Alford	.50
23551	Masonic Jurisprudence. Simons	1.50
23561	Masonic Jurisprudence. Mackey	2.50
23401	Masonic Jurisprudence and Symbolism. Lawrence	1.00
23581	Masonic Law and Practice. Lockwood	1.00
23261	Masonic Lodge Music, (Kane Lodge, N. J.)	.40
23265	Paper	.25
23271	Masonic Light on Abduction of Morgan	1.00
23591	Masonic Musical Manual. Lithographed	.75
23594	Leather. W. H. Janes. Lithographed	1.00
23595	Paper Board, 7½x10. Lithographed	.50
23600	Paper Flexible. Lithographed	.35
23592	Paper Board. Cheaper Print	.35
23593	Paper Flexible. Cheaper Print	.25
23596	Cloth Board. Cheaper Print	.60
23598	Paper Flexible. Words only 4x6	.20
23597	Cloth Flexible. Words only 4x6	.25
23599	Cloth Board and Stamp. Words only 4x6	.35
23620	Masonic Orpheus. Words and Music. Dow	1.75
23571	Masonic Parliamentary Law. Mackey	2.00
23285	Masonic Poetry. Morris. Silk cloth, gilt edge.	3.50
23291	Masonic Sketch Book. E. du Laurans	2.00

23311	Masonic Token Anderson,	2.25
23301	Masonic Trials. Treatise upon Law. Look	1.50
23316	Master Mason Hand Book. Crowe	1.00
23306	Mastery of Mind in Making of Man. Frank	1.00
23321	Maurerisches Liederbuch. Roehr. Cloth	.25
23400	Memorial Service, O. E. S. Engle	.25
22420	Metal Therapeutics. A Text Book. Colville	.25
23346	Meyer's Tactics	1.00
23345	Middle Chamber Work. Paper	.25
22501	Miniature Monitor. Webb	.75
22502	Leather	1.00
23390	Missing Link (Burlesque). 6 copies	3.00
23389	Same with outfit	5.00
23356	Mission of Masonry. Peters	.50
23360	Paper	.35
23351	Monitor of A. A. S. R. By Webb—Carson	1.50
23376	Monitor—Grand Lodge N. Y	1.00
23570	Moot Court Martial, 6 copies (Burlesque)	2.00
23361	Morals and Dogma, Scottish Rite. Pike	5.25
23580	Munchers of Hard Tack, 6 copies (Burlesque)	3.75
23671	Music of Chapter. Marsh. Cloth	.65
23673	Paper Flexible	.25
23674	American Morocco	1.00
23675	Paper Board	.40
23586	Myrtle Baldwin. Munn	1.50
23411	Mystic Chord. Mabie	.50
23415	Paper	.25
23421	Mystic Masonry. Buck	1.50
23181	Mystic Tie. Morris-Mackey	2.50
23701	New Light from the Great Pyramid. Parsons	5.00
23707	New Odd Fellows Manual—Grosh, leather	1.50
23706	Cloth. Larger Edition	2.50
23709	Morocco and Gilt. Larger Edition	3.25
23700	New Woman (Burlesque), 4 copies	1.00
23712	Nuggets from King Solomon's Mines. Schmalz	2.00
23721	Obelisk and Freemasonry. Weisse, paper	1.00
23731	Obituary Rites of Freemasonry. Macoy	.50
23716	Occult Science in India. Jacolliot. Cloth	2.50
23776	Ocean of Theosophy, The. W. Q. Judge. Cloth	.75

23011	Odd Fellowship. His. and Manual. Ross	3.75
23013	Half Morocco	3.75
23014	Full Morocco	5.50
23736	Odd Fellowship, Official History. Canvas	3.75
23737	Half Morocco. Art canvas	4.75
23738	Full Morocco	5.50
23746	O. E. S. Burial Services. Macoy	.50
23741	O. E. S. Manual. Macoy. Original Edition	.75
23766	Old and New Psychology. Colville	1.00
23771	Onesimus Templeton. Colville	.50
23786	On the Road to Self-Knowledge. Jones. Cloth.	.50
23640	Oriental Order of Humility. 6 copies (Burlesque)	1.50
23821	Origin of Freemasonry and K. T. Bennett	1.75
22756	Out From the Heart. J. Allen. Cloth	.50
22757	Leather	.75
22758	Watered Silk	.75
22759	Special Gift Edition	.75
22760	Paper	.15
23791	Path of Prosperity, The. J. Allen	.50
23792	Leather	.75
23793	Watered Silk	.75
23794	Special Gift Edition	.75
23795	Paper	.15
23796	Paths to Power. Wilson	1.00
23816	Perfect Way; or, Finding of Christ. Kingsford	2.00
23281	Embossed Cloth Cover	2.75
23806	Philosophy of Fire. Clymer. Cloth	1.50
23285	Poetry of Freemasonry. Morris. Silk cloth, gilt	3.50
23751	Prelate's Lesson	1.00
23551	Principles, Practice, Masonic Law, Simons	1.50
23805	Put Through (Comic)	.25
23811	Pythagoras and the Delphic Mysteries. Schure	1.50
23081	Pythian Knighthood, cloth. Cornahan	3.00
23083	Half Morocco	4.00
23084	Full Morocco	5.00
23851	Queen Moo and Egyptian Sphinx. Le Plongeon	4.75
23841	Queen Moo's Talisman. Cloth	1.50
23850	Queen of Sahara, 6 copies (Burlesque)	3.00
23861	Queen of the South. Macoy	.40
23865	Paper	.25

23870	Ransford Drill. O. E. S.	.75
23886	Red Blood of Odd Fellowship	1.50
23860	Review of Cryptic Masonry. Warvelle, paper	.15
23901	Roberts' Rules of Order	.75
23946	Rose Croix. Gilliam	1.60
23896	Rosicrucian, Cosmo Conception. Heindel	1.15
23006	Rosicrucians. Clymer	3.00
23881	Rosicrucians, Rites and Mysteries. Jennings	3.50
23915	Royal Arch Companion. Chase, limp cloth	.75
23911	Same in cloth and gild binding	1.00
23912	Leather bound with flap	1.25
23925	Royal Arch Standard. McGown, limp cloth,	.75
22921	Same in cloth and gilt binding	1.00
23922	Leather bound with flap	1.25
23895	Royal Order of Ogling Owls (Burlesque), 6 cop.	3.00
23936	Rubaiyat of Omar Khayram. Deckel edge	1.25
23940	Watered Silk	2.00
23937	Limp Leather	2.00
23931	Ruins of Empires. Voleny	.75
23925	Paper	.50
23984	Leather	4.00
23956	Sacred Mysteries. A. Le Plongeon	2.50
23981	Scarlet Book of Frmsy. Redding	3.00
23951	Scientific Demonstration of the Future	1.50
24066	Secret Doctrine, Vols. 1, 2. Blavatsky	10.00
24067	Secret Doctrine, Vol. 3. Blavatsky	5.00
24031	Secret Doctrine Abridged	2.00
24076	Sermon on the Mount. Pryse. Cloth	.60
23971	Sermons and Addresses. 480 pages. (Shopworn)	.75
23966	Servant in the House. Kennedy	1.25
23991	Shibboleth, K. T. Monitor. Connor	1.25
22021	Sickles Ahiman Rezon, General	2.00
22024	Genuine Morocco	3.50
22571	Sickles Monitor	1.00
22572	Leather	1.50
23976	Signet of K. S., Freemanson's Daughter. Arnold	1.50
23986	Signs and Symbols. Oliver	1.50
23916	Singular Story of Freemasonry	.75
24040	Sixth and Seventh Book of Moses	1.00
22301	Smith's Diagram of Parliamentary Rules, cloth	.50
22304	Leather, parchment chart	1.00

24020	Smithsonian Comedetta (Burlesque), 4 copies	1.00
24026	Solomon's Temple. Caldecott	2.50
24050	Sons of Osirus (Burlesque), 6 copies	3.75
24021	Spirit of Freemasonry. Oliver, Hutchison	1.50
24001	Standard Masonic Monitor. Simons—Macoy	.75
24002	Same, in leather and gilt	1.00
24011	Standard Monitor, Colorado, cloth	.75
24012	Leather	1.00
24006	Standard Monitor, Florida, cloth	.75
24007	Leather	1.00
22216	Standard Monitor Illinois, Cook Cloth	.40
22217	Leather	.60
24085	Star Chamber. Frazer—6 copies (Burlesque)	5.00
23961	Story of the Other Wise Man. Cloth. Van Dyke	.50
23962	Limp Leather	1.00
24051	Swedenborg Rite. Beswick	1.00
24071	Symbolism of Freemasonry.	2.25
24061	Symbol of Glory. Oliver	1.50
24176	Tabernacle. Caldecott	1.75
24191	Tactics. K. T. Grant	1.00
24192	Leather	1.25
24196	Tactics, N. Y. Regulation	1.10
24181	Tactics Vest Pocket	.25
24184	Morocco	.75
24182	Leather	.50
24206	Templar Hand book	1.00
24201	Temple. Eidersheim. Cloth	1.50
24236	This Mystical Life of Ours. Trine	1 00
24216	Thoughts for the Occasion	2.00
24186	Throne of Eden. W. J. Colville	1.00
24241	Through Silence to Realization. Wilson	1.00
24166	Traces of a Hidden Tradition in Masonry	1.25
24213	Traditions, Origins, Early History. Pierson	2.50
24225	Trial of Jesus. Druker	.25
24230	Twentieth Century Orient (Burlesque), 6 copies	3.00
24256	Universal Spiritualism	1.00
24250	Van Nest's Burlesque Ritual, 6 copies	3.75
24251	Vocal Manual, words only. Macoy	.25
24265	Vocal Star, O. E. S. Paper	.25
24266	Voice of the Silence, The. Blavastky. Cloth	.50
24267	Leather	.75

24301	Washington and His Masonic Compeers	2.50
24276	Way of Initiation. Rudolf Steiner, P. D.	1.00
24280	Paper	.75
24271	Way of Peace, The. J. Allen. Cloth	.50
24272	Leather	.75
24273	Watered Silk	.75
24274	Special Gift Edition	.75
24275	Paper	.15
22501	Webb's Monitor	.75
22502	Leather	1.00
24286	What All the World's a-Seeking. Trine	1.25
24315	Wisdom of the Ages (Burlesque), 6 copies	5.00
24281	Witching Hour. Thomas	1.50
24321	Worshipful Master's Assistant. Macoy	1.50
24324	Same, in Morocco and gilt	2.25
24425	32 Degrees K. P. or Ninety in the Shade. Comic.	.25

EXCHANGED IF NOT SATISFACTORY.

OTHER BOOKS

on any subject are supplied in the shortest possible time. Rare, old, and out of print works secured, or information given from our accumulative card index. Write us, also if you have any to sell cheaply or to give to less fortunate collections.

Send for list containing a description of all kinds of Music, Charts, Engravings, Certificates and Engrossing; Pins, Jewels, Charms in stock and to order; Blanks, Books, Aprons, and General supplies for the Lodge or members.

CIRCULATING LIBRARY.

(FREE READING) (HOME READING)

For our many readers, who have no room for a collection of books, yet wish to become conversant with Masonry, its Origin, History, Symbolism and Objects, or Theosophic, Mystic, Occult and New Thought literature, we have set aside several well filled cases, containing the latest and best, as well as many rare, old and out-of-print books, on these subjects.

We invite you to consult them freely at the office, without charge or to use them at your homes at the rate of ten per cent of their value for the first thirty days, and an additional five per cent for each month thereafter—which will cover the expense of wrapping, book-keeping, etc.—Thus, for a comparatively small item of cost you can add to your store of knowledge, for greater usefulness and personal enjoyment.

As time and carfare is an important item, you can order the books to be sent through the mail or express, by enclosing stamps or money order equaling their value, which will be refunded, less the percentage, when the books are returned.

Readers in any part of the United States can take advantage of the mail rates—Books—1/8 lb. for one cent,—which we advance by prepaying them to your express or post office, deducting the same when refunding balance.

To secure books on the Circulating Library Plan, order the books in the usual way, send Money Order equivalent to the value of the book and state that you wish them on the library plan.

Trusting you will find it convenient to make use of the books at the office or try a selection from the list for your evenings at home,

We are, yours fraternally,

Macoy Publishing & Masonic Supply Co.
New York, U. S. A.

MAY 18 1910

Deacidified using the Bookkeeper process.
Neutralizing agent: Magnesium Oxide
Treatment Date: Nov. 2004

PreservationTechnologies
A WORLD LEADER IN PAPER PRESERVATION
111 Thomson Park Drive
Cranberry Township, PA 16066
(724) 779-2111

One copy del. to Cat. Div.

MAY 13 [illegible]

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS
0 013 412 755 7

Please handle this volume with care.

The University of Connecticut
Libraries, Storrs

3 9153 00274175 1

HM 301/C683

WORKS BY W. J. COLVILLE.

BERTHA: A Romance of Easter-tide.

Setting forth the principles of the Spiritual Philosophy, and introducing graphic accounts of Spiritual Manifestations of the most astonishing and fascinating order, in the course of a popular and exciting Tale. Handsomely bound in cloth, 320 pp. Price, 3s. 6d.

THE COMING OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD; Or, The Future Triumph of The Spirit upon Earth.

Being Spiritual Teachings given at the Residence of Lady Caithness, Duchesse De Pomar, 51, Rue de L'Universitè, Paris, Thursday evening, June 26. Also an Impromptu Poem, "The Star Circle." Price, 4d.

SPIRITUALISM, and Its True Relations to Secularism and Christianity. Price, 1d.

WHAT IS PROPERTY? A Lecture on the Land Question. Price, 1d.

THE SPIRIT SPHERES ATTACHING TO THE EARTH, and the Mission of Modern Spiritualism to Humanity, as affecting all Institutions and Classes of Society. Price, 1d.

THE LOST CONTINENT, ATLANTIS; and the Civilization of the Pre-Historic World. Price, 1d.

LONDON:

J. BURNS, 15, SOUTHAMPTON ROW, W.C.

INSPIRATIONAL LECTURES

AND

IMPROMPTU POEMS.

DELIVERED BY

W. J. COLVILLE.

AUTHOR OF "BERTHA: A ROMANCE OF EASTER-TIDE," &c., &c.

WITH

PERSONAL SKETCH OF THE SPEAKER.

London:

J. BURNS, 15, SOUTHAMPTON ROW, W.C.

RF
1301
C693

PRINTED BY
JAMES BURNS, 15, SOUTHAMPTON ROW, W.C., LONDON.

NOTICE TO READERS.

THE following INSPIRATIONAL LECTURES AND POEMS were, with three exceptions, delivered in Neumeyer Hall, London, during April, May, and June, 1884. Arrangements were made to secure thirteen Lectures and Poems, at the commencement of the series; the other five were reported and secured for publication as follows.

Lady Caithness desired the publication of the remarkable utterances delivered in her salon, in Paris, and very kindly defrayed the cost of their reporting and publication. A gentleman greatly interested in the question of Re-embodiment, secured a report of the lecture given on that subject, in Neumeyer Hall, Sunday afternoon, June 1. A lecture given on "Progress and Poverty" elicited much interest, but it was not reported, as it contained very similar ideas to that on "What is Property?" given in Leeds, August 14; that lecture found place in this Volume. The closing lecture, on "Atlantis," was reported verbatim as it fell from the lips of the speaker, in Neumeyer Hall, Sunday evening, June 29, 1884, a kind friend defraying the expenses. Thus eighteen Lectures and Poems are embodied in the following pages, while the original intention was only to report and publish thirteen.

The poems, with one exception, were all given publicly in Neumeyer Hall, at the close of the morning or evening services. That following the lecture on "What is Property?" was given in Psychological Hall, Leeds, and being peculiarly suitable was attached to the lecture on the Land Question, in print.

Each Lecture and Poem has been revised by the speaker, through whose hand the inspiring spirits can always correct reporter's or typographical errors, one of W. J. Colville's spirit guides having been, when on earth, actively engaged in literary labour of that particular kind.

These observations are made in justice alike to the public at large and those kind friends through whose generosity verbatim reports of W. J. Colville's utterances on special themes have been secured. Should this Volume meet with an extensive sale, a second collection of W. J. Colville's Inspirational Utterances will shortly appear.

CONTENTS.

		PAGE
	PERSONAL SKETCH OF W. J. COLVILLE	vii
	INVOCATION	xiii

INSPIRATIONAL LECTURES.

I.	WHAT THE WORLD NEEDS TO MAKE IT HAPPY	1
II.	SEVEN STEPS TO SPIRITUAL PERFECTION .	17
III.	THE COMING OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD .	44
IV.	SPIRITUALISM, AND ITS RELATIONS TO THEOSOPHY AND TO CHRISTIANITY . .	59
V.	RESURRECTIONS: THEIR SPIRIT AND THEIR LETTER	84
VI.	RELIGIOUS TRUTHS AND CONTROVERSIAL THEOLOGIES	97
VII.	THE PHILOSOPHY OF RE-EMBODIMENT .	112
VIII.	REASON AND INTUITION	129
IX.	TRUE PRAYER: ITS NATURE AND EFFICACY	145
X.	THE TRUE GIFT OF HEALING, AND THE TRUE SPIRITUAL PHYSICIAN . . .	159
XI.	THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE AND USE OF FIRE	177
XII.	THE ASCENSION OF JESUS INTO HEAVEN, AND THE DESCENT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT	196
XIII.	A SPIRITUAL VIEW OF THE TRINITY . .	210
XIV.	WHAT IS PROPERTY?	226
XV.	TRUE SPIRITUAL MARRIAGE	245

PAGE

XVI. The Spiritual Significance of the Apocalypse 261

XVII. The Spirit Spheres attaching to the Earth, and the Mission of Modern Spiritualism to Humanity, as affecting all Institutions and Classes of Society 279

XVIII. The Lost Continent, Atlantis; and the Civilization of the Pre-historic World 296

IMPROMPTU POEMS.

The Cross-Bearer 15

A Glimpse of Paradise 42

The Star Circle 80

The Twin Angels 95

Who and What is Christ? 110

The Home of the Soul 126

The Idol-Breaker 143

The Way to God 157

The Power of Sympathy 175

Cleansing Fires 194

Ascension through Sorrow 208

Our Mother Who art in Heaven 222

The Cry for Bread 242

Two Hearts that beat as One 258

The Opening of the Seals 276

The Golden Age 294

The Real and the Ideal 314

Erratum.—Page 229: for "Black Forest" read New Forest.

PERSONAL SKETCH OF W. J. COLVILLE.

IN presenting this Volume of Discourses and Poems to the public, it may be interesting to all readers, especially to those who have neither seen nor heard the Lecturer, to be made acquainted with a few facts concerning him.

It is quite beyond us, in the brief space at our disposal, to do more than present a few salient points of interest to the reader, without any attempt at elaboration. Plain facts are always valuable and interesting, and as phrenology and physiognomy have commanded a considerable share of the attention of thoughtful people of late, a word-picture of a celebrated personage is often an illustration of the truth of these sciences.

In the very early spring of 1877, W. J. COLVILLE was first introduced to Mr. Burns, the publisher of this volume. At that time he was about 18 years of age, and had enjoyed very few educational advantages; nevertheless his inspired oratory was so remarkable, that after hearing him speak once in the drawing room at the Spiritual Institution, the Editor of THE MEDIUM considered himself justified in hiring a short-hand writer to take down W. J. Colville's oration, at Doughty Hall, on the following Sunday evening. That lecture and many others were soon after published in THE MEDIUM, and the name of W. J. Colville soon became a household word with all English-speaking Spiritualists.

The story of his sudden and singular discovery of his mediumistic powers has often been told, and is doubtless familiar to many who will read this record, though it will be new to others.

On the 24th of May, 1874, Mrs. Cora L. V. Tappan (now

Mrs. Richmond) spoke in the Concert Hall, West Street, Brighton. W. J. Colville, who was then under 16, and knew nothing whatever of Spiritualism (though he was extremely interested in liberal religion, and was at that time an active member of a Unitarian congregation, though as a professional singer he frequently officiated in the choirs of churches of widely different theology) was attracted by the unusual announcement that a lady, described on the placards as a "trance medium," would lecture upon "Spiritualism, under influence of her spirit guides," and also give "an impromptu poem on a subject chosen by the audience."

Attending the meeting on the evening in question, he became conscious of spirit presence during Mrs. Tappan's inspired invocation. He distinctly remembers seeing a misty form behind the speaker, the outlines of whose features he could clearly trace, while throughout the oration and poem his attention and gaze were rivetted upon the speaker, he feeling all the time under a most agreeable spell, as though some very pleasant change were about to take place in himself and his surroundings.

No sooner had he returned home than he astonished all at the supper table, by asking in a deep bass voice if the company present knew anything about Spiritualism, telling them that if they did not they would show their wisdom if they refrained from abusing it. (The conversation had turned on Spiritualism, through W. J. Colville having told the folks at the table, that he had been to hear a Mrs. Tappan instead of going to a church as usual.) "Well," said a lady present, "you say that Mrs. Tappan gives impromptu poems on any subjects the audience may give her; if there are any spirits here, let them influence you and give us a similar test; and that will be a test if you give a poem, as we know you have never displayed the slightest poetical genius, and do not even care to read poetry." The words were hardly out of the lady's mouth, when W. J. Colville's features underwent a complete transformation, and, in a girlish voice of very peculiar tone, he expressed his readiness to improvise on any suitable theme.

He describes his sensation at the time in the following words, which we have from his own lips: "I suddenly felt myself lifted in the air. I seemed to have an enormous head and a very small body. My lips seemed to be moving mechanically, under the pressure of some influence over which I could exert, and could will to exert, no power whatever. I heard some one commenting upon a poem, and then I sat down and finished my supper, and wondered if I had not been to sleep. That was my first experience as a medium for speaking, though from my earliest childhood I had had spiritual experiences, and constantly felt, saw, and heard beings around me, who were not in material form."

After that first striking example of inspired utterance, W. J. Colville was constantly requested to display his phenomenal abilities, in the drawing-rooms of the aristocracy and gentry. About that time, or soon after, he was the subject of many very successful mesmeric experiments, though he was never really subject to the influence of more than one person, a young gentleman of extraordinary psychological power and very attractive personal appearance, to whom W. J. Colville continued devotedly attached from the first moment of their meeting till circumstances, over which neither of them had the least control, separated them, doubtless at the right time, as this loss of his dearest friend opened the way for our Lecturer's prominent appearance before the public at large.

All through his public career, which has been a very striking and eventful one, W. J. Colville has relied entirely upon the guidance of his invisible friends. He assures all that they have never deceived and never once led him to make a move he afterwards repented. The only occasions when he has acted unwisely have been when he has not taken or acted upon the advice of his unseen directors, whom he regards as his dearest friends, and between whom and himself the closest bonds of sympathy always exist.

Sometimes while speaking he is quite unconscious, at other times he hears everything that is said, but his own mind never interferes with the controlling spirit. No one can listen to his utterances for any length of time, without discovering traces of the distinctive individuality of the various spirits who constitute his band of guides. At times the style is argumentative, and the lectures are closely reasoned in plain, forcible language, adapted to hard-headed thinkers and controversialists; at other times the language is singularly flowery and poetic, and the subject matter is idealistic or transcendental; while the answers to questions upon hundreds of different subjects, which are constantly being given both publicly and privately through this remarkable instrument of the Spirit-world, give evidence of a reservoir of intelligence somewhere, which appears inexhaustible.

Though W. J. Colville is admirably adapted for introducing Spiritualism to new hearers and in places where its claims have never been fairly presented to the public, and while he excels in dealing with almost every topic of public interest, his great power has been chiefly manifested in long engagements in one place, as in the case of his lengthy ministrations in Berkeley Hall, and other places in the city of Boston, U. S. A. The more one hears him the more one wishes to listen to what he says (or rather to what his guides have to say through him), and it is only when he has the opportunity of following up a train of thought, by a long series of concatenated lectures, that the full greatness of his abilities as an orator begins to dawn upon the listener. Of course all lectures are not of equal value, and conditions have something to do with their delivery, though not nearly so much as with the majority of mediumistic orators.

W. J. Colville cannot be called an uncultured or illiterate person, though he never received any education beyond that obtained in a preparatory school, and he was never either an apt scholar nor a regular attendant when he was getting his education. He has, however, considerable natural abilities, has keen perceptive faculties, but not a very good memory. He can be very agreeable in private life, when he chooses to exert himself to please, but very often persons, who desire to intrude upon his privacy or force themselves upon his notice, find him absent-minded and indifferent to their desires.

In personal appearance he is decidedly attractive, though one would not call him singularly handsome. His manners, when he is in a happy mood, are pleasant and polite. He can converse fluently and entertainingly upon his travels and experiences in the world, and often manifests a large amount of genuine humour, not always unmixed with satire. He is five feet seven inches in height, not very stout, singularly well-built, though by no means powerfully organized. His features are finely chiselled. He has a fine head, expansive brow, expressive blue eyes, fair hair and a very clear skin.

The leading phrenological indications of character seem to be Conscientiousness, manifesting itself in a devout reverence for the moral sense of every individual, a hatred for shams and artifices, and a singular breadth of thought and toleration for everybody's convictions, no matter how singular they may appear to the world. Benevolence, expressing itself in a desire to help everybody, without however any particular feeling of regard for relations or fellow countrymen. Ideality, manifested in an appreciation of everything beautiful in nature and art, and a great belief in the influence of the beautiful to elevate the human race. Causality, evidenced in a determination to know the why and wherefore of all things as far as possible. These four organs seem exceptionally prominent, while Mirthfulness, Self-esteem, Approbativeness, Combativeness and Cautiousness, are all quite sufficiently developed. Continuity, Amativeness, Philoprogenitiveness, and some others are conspicuous by their absence rather than by their presence.

W. J. Colville is a natural Theist: he could not be an Atheist were he to try ever so hard to give up his faith in a Supreme Intelligence. He is a born Spiritualist, and finds it as hard to comprehend Materialism as Materialists find it difficult to discover the reasonableness of Spiritualism. Though fond of music, ritual and all the accessories of ostentatious systems of religion, he has a hatred of all sectarian limitations, and perhaps his intense love of liberty is after all his dominant characteristic. He is quite willing that all others should enjoy their freedom, but he must have his own. He makes a bad servant, but a kind and considerate master. He is not tyrannical or aggressive, but very impatient of all restraint, and therefore succeeds far better on an independent basis than as the hireling of a society.

As an author, W. J. Colville has made a great name, both in England and America. He wields a graceful and a facile pen, but declares himself utterly unable to excel in any literary enterprise, without the assistance of his spirit friends. He has a splendid voice, both for speaking and singing, clear, resonant and penetrating, capable of giving great expression to all he essays to interpret. As an instrumental musician he would never rise into celebrity, by reason of his lack of application to study, it being quite unnatural to him to work in any direction which requires a special effort of his own mind. This trait would be a weakness in many, but in him it is a source of strength, as with his peculiar gifts and sensitive organization, he is now often able to speak at length three times on a Sunday, and five evenings in the week, to large public audiences; also frequently to sing in public, accomplish a great deal of literary work, and take a large amount of out-door exercise without apparent fatigue.

His chosen companions are vigorous young men, and he has a great love of animals, from whom he says he gets more good than from any other quarter. Dogs are his especial favourites, with whom he is always on terms of mutual confidence and affection. He is kind and considerate to children, but has no faculty for training them, until they are approaching maturity. He seems entirely destitute of appreciation of wedded bliss, and, though thoroughly domesticated from childhood, is utterly unfit to enter the married state; and, indeed, he assures us he cannot understand the attraction of the sexes, except theoretically.

He is almost always in the enjoyment of excellent health, and finds his work a pleasure, and is evidently peculiarly cut out by nature to do exactly the work he is so ably performing.

With these few introductory remarks, we refer the reader to the Lectures.

CHARLES BLACKIE MONCRIEFF.

INVOCATION.

O THOU unchanging Spirit! who alone canst never change, while all things change around Thee; Thou who art at the centre of all being, where perfect repose remains in its undisturbed serenity for ever: the generations of men coming and going upon the little planet earth are ever seeking to find Thee out to perfection, and are always failing in their search, because Thou alone art Infinite, and all they are finite. Spirits released from the bonds of flesh still search for Thee, but they to full perfection ne'er discern Thee, for they also are less than infinite; and as Thy perfect Mind and Will govern all things, inimitably and unerringly, from age to age, we can but seek to know Thee more and more, by contemplating the vastness, the majesty, the order, the beauty of Thy creation. We know not how souls at first received their birth from Thee; we cannot fathom the eternal abyss of Thy wisdom and Thy love, but Thy spirit is ever teaching us that the pure in heart shall see Thee, and the experiences of our own souls confirm the heavenly teaching. We come to Thee upon this day, when thousands upon thousands are congregated to dwell upon Thy love in providing means of salvation for man from sin and its consequences. We have gathered in this place to-day, that we may learn of Thee, Thou who art Thyself the Creator, Sustainer, Saviour and Redeemer of men; and we come to Thee as children to a gracious Father and a tender Mother: not to appease Thine ire or supplicate Thee to be gracious, but to strive to remove whatever impediments stand between us and a knowledge of Thyself. We know not all Thy laws, we keep not all we know; we need angelic, yea, divine strength to perfect and sustain us; and as the fair spring flowers open wide their petals to receive the light, as human eyes and ears are ever ready to welcome the sights and sounds of spring-time, and receive new baptisms of nature's lovliness and joy, so may we spiritually open every avenue of our being to receive Thy Light, and by it be blessed indeed for time and for eternity. AMEN.

LONDON LECTURES, 1884.

I.

WHAT THE WORLD NEEDS TO MAKE IT HAPPY.

WE have chosen, as the subject upon which to open up this Course of Lectures, "WHAT THE WORLD NEEDS TO MAKE IT HAPPY." This theme we have not idly or accidentally selected, but have thoughtfully made choice of it as a fitting introduction to all we may have to say in subsequent Discourses.

In order to make ourselves plain to our hearers, it is very necessary that we should at the outset of any special course of teaching, lay down very plainly certain general principles, upon which we intend to build, certain cardinal propositions which it will be needful for you to keep plainly before you, as our subjects unfold themselves in orderly sequence.

We start with the search for Happiness, and lay it down as a central affirmation, that every human spirit, either in this world or any other, seeks happiness: and that happiness can only be found in what may be truly termed a life of spiritual perfection.

The trite saying: "Virtue is its own reward, vice its own punishment," is ever true. But—What is virtue? What is vice? Can we point to any one on earth and say: Behold! he is altogether virtuous, or to any one else and exclaim: Behold! he is altogether vicious? We cannot pronounce any one wholly good, neither can we pronounce any one wholly happy; we can pronounce no one wholly evil, neither can we pronounce any one wholly miserable. Virtue and vice, happiness and misery, are on earth, at least, but relative terms. Absolute happiness and absolute virtue belong only to those celestial or deific states of being, where souls having completed their probationary progress enjoy uninterrupted felicity, as the result of unpolluted integrity and unsullied charity.

The search for happiness is purely natural and thoroughly justifiable. It is so universal that it is shared by all sentient beings without exception. Only very occasionally do we meet one who even professes to be indifferent to happiness; and this indifferentism is so morbid and unhealthy a thing, that we instinctively recoil from it, and cannot be made to see any virtue, beauty, or religion in it. Many persons' religious views are, however, so gloomy and pessimistic, that they wage incessant warfare against the natural and legitimate indulgence of our love of the beautiful, and our desire to enjoy ourselves and to see others enjoying themselves around us. The Puritans, for instance, considered not only dancing, theatricals, and evening parties, but even instrumental music and all other songs than sacred ones, sinful. They proposed to regard the earth as a dreary wilderness, a wretched waste, an arid desert, a vale of tears in which all the elect of God should appear among their fellows with sober countenances, and be known as saints by the gloominess and rigour of their conduct and appearance.

No doubt Cromwell's soldiers, who destroyed all the costly and exquisite works of art they could lay their hands upon, were actuated in part, at least, by a laudable protest against idolatry, which they wished to stamp out, root and branch, through the length and breadth of the land, but an insolent reactionary wave of feeling and action can be only temporarily healthful; it is in itself a storm, a scourge, a pestilence, a consuming fire which sweeps and burns everything before it, and like John the Baptist, who preached repentance only, like Carlyle who did little else than expose the wrongs and injustice in the world, it can never be more than a necessary precursor of some truth yet to dawn, which could never make its advent were it not for the hard and crude preparation which a sturdy iconoclasm has made for it.

Dr. Watts, tinctured with Puritanism though he was, and introducing into his hymnology many verses teaching the severest Calvinistic doctrines, has nevertheless made himself memorable as the author of these beautiful and justly-celebrated lines, forming part of a really charming and inspiring hymn :—

"Religion never was designed to make our pleasures less."

But the contexts very positively show that Dr. Watts' idea of pleasure is not that of the worldling, who speaks of enjoyment as though it were inseparable from expensive living and noisy recreation. He takes the ground that all our true joys must spring from that celestial world towards which we are all tending, and that before we rise to the immortal state beyond the stream of death, a reflected glory from the realms of bliss may light our pathway here, and cause us to enjoy, in anticipation at least, much of the happiness which will be uninterruptedly ours in a higher state of being than the present.

It is quite an open question, whether this constant living in the future is practically best or not. The best thinkers of this age are not usually averse to Mr. Moncure D. Conway's theory of an "Earthward Pilgrimage;" though, on the other hand, if earth be all, it is extremely unsatisfactory, as it raises many hopes it never gratifies, and constantly mocks us with delusive dreams of a fruition which can never come. The middle ground between two extremes is ever the wisest and safest stand to take; the golden mean is ever the most desirable position. We need the prospect of results to nerve us to noble endeavours here and now, and we need to give assiduous attention to the duties of the present hour, or we shall never qualify ourselves for future happiness, which is after all but the harvest of life's seed-time here below.

We find ourselves in conflict perpetually with two directly opposite schools of thought, both of which contain many great and good men and women, with whom personally we have no quarrel, but the fallacy or incompleteness of whose theories we feel bound to expose; as false theories of life are only too likely to give rise to erroneous modes of living, as we cannot expect a conscientious supporter of any theory not to be influenced by that theory in his daily conduct. The Church has always laid immense stress upon mere belief. Believe and be saved, disbelieve and be damned, has been for ages the watchword of orthodoxy. Liberal thinkers very naturally and reasonably object to this wholesale condemnation for eternity as well as time, of all who do not believe the Church dogmas, or place reliance upon a personal saviour and redeemer in the person of Jesus Christ. But though we sympathize most warmly with all who dissent from doctrines their reason cannot accept, we can nevertheless see the rise of the doctrine that salvation is the result of faith, in a very natural experience of human life. The doctrine has its analogy in the affairs of material life. Take an instance: one of you desires to go from London to New York, and you persistently sail in an easterly instead of a westerly direction. You have got into your head that New York lies east from London, and so long as you believe this you will go on sailing east and getting farther and farther away from your desired destination. Some one points out to you your mistake, and causes you to see, acknowledge, and rectify your error, with this result: you at once change your course completely, you convert yourself, or you are converted through the instrumentality of the person who has made you see your error and rectify it, and henceforth you sail west instead of east, and in due time arrive at your journey's end and find yourself safely landed in the port where you desire to be.

You can readily multiply instances to prove that a right faith is necessary to a right life, and that as works are necessary to spiritual growth, and works largely depend on faith, faith may be necessary as a cause while works are its natural effects. The temperance advocate may go on preaching against the use of alcohol, but people will go on manufacturing and drinking it till they see it to be an evil; you may talk as much as you will about temperance legislation and enforced abstinence under penalty attached to disobedience, but laws cannot be passed until people are disposed to pass them, and even if passed while generally unpopular they will be to a great extent evaded, disregarded, and in many cases openly defied. Moral suasion and mental advancement will accomplish in this country far more in a single week than coercive measures in twenty years. People are no longer the children in understanding they were in the dark ages, no longer can they be governed by fear, and made to live soberly because they fear the chastisement of an outraged sovereign. The culture of the intellect and the development of the moral sense in the individual, constitute the pride and glory of the nineteenth century, and all preaching to be lastingly effective must be addressed to the souls and intellects of men, to their sense of right and of utility, not to their craven dread of punishment, or their debasing fear of a divine or human tyrant.

The search for happiness is universal, the instinct of self-preservation is naturally implanted in every living creature: and as no instinct is given to us for naught, as no natural impulse is in itself sinful or unworthy, it is surely justifiable on the part of us all, to do all that in us lies to promote our own happiness and welfare as well as that of others. The mistake has been to regard a purely natural animal instinct as an evidence of supernatural grace. Perhaps no text has been more frequently spoken from in Christian pulpits than this: "What shall we do to be saved?" It has formed a fruitful topic for innumerable tracts and sermons of the most rhapsodic and exciting kind, and yet the occasion of that question being originally asked, by the keepers of the prison where Paul and Silas were confined, according to the Acts of the Apostles, does not necessarily justify the immense stress which evangelical divines invariably lay upon it. We are told that there was a fearful earthquake which caused great alarm to the jailors, and that through its instrumentality and also by the aid of spirit-power, the fettered disciples had their chains broken and were themselves set free. The superstitious and terrified officers of the law shrieked out to the delivered captives: "What shall we do to be saved?" and received the answer: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and ye shall be saved, and all your households." The salvation referred to by Paul and his companion was, undoubtedly, salvation from that fear which made life burdensome, and in the event of a sudden natural upheaval, a burden almost too heavy to be borne.

The fear of death is one of the greatest curses of humanity. It arises no doubt from the inscrutable mystery which ever enshrouds man's future, and also from the sense of unpreparedness for life beyond, which oppresses every heart when conscious of duties unfulfilled and time and opportunities for improvement and amendment wasted. Remove all fear of death and of the hereafter from the minds of men, and you have done for the world what ages of work in every other direction could never accomplish. Can intelligent, thinking people be happy or feel any security, with the awful dread of eternal misery constantly hanging over their heads? Can any sane and cautious individual erect a homestead at the base of Etna or Vesuvius, and feel contented and secure when at any moment a volcanic eruption may bring death and desolation to himself and all he holds most dear. The fear of death has been and to a large extent still is the nightmare of the world. To assuage this terror and calm this fear, rivers of blood have been outpoured in vain; human as well as animal sacrifices have been offered upon the altars of all religions. Christianity has not been exempt from the terrible charge of murder: the heretics burnt at the stake by Catholics and Protestants alike; the bloody wars engaged in; the cruel massacres perpetrated to appease the wrath of an offended deity, render sickening the pages of history, which record the progress of a religion avowedly under direction of the heavenly Prince of Peace. We condemn no one system more than another; we find fault with no one class of persons more than with others; we attribute much, though not all of the iniquities perpetrated in Religion's sacred name, to the terrible dread of divine wrath, which has so overwhelmed men's minds that they have made frantic attempts to appease the offended Sovereign of the Universe, by slaughtering upon altars dedicated to His name whatever the devotee most highly prized or dearly loved. In this age of the study of comparative theology, we are obliged to place side by side the glories and defects of all the religious systems of the world, so far as we able, and with what result? Surely we are forced to the conclusion that no one system of religion has a monopoly of truth or a monopoly of error, but that all systems have been defiled, even from their inception, with the fearful thought of an angry God and some dreadful outpouring of His wrath in the world to come.

We have just celebrated the Thirty-sixth Anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism, and in addresses appropriate to the occasion have endeavoured to enumerate some of the most important advantages of Spiritualism to the world. First and foremost among these advantages do we place the revelation Spiritualism makes of the hereafter, and the immense influence it has exerted in freeing the human mind from that enslaving fear of death, which is so widespread and so terrible in many instances. Spiritualism may have intoxicated those who have been too suddenly brought under the searching beams of its stupendous light; some may have been so elated with its consolations, so blinded with its revelations, that so much light has made them dizzy, and they have staggered and fallen by the wayside, while the enemies of Spiritualism have rejoiced over their temporary bewilderment, and proclaimed with the voices of trumpeters, that Spiritualism leads its victims to immorality or the madhouse. But to the great majority of those upon whom its light has shone, its warnings have been equal to its promises, and its faithful delineations of sorrow as well as joy in the spirit-world, have led to sober reflections upon the responsibility attached to human life, and the inevitable results in the future of all acts committed, words spoken, and thoughts encouraged here. Spiritualism is, after all, the only system that can effectually overcome that unfounded or exaggerated fear of death, which is so prevalent in the world, and so direful in its consequences to humanity. No amount of Atheism, Materialism or Agnosticism can do anything more than leave the future life an utter blank, an impenetrable mystery. To disbelieve in a future life, or to doubt there is one, proves nothing; and in the absence of proof to the contrary, orthodoxy may be true after all.

Before we can effectually refute the false theories of our orthodox brethren, we must first prove what there really is beyond death; we must clasp hands across the mystic river with our brethren gone before, for only when we can explore the land where they are dwelling, and bring tidings to the world concerning the Realm of Spirit, have we positive, definite knowledge wherewith to silence doubt and put to flight erroneous theories. In the absence of definite knowledge concerning the life after death, any theory may be true; we can never displace an error unless we have a fact to put in its place, which renders it (the error) an impossibility. Let all our teachers remember this when they pour out tirades of abuse against those who differ from them, and hold up to ridicule the opinions and doctrines of others. To prove others wrong is not to prove yourselves right; you must prove that something is true; prove an affirmation, ere you can dethrone an error or destroy a superstition. No error is completely overturned except by a truth, which renders it impossible. You are falsely accused, for instance, of committing some misdemeanour, in a certain place, at a certain time. How is the accusation to be refuted and your reputation restored? Simply by your proving where you really were at that particular time, and if it can be shown to the satisfaction of the court, where you were at that moment, common sense declares you could not have been elsewhere. You have thereby saved your character and escaped fine or imprisonment.

Agnosticism is an improvement upon Orthodoxy, in a purely negative sense: it deadens the fear of hell, but who shall say that the sceptic is not oftentimes the most miserable of men? He tells you he does not believe this, that, and the other; but can he prove anything to the contrary? What certainty can he have that the very things he denies may not be realities after all. Knowledge not ignorance, certainty not doubt, gives real and lasting happiness, and no one can be said to be truly happy until he has some satisfactory philosophy which can stand by him in foul weather as in fair, never leaving him in his hours of loneliness, depression and well-nigh despair.

Far be it from us to assert that a knowledge of phenomenal Spiritualism is necessary to this result. There are intuitive evidences of the justice of God and the real nature of life here and hereafter, which need no phenomena to make them more secure: but how any thoughtful and affectionate person can be satisfied or happy when he holds orthodox opinions concerning the future, is more than we can imagine.

A few years ago we knew a lady who had seven children, all of whom she professed to love very dearly. Three of these children were converted, according to her belief, and were members of Christian churches; the other four were "yet in their sins." Two of her sons, both of them "unconverted," were engaged in very dangerous business, and at any moment might be hurried into eternity. This lady said she fully believed that if either or both of her sons should die in their then condition, they would go to hell and remain there for ever; while she and her three other children were secure of heaven. Was this woman concerned about her unconverted children? Apparently not; she dwelt so much upon her own personal security that she paid little heed to the moral state of her sons in peril of eternal doom. And why should she? She professed to love God, and bow in all things to His will. One of her favourite texts, when questioned on this matter, was: "Shall not the judge of all the earth do right? But what is right, if it is not that which is increasingly revealed to man through the moral sense, with growing brightness age after age, as right? Are we to take certain isolated texts and distorted views of Scripture, and cling to them with a death-grip, when they outrage our every sense of rectitude, and at the same time flatly contradict the precept and example of that Great Teacher whom Christendom acknowledges as God made manifest in flesh? Callousness, indifferentism, selfishness: Is this religion? To be satisfied with safety for oneself when others are in danger: Is this nobility? Such consummate selfishness, according to the Gospels, led to the doom of Dives, for whom the cleansing fires of a spiritual Gehenna were necessary to the bringing out of his latent regard for the welfare of his brethren who yet remained on earth. We are told in the Lives of the Saints, that many a holy man has been so overcome when contemplating the wicked in futurity, that though the weather was bitterly cold, his cell unwarmed, and himself most thinly clad, he became so heated with intensity of feeling that the perspiration streamed down him in torrents; and if poor, frail, fallible, imperfect man can be so deeply touched at the mere thought of the sufferings of his fellow-beings, can we for a moment dare to blaspheme the Eternal, by imagining that he can regard as eternally right that which we in our imperfect charity cannot bear to so much as consider with complacency for a single instant? / This brings us to a point where we wish to say something concerning the nature of Happiness in the Spirit Spheres. We are constantly asked if friends in the higher life know how their loved ones suffer on the earth, and in adjacent spheres; if so, can they be happy? Many prevailing conceptions of the spirit-world are remarkably incorrect. Orthodox theories teach that all who die in Christ are instantly at rest, immediately translated to some fair and glorious world where they will sorrow and sigh nevermore. Happiness, however, in the spirit-world depends, as it does on earth, upon inward growth and harmony. Nothing can give us happiness unless we have developed within us power to appreciate and enjoy. A box at the opera is of no use to a deaf man, or to one who cannot enjoy the music. A ticket to a flower show, or a picture gallery, is of no possible service to one who is blind to form and colour, or who has no regard for floral and artistic beauties. Enjoyment is ours when we have earned the right, and developed the power to enjoy, but no sooner. Death is the great emancipator, who sets us all free by his mystic touch, to find our own level; but death does not endow us with either knowledge or spiritual development; these are not consequent upon his icy touch. Happiness in the material world is dependent upon knowledge and contentment, upon usefulness and symmetry, upon ability to discover the use of life, and the disposition to employ every energy in the performance of some useful tasks, which, while they do not overtax or strain the mind, constantly and harmoniously employ its every capability.

Work has been too often associated with the fall of man; we hear that labour is a curse, and that if our first parents had not transgressed the command of God in Eden, 6000 years ago, we should have enjoyed a physical immortality of luxurious indolence and ease. But neither work nor death came into the world by sin, which is any deliberate breaking of a Divine command or natural law; work and death are alike necessary to the evolution of higher and ever higher states of being, and correct views of both work and death (for both are inevitable) are in our opinion essential to the most perfect unfoldment of human nature here and hereafter.

We have already spoken of the fear of death as one of the greatest blights and curses of the world, and have asked you to consider well the importance of a spiritual revelation which explains the part played by death in the evolution of ultimately perfect states of being. We have only to study natural science, to learn how vegetables died, and animals died, before primeval man could walk this planet; and as there can be no discordance between the word and works of Deity, that cannot be a true message from the Infinite, which in any way falsifies the message from the Eternal, which he delivers to us through the agency of his magnificent creation.

We have now to inquire: Is not work as inseparable from human happiness as it is from human usefulness? Our answer is an unqualified affirmation. Work and happiness are inseparable. Idleness and misery go hand-in-hand, and if we are truly intent on making ourselves and others happy, we shall carefully see to it that as far as can be, every human being is usefully and appropriately employed.

We hear in these days a great deal about the sin of drunkenness. You organize vast Temperance organizations. Blue Ribbon Armies, &c., &c., but do the great masses of temperance advocates. sincere and philanthropic though they may be, weigh sufficiently the significance and importance of the view of the subject taken by Henry George, and many other earnest social revolutionists? Henry George's remedy for every ill is "Land Nationalization." You may not all agree with him in his views upon land distribution, but no really earnest thinker can fail to coincide entirely with his views on Home influence. Mr. George very truly says, that while intemperance is the cause of a vast amount of misery, intemperance is oftener produced by unhappiness at home than unhappiness at home is produced by intemperance. The mind naturally seeks comfort and recreation somewhere. If after the toil and worry of the day, your husbands, fathers, brothers, sons, and lodgers come home to an uninviting substitute for a home, can you expect them to remain sober and steady, and stay at home when they have practically no home to stay in?

We are constantly being asked to point those outside the Spiritual Movement to Churches, Hospitals, Orphanages, &c., erected and sustained by Spiritualists. We are told that the immense Charitable Institutions of England and America are the pride and glory and direct outgrowth of Christianity. If they are, let us credit Christianity with having done some good, but let us strive to accomplish yet more good than our Christian brethren have accomplished. Our work must be to create and sustain bright and happy homes, and we shall never have these till work is regarded as an honour, instead of a dishonour, while all useful occupations, and those who engage in them, are placed on a footing of rational equality, equally honoured and equally respected. Every sincere and conscientious worker should be regarded as a necessary part of human society; so soon as this is, so soon we shall, perhaps, begin to understand what is really meant by that "Christ" about which we hear so much as a person, but which the early Christians regarded as a body of faithful and united workers, of whom Jesus was the head. But as the foot cannot say to the hand, nor the eye to the ear: I have no need of thee; as members veiled and unseen are as necessary to the whole frame as ever the most conspicuous and ornamental can be, so in an ideal state of society, he who cleanses the streets and he who discourses eloquently on matters pertaining to religion; she who with broom in hand sweeps clean the kitchen and she who with piano or easel makes vocal or beautiful the drawing-room, must be accounted as absolutely necessary, the one to the other, and both to all. Imagine Mr. Gladstone deprived of the assistance rendered him by the sons and daughters of toil! He would have to spend all his time and strength in making provision for his material wants. With what result? He would be unable to devote time, talent and energy, as he does now, to the affairs of State. Mr. Gladstone's tailor, baker and cook are just as essential to his Parliamentary eloquence as he is himself.

We throw this fact into especial prominence, to enforce the dignity of labour, and to do what in us lies to reconcile all persons to their state in life, no matter what it may be. There are many who complain of drudgery, and sigh for more exalted stations. We hear no end of grumblers, finding fault with their work, and sighing over its uselessness. They are clerks, or servants, or agriculturists, or housekeepers: their days are all spent in making up parcels, and delivering them, in weighing out provisions, in cleaning rooms, and mending clothes. To what end is all this turmoil, this worry, this unceasing strife? Martha, in the kitchen, is disposed to envy Mary, seated at the footstool of some great teacher, drinking in words of inspiration as they fall from his heaven-anointed lips; but has Martha any reason to complain? If Mary's is the "better part," it is only so because Mary has attained to such a height of spirituality, that she can enjoy the sublimity of the Great Teacher's utterances. If Martha's mind were as receptive to spiritual things as Mary's, she might enjoy equal communion with a master-mind, intuitively, if not outwardly. And this brings us to that point where we see practically illustrated the utter impossibility of simply local heavens and hells, conferring happiness or misery upon their occupants.

Let us take the case of a modern Martha and Mary. A pattern Martha is a born housekeeper; one who is never so happy as when she is dusting and sweeping, baking, ordering, superintending. Her house is her palace, and she is the happy and active queen, never so content as when she is controlling all things under her, and making them serve her purpose. The pattern Mary is a student: she is always engrossed in artistic and literary occupations; her mind is not on the kitchen, but on the study. Let these two women change places, and they would be out of their native elements. As well try and make fish fly in the air and birds swim in the water, as put these women in each other's places. The housekeeper's happiness is as a housekeeper. If it be genuine and enduring it consists in this, that she realizes the necessity of the work in which she is engaged. She does not, like Martha of Bethany, trouble herself about providing a great many more dishes than her guests require, neither does she attach such supreme importance to domestic affairs that she loses sight of the value of higher and more directly spiritual pursuits. She rather takes into account the relative value of diverse occupations, realizes her own ability to fill a certain niche in the great temple of humanity; and she fills her niche admirably, knowing that even though a humble and minor one, if it were left unoccupied all the rest of the building would be unfinished, and, perhaps, insecure. The pattern Mary never despises her sister's occupations, never looks down on those less educated, and less interested in æsthetic pursuits than herself. She acknowledges her indebtedness to her Martha-like sisters, and they—if they are intelligent, humane women—return the compliment, and let the Marys see how indispensable they are to them, and to all the brethren.

The secret of a happy life, is that the liver feels himself or herself to be engaged in some useful, necessary and elevating work; and if at times life's burdens press very heavily, and the load seems almost too grievous to be borne, the tried spirit takes comfort with two blessed assurances: one is, that whatever we do faithfully as our contribution to the world's store, blesses some one; and the other is, that all our sufferings while they have a vicarious have also a personal value. When we have learned all the lessons that can be taught us by temptation, suffering and trial, we shall know no more of trials and temptations. Every sorrow is a part of our education, and no one can ever be truly resigned to life, until he feels that every burden imposed upon him is both for his own and others' good.

Our last thought carries us beyond the realms of time and sense, beyond the murky shades of material existence, to the beatified spirits whom we call angels or celestial beings, who, while they are cognizant of human sorrow, are not made sad by it, and while they mingle even in the life of the hells, are not contaminated thereby. One of the greatest drawbacks to Spiritualism in the feeling of many is, that it teaches that the loved ones who have gone to the spirit-world, are not so fully at rest as orthodoxy has said they were. It is difficult for some minds to reconcile the discrepancy between the doctrine of perfect happiness in the angelic spheres, and the acquaintance with human misery which angels must have if they are ministering spirits to those yet on earth. Of course, it is needless to declare that we know of progression beyond the grave, and that all happiness is measurable and increases with the spiritual development of the individual: but when happiness is complete, malice, hatred, and all uncharitableness are completely eliminated from the breast of the perpetually happy spirit. That spirit is never exacting, never self-seeking, always working for others' good, bestowing no single thought on self-aggrandizement. Such a spirit has attained to the celestial degree of life. He may not know everything; an infinity of knowledge may yet be his to grasp, but wishing no ill to any, loving all tenderly and truly wherever he goes—be it even into haunts of deepest crime—he remains pure as the light, which shining into the foulest dungeon is uncorrupted still.

Spirits who have not yet fully out-grown their moral imperfections, are like water—they can be polluted; those who have overcome every temptation and conquered in the fray, are like the pure unsullied light—go where they will they are forever unsullied. Their sight and knowledge of human misery does not really distress them, because they have themselves passed through it, reaped its advantages, and have therefore learned how essential it is to the rounding out of character and development of the moral nature. The angel is like the friend on a mountain-top, while you, his charge, are in the valley. You cannot see more than a step before you; he see the fair pastures and the glorious homes ahead. He does not weep over your lot, he does not pity you or condole with you; he spurs you on over the Hill Difficulty, through the Valley of Humiliation, on to the Land of Beulah, and at length to the Celestial City.

When one can look at life with angel's eyes, and see its purpose and its outcome, then good-bye to every repining word and discontented mood. If we would be truly happy in this or any other world or life, we must strive earnestly to bless rather than to be blessed, to confer happiness rather than to obtain it, and in so doing we shall develop a Kingdom of Heaven within us, which we can carry with us wherever we go, as our unfading source of joy for ever and ever.

We leave with you for your consideration a new motto: "Strive to be a Glow-worm!" while we leave it to yourselves, in your quiet hours, to work out the meaning of the precept.

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE CROSS-BEARER.

I ASKED of the angels, bright and fair: what work have you for me?
I told them, the heaviest cross I'd bear, to set my brethren free
From their load of want, and pain, and care. But the angels answered me:
"We call you not to bear such cross; there's your burden, can you see That tiny cross, so near the ground, which is among the rushes found."

I gazed with wond'rous great amaze upon that cross so small;
For I had asked a mightier task—I had asked the angels all,
Some great and glorious work to do, that should startle all mankind:
And when I raised that tiny cross, surprised its weight to find
Far heavier than I thought 'twould be, life's burdens great and tall,
I prayed the angels to exchange my load for one less small.

For, said I, Oh! if I may but take a burden of precious gold,
Its very glory will bear me up; that heavier cross I'll hold
Most willingly, and bear it thro' the desert, bleak and wild,
But give me not this tiny cross, so heavy for a child;
Yet so unlovely 'tis withal, its beauty none can see,
And, if I bear it, what reward will ever come to me?

A meek-faced angel, clad in robes of dazzling, snowy white,
With coronet of lilies fair, and jewels, sparkling bright,
Bowed down with kind and tender smile to me, her erring child,
And said, "You but deceive yourself; this cross, that you despise
And think so lowly, yet will yield a harvest passing good,
Flowers and fruits, most beautiful, will spring from that bare wood!"

"But," said I, "Angel! may I not some glorious burden bear?
Behold those martyrs, radiant-browed, with glorious light for hair!
Behold philanthropists who stand among the highest there,
Where all the spirits look so bright—what burdens did they bear?
Oh! may I not, like them, go down to the weary earth below,
And carry e'en the heaviest load, that I like them may grow?"

Straightway, as tho' with fairy wand, the angel touched my eyes,
And showed to me the earthly life of those in Paradise;
And one, more bright than all the rest, advancing close to me,
Revealed her work in earthly form, when she in drudgery
Had toiled and slaved, both night and day, to keep a cellar clean,
Protect twelve children from the frost, while scarcely could she glean,
By honest industry, enough to keep fire in the grate,
To feed and warm the helpless ones who on her toil must wait.

"And was that all?" I then enquired, "That God did ask of thee,
So gifted, beautiful, and wise, of such divine degree;
Wert thou not numbered 'mid the throng of those the world counts great,
And did not Emperors and Kings adorn thy form in state,
And summon thee to palace halls, to sing thy songs so grand,
Or hang thy pictures on their walls, o'er all some mighty land?"
"Nay," answered she, "it was not so; my spirit highest rose,
When far from grandeur and display, it dwelt 'mid human woes."

Then to the angel straight I turned—To my wise and gentle guide,
And eagerly did take from her, from yonder paradise,
The lowly cross I bore on earth throughout a life of pain,
Till I, by blessing other lives, the heavenly spheres might gain.

This little story from the spheres, I bring to you to-day,
That while on earth in want and toil your spirits need to stay,
This blessed truth may buoy them up, above the clouds of pain:
The lowliest workers oftentimes the heights of heaven gain!

BENEDICTION.

God grant that all, both high and low, as men count low and great,
May follow Charity's blest law, and find heaven's pearly gate;
And then with earthly journeys o'er, where every trial doth cease,
May each and all, at God's right hand, enjoy eternal peace!

II.

SEVEN STEPS TO SPIRITUAL PERFECTION.

(Delivered, Good Friday, April 11th, 1884.)

GOOD FRIDAY has always been consecrated in the Christian world to solemn commemoration of the sufferings and death of that great hero of the Gospels, Jesus the Christ, around whose memory so much affectionate devotion clusters, wherever persons are to be found who can appreciate loyalty to conviction under the most trying circumstances possible, conscientious, steadfast, unselfish devotion to truth and the highest interests of humanity, no matter to how great an extent self-sacrifice may be necessary to the maintenance of this unswerving and God-like integrity.

The hero of the Gospels has been deified quite naturally. His deification is as easy to be accounted for as the simplest forms of hero worship. (Veneration is an organ of the human brain quite as indispensable to man's being as any other organ can be, and the cultivation of the religious instinct should always be included in every scheme of education, which lays any claim to being perfect or even good.) Objection may be made by Secularists and others to the use of the Bible in public schools supported by public money, and indeed to every form of teaching that can with any degree of truth be denominated sectarian, but widely as persons may differ concerning every non-essential, (the great essentials of character are everywhere insisted upon as necessary to the best and happiest life on earth, whether people believe or disbelieve in consciousness hereafter.)

The beauty of the moral character of Jesus can never be overestimated; criticize his conduct on certain exceptional occasions as you will, these exceptions the more strikingly prove the rule, and show him to us all the more conspicuously in his accustomed robe of gentleness and humility. If he occasionally gave way to impetuosity or hastiness of temper, if he once in a while seems arrogant and self-asserting, these few and occasional blemishes in a character usually extraordinarily near perfection, make the general features of the character all the more prominent and remarkable.

We know quite well that there are many in these days who will tell you that Jesus is a myth; that no such man ever existed, or that if he did exist, contemporaneous history is silent concerning him, and therefore nothing whatever can be with certainty attributed to a man who, if not a myth, was an almost unknown personage during his earthly lifetime. Did we teach the necessity of belief in Christ as indispensable to salvation; did we regard the Gospels as final and in the highest sense authoritative on all subjects of which they treat; did we pledge ourselves to accept everything and reject nothing put forward as truth by the Evangelists; did we acknowledge no other court of appeal than the Scriptures; did we, as our orthodox friends are apt to do, weigh and measure all things by the biblical standard, to the shutting out of all modern inspiration,—we might find a difficulty in treating of the influence of Jesus upon the world, unless we could prove with certainty, not only the fact of his personal existence but also the miraculous manner of his life, death and resurrection. Having, however, taken no such premises as our orthodox brethren take, our task is very much lighter than theirs; as it is ours to deal with the character as it stands out in history, independent of any special theories concerning the original, while it is theirs to refer to Jesus as "very God of very God, begotten of his Father before all worlds were made."

Let us consider the character of Jesus as we would that of any other man, or of any great hero of romance. Some people are very anxious to draw hard and fast lines between works of fact and works of fiction, and between what is founded on fact and what is purely imaginative. No clear lines can ever be traced in these cases. Fact and fiction are so interwoven, so mysteriously interblent, that it is impossible to say where one leaves off and the other begins. So-called fiction is often fact in a fancy costume, as facts are not materially altered by change of time and place, or by any alteration whatever in the mere garb in which they are presented to the public.

No one can write higher than his experience or inspirations carry him, and no one can be inspired with anything beyond the experiences of the inspirer. Sometimes, if you are novelists, you will find yourselves making ideal characters, by taking parts of a great many characters which are real to you in your experiences through life, and throwing them together till they form your hero or heroine. Sometimes, if you are mediumistic, you will write almost automatically; you will at least follow some impulse so strong that it is practically irresistible. Frequently these inspirations come to you from spiritual beings who, when they lived on earth, underwent exactly the experiences of which you find yourselves compelled to write. The theory of Inspiration needs liberalizing and unfolding; it is so narrow in many minds that it leads multitudes of intelligent persons to taboo the facts of spiritual communion altogether.

These remarks, bearing somewhat upon the "Theological Conflict" in which many of you have been interested lately, we have merely introduced to let you perceive as plainly as possible the views we take of mere disputations concerning what is historical; when we have practically to deal with great propositions of a moral character, which neither lose nor gain anything in the estimation of true philosophers, by being connected with or disassociated from any particular country, period, or personage.

"Seven Steps to Spiritual Perfection" is the topic we have announced for this morning, and as the churches throughout the length and breadth of the land are at this time considering the seven last sentences or words of Jesus on the cross, we intend to take these up very briefly, one by one, and see what spiritual truth they may contain, and what important lessons they may be capable of conveying to those who study them.

We ask you, in imagination, to put yourselves in the place of those who witnessed the wondrous spectacle of the crucifixion of an innocent man between two malefactors, whose only crime was his too plain-speaking concerning matters which it was to the interest of the priests and civil rulers to have kept quiet, that power might remain vested exclusively in their own hands. There is nothing improbable in the story told by the Evangelists. Crucifixion was a Roman mode of punishment, and Judea was at one time a Roman province, under Roman jurisdiction. The putting to death of a heretic, who was also in insurrection, is not difficult to realize, when the tragic end of Socrates and martyrs innumerable is still on record.

We are told concerning Jesus, that on the Sunday before his Passion, he was triumphantly introduced into Jerusalem, accompanied by the hosannas of the multitude, and the adoration of the very people who only five days later would shout: "Crucify him, crucify him!" The incidents are so graphically portrayed, that if any one should style the Gospels romances, they must admit that they are not only most cleverly written, but that they abound in telling portraits of human nature, as it is all the world over and in all periods of human history.

(Popular applause is no criterion of real merit, and no spiritual worker should ever be anxious for it. Very often applause is granted to mediocrity and withheld from exceptional talent; because while a multitude are ready to appreciate commonplaceness, only the very few are, among prepared minds, ready to benefit by a supernal revelation of truth.)

The great struggle in the closing days of the life of Jesus, seems to be between the old Messianic idea of a deliverer interpreted materially and interpreted spiritually. The orthodox party among the Jews was determined to literalize every prediction of the olden prophets, therefore, whenever they were disposed to regard Jesus as an inspired teacher, they tried to make him a king. Their ideas of atonement, or redemption, were eminently vicarious or substitutionary, for no matter how sunk in materiality and injustice they might be, they constantly expected a man to rise up among them of the house and lineage of David, who should put himself at the head of an army which should soon discomfit all the enemies of Israel, and lead his victorious troops to a complete triumph over the Romans, to whom the Jews considered it a great disgrace to be in bondage. The spiritual, or reform party, contended for an interior or moral interpretation of the Law and Prophets. They declared that all prophecies were made conditionally, that they referred to Israel only so far as Israel obeyed the divine law; for should Israel rebel against Jehovah, then her doom was certain, and even greater, because of the opportunities and advantages she had had over all the other races of mankind.

Great opportunities necessarily imply great responsibilities. If you have ten talents, you must account for ten; but if only two are entrusted to you, then only two more than these are you expected to win. The unprofitable servant was not upbraided because of his slender endowments; he had one talent, but used none, and for this reason he was cast into outer darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth.

(Jesus taught the unpopular doctrine of the divine impartiality. The God whom he worshipped and revealed was a Universal Parent, not the leader and patron of one single privileged clan. Strange though it may seem, there is a deep-rooted prejudice in the human mind against any philosophy which teaches that God and his laws respect no one person or nation more than another. Teach divine favouritism; teach that some persons are elect, or that some will be rewarded for efforts which are not recognised in others; teach that those who have not encountered the manifold temptations of life shall, on the score of simple abstinence from sins they have had no inclination to commit, enter the highest heavens immediately they leave their material frames, and you may count upon a large congregation of Pharisees, who will applaud you to the echo, and adore you for your orthodoxy; but preach the highest truth which appeals to your inmost sense of right, and your followers will surely be in a minority, and if you live where freedom is not secured by law, you stand a great chance of meeting the fate of many a true reformer, who has consulted conviction rather than policy.

Jesus had boldly told the most reputable and influential citizens of Jerusalem that they were "whited sepulchres." He had boldly rebuked them for their long prayers and fastings, which they thought must surely win the favour of heaven and pardon for all their sins.) He had turned out those who bought and sold in the courts of the Temple, where it was customary to take advantage of the ignorance of those who came from the country, to offer sacrifices in the holy city, and did not know the marketable value of the birds and animals kept for sale to those who visited the temple from the surrounding country.

Some people have found fault with the harshness displayed by Jesus on this occasion, but righteous indignation against wrong is in no sense inconsistent with universal charity. No one who is truly charitable can see a wrong and not endeavour to redress it; no one imbued with a strong sense of justice, and having a concern for the welfare of others, can fail to express indignation at a course of action which pauperizes those in humble circumstances, taking a mean and unjust advantage of their necessities and ignorance; for the very concern for these people will lead to a vigorous protest against such courses of action as do harm to the multitude, and increase the ill-gotten gains of haughty and tyrannical monopolists. (Laxity of morals, and indifference to the wrongs of others, can be no part of charity, as true charity can never be unjust, and true justice can never be uncharitable.)

We are told that the first words uttered by Jesus on the cross were: "Father! forgive them, for they know not what they do." In these words human sin is attributed to human ignorance, and the plea for forgiveness is based upon the ignorance of the wrong-doer.

Now, are we justified in attributing sin to ignorance in all cases? Is not very much evil resultant from deliberate wrong desire? We may argue the point as we will, and arrive, perhaps, at widely divergent conclusions in some instances, but all moralists bent on improving society, must agree that our work is to remove evils, not to punish evil-doers; except by the administration of such chastisement as is indispensable to the overcoming of the love of evil in the heart of the wrong-doer.

(We can scarcely go too far in applying the doctrine of Necessity to all persons except ourselves, because we cannot tell what their temptations may have been, how hardly they have struggled to overcome, and how futile their best endeavours may have been. We can know something of ourselves, and our own experiences; our moral sense is given to us as a lever to lift us higher, and it is never necessary to believe in an offended Deity, to account for the existence and activity of the moral sense, or conscience, within man. This conscience is the voice of the soul, pleading to be delivered from carnal bondage. Matter is a prison-house for the soul, until such time as the spirit has vanquished it; then it becomes the ready tool and obedient vassal in the hands of its rightful controller.)

To attribute human sin to ignorance, and to style it folly, is quite rational, even should we take the worst possible view of human nature, and consider man at his lowest as being utterly selfish, actuated by no motives higher than concern for personal welfare. (Even were we all consummately selfish, we should have no interest in committing crime or depredation, did we really know what was necessary to our own individual welfare. No adage is truer than that old and oft-quoted one: "Virtue is its own reward; vice its own punishment." We are confronted with the mystery of pain and evil in the world, and often ask: Are these things reconcilable with the perfect wisdom and love of the Supreme Being, about which we hear so much? Absolute, positive, or eternal evil cannot be reconciled with a Supreme Being of infinite justice, as there can be but one absolute, positive, eternal, or primal state of being in the universe. If it be good, there can only be relative and temporal evil; if that primal state be evil, then goodness must have begun in time, and must be destined to expire with the lapse of ages.)

The Persians endeavoured at one time to account for the coexistence of good and evil by what is known as a system of Dualism. They worshipped Ormuzd and Ahriman conjointly. Ormuzd was said to be the Creator and Source of light and good, while Ahriman was regarded as the Fount of darkness and evil; but there cannot be in nature two such rival powers; and this the most enlightened among the Persians clearly saw when they foretold the ultimate and complete subjugation of evil to good and darkness to light, as only Good and Light are positive existences in all the boundless realms of space.

The importance of Universalism can never be overestimated, as it has a direct moral bearing upon every theory of reform and act of life. We know full well that many Materialists and many Calvinists are most excellent people, and their efforts are exceptionally praiseworthy in many instances, as they rise above their respective deities in their daily conduct. The God of Calvin is an angry, capricious spirit, whose tyranny far outweighs his graciousness; the "Nature" of the Materialist is a soulless force, a blind destiny, an inexorable fate, possessing neither justice nor compassion. We cannot but admire the philanthropy of persons who are better than their creeds, but these very persons exemplify in their own lives the fallacy of their theories. In them goodness of heart certainly does atone for errors of the head; but where is the profound thinker who does not desire to see a true and lasting union, on a rational and moral basis, effected between the affections and the intellect? We are well aware that sectarian efforts can never accomplish this. Denominational Universalism in America is considered by some stagnant or at best but slightly progressive; still it is admitted on every hand that Hosea Ballou, Murray and many other brave pioneers who fought manfully for the doctrine of universal salvation, at a time when to avow one's belief in the boundlessness of the love of God was to awaken in its direst fury the almost fiendish wrath of bigoted adherents to the system of Calvin, in New England, have exerted a vastly wider influence upon the thought of America, and indeed upon the whole civilized world, than any sectarian scheme could possibly have done, no matter how successful. The very idea of the universality of God's fatherhood and man's brotherhood, must have a tendency towards the unification of human interests and sympathies. If we are all fellow travellers to the same goal, all fellow sufferers, fellow pilgrims, all regarded with equal kindness by the Eternal Mind, we must, surely, unless we utterly fail to inwardly realize what we outwardly profess, be stimulated to such efforts for the promotion of the general good of the human family, as may make the self-denying love of a saviour something infinitely more to us than a beautiful dream, a lovely fairy tale, an ancient legend of singular pathos, or, what is much less, considered morally, a mere relic of ancient superstitions and phantasies.

In due course during this series of Lectures, we shall devote an hour to a special consideration of the presumed zodiacal origin of Christianity, and shall proceed to show how utterly incomplete and unsatisfactory are theories of "equinoctial christolatry," which pretend to account for the Gospel narratives. We do not deny that the very ancient Egyptians, or even that pre-historic races, had their conceptions of Deity, their belief in incarnate deities, and their theories of rewards and punishments after death, and that Christianity, even in its original simplicity, that the religion of Jesus itself perpetuated many old-world ideas, and endorsed many ancient precepts.

The beauty of the religion of Jesus is its eclectisism and its catholicity. Were it a distinct revelation, utterly separated by impassable barriers from all other religions, it would not have answered to the spiritual and social needs of mankind; neither would it have promoted unity of sentiment and universal toleration among men. God can have no favourites. A Hottentot or a Negro must be quite as sacred in the eyes of Infinite Goodness as a polished Anglo-Saxon. The barbarian and the civilizee, the Jew and the Gentile, are alike precious in the sight of Infinite Love and Wisdom; and he whose painful death all Christians commemorate to-day, taught nothing more plainly than the absolute impartiality of the Eternal Mind. It is quite erroneous to suppose that the idea of God's fatherhood originated with Jesus, or that his teachings were in all instances more than sweet echoes from many an old refrain; but what we have to consider to-day is not so much the antiquity or the origin of a precept, as the intrinsic value of a command or example itself.

The old bases are shifting; we tremble for the fate of those who repose confidence in miracles and testimony only, for so obscure is the testimony and so bewildering the explanations of miracles, given by those who would make religion stand or fall upon the basis of authority of an ecclesiastical kind, that every fresh scientific discovery and every new development of advanced thought in any community, deals another blow which the old fortresses and bulwarks of sand cannot resist, without being severely shaken and often well-nigh shattered by the magnitude of the billows which assail them. But when we build upon the rock, how different it is with us! How coolly and bravely we can watch the fury of the storm, and smile upon the breakers as they spend their strength and fury in futile efforts to remove our edifice, whose foundations are upon the rock of ages; nay, within that rock, imbedded in the very nature of the Power which governs and sustains the universe. We can afford to be patient and sweet-tempered, when we know that our opponents must necessarily take up our positions eventually; but the most lovely disposition is apt to become soured by repeated endeavours to champion a doomed and a dying cause. The majesty of the Gospel hero was never so conspicuous as when impaled upon the cross: he, in all the sublimity and invincibility of conscious rectitude, does not defy or malign but compassionates, forgives, and prays for his enemies. A truly great character can never stoop to feel resentment against personal enemies, though righteous indignation against wrong is never inconsistent with the divinest and deepest charity.) Jesus does not say one solitary word against his persecutors; the utmost he expresses is compassion and sorrow for their weakness and their folly. The burden of his prayer is: O Father! do not make them suffer for the wrong they have done to me. It would intensify my agony a thousand-fold, were I to feel that my accusers should suffer because they have thus in their blindness put me to grief and shame.

In one light, at least, this prayer may be regarded as sentimental simply, but the sentiment is so pure, so lofty, so worthy of a celestial spirit, that though it is from one standpoint open to possible criticism, it leads us at once to another point in our subject, intimately associated with the general topic; and that is, to an inquiry into the uses of suffering. We may ask, with all reverence, was that prayer of Jesus answered, or must it be refused acceptance at the throne of justice? Our answer is two-fold, and perhaps at first sight paradoxical. The prayer was answered doubtless in the spirit, but in the letter it must be denied, in so far as this, that the penalty due to sin can never be cancelled, never can be borne for one by another; because the penalty itself is a necessary part of the scheme of redemption from the love and practice of evil to the love and practice of virtue.

Take the case of your own children. These words may reach some tender, loving parents, whose very affection for their offspring compells them to be stern. Your boy wishes to play truant, but you force him to school, not because you are unmoved by his tears and entreaties to be allowed to play, but because in your superior wisdom and better judgment, you foresee most disastrous consequences resulting in the future from an encouragement of an unhealthy propensity, to make work subordinate to play, and amusement the sovereign good of existence. You have a very dear child, who sometimes steals, sometimes acts deceitfully, sometimes is disobedient or untruthful, and though it grieves you to the heart to punish her, you chastise her because you plainly see that unless she is made to suffer for her errors, she will go on repeating them. (It is not necessary for you to judge motives, it is never just to put the worst construction upon the conduct of anyone. Give everyone the benefit of the doubt; you had far better err on the side of leniency than too harsh criticism, and it is indeed true that we often help to make people what we consider them already to be. Still, though it is both uncharitable and unjust ever to attribute human sin and folly to the worst motives which can possibly actuate the transgressor, we have to grapple with an evil which if unsubdued will cause the perpetrator of such evil an incalculable amount of suffering in the future.

Our view of Deity presents the Eternal to us as a Being of perfectly pacific and complacent justice, the serenity of whose nature can never be disturbed by a single jarring sentiment; who knows neither passion, pride, anger nor love of glory; a Being who, instead of creating a universe for his own glory, as men count glory, created it out of pure beneficence, and governs it by laws, which when fully understood will be admired and loved by every conscious being.)

Spinoza suggests that this is the only possible universe, while the laws governing it are the only possible laws, and while we cannot take our stand with Spinoza in all his deductions, we nevertheless can trace in such a declaration, a very vivid glimpse of the divine character, as revealed in the persons of the purest minds with whom we have ever associated, or of whom we have ever heard. (We deem no conception of the Divine character so high as that which treats of God as a perfect Unit, in whose all-embracing Justice, Love and Wisdom—like two hemispheres—are blended into one eternal orb of light. When we speak of the world, do we speak of the Eastern hemisphere, or of the Western only: do we not speak of both together? Two hemispheres are necessary to one sphere. A sphere cannot exist apart from two hemispheres, but hemispheres can be conceived of apart from spheres.

Now, it seems to us that Justice is, and ever must be, the perfect sphere of Deity. Ask us for a definition of Justice, and we define it as Love and Wisdom: no more Love than Wisdom, no more Wisdom than Love. This thought concerning Justice would not only revolutionize all orthodox theories of the object and nature of future punishment; it has power also to completely re-model every law and institution having for object the correction of social sinners. To remit penalty, to do away with chastisement, is the height of cruelty; but to adjust all penalties to the needs of mankind, to so improve prisons that a prison is transformed into a school and palace of industry, is surely to keep clearly before us the only two justifiable reasons for submitting any to the pain of incarceration, viz., the reformation of the offender and the protection of society.)

If Jesus intended to petition his Heavenly Father to remit the penalty necessarily consequent upon transgression, he was humane but not wise; but if he intended by the utterance of such a prayer aloud, even in the hearing of his bitterest persecutors, to set an example of perfect forbearance, and to present to the world a philosophy of evil worthy of the deepest consideration and world-wide application, then his wisdom and humanity are alike revealed, and his example is indeed worthy of all imitation, so long as sin and sorrow continue to perplex mankind. The words of the dying are invariably treasured as no other utterances are. There is a sanctity about the final scene of earthly life, which invests the chamber of death with a peculiar and most touching solemnity; and were we to see no other good in the death of Jesus than the inspiration to human forbearance, arising from the record of this first sentence of Jesus on the cross, so wide reaching may be the benefits of that single sentence, that to utter it under such circumstances would explain for ever the utility of the tremendous sacrifice on Calvary.

Vicarious suffering offers insurmountable obstacles to many who are for ever vainly endeavouring to harmonize the decrees of Infinite Justice with the miserably unsatisfactory theories of life, invented by Orthodoxy on the one hand and Materialism on the other. Both these systems are to us self-evidently false, because they contradict the facts of nature in innumerable instances. The sense of justice, innate in man, the conception of perfect justice and unbounded loving-kindness now becoming more universal day-by-day, are in themselves testimony to the existence of a God, such as neither the orthodox Christian nor the Atheist recognises or has yet found in nature. (When Thomas Paine turned from the lesser Bible to the greater,—when he forsook allegiance to the letter of a volume called the "Word of God," though written by frail and fallible men, no one knows just when or how, and turned to the sublimities of the universe, and found a perfect God revealed through Nature, compelling him to become a Deist, he believed in so large a revelation that he could never narrow his mind to accept a smaller revelation, in the ecclesiastical sense of its being miraculous or special,—people called him, and many still call him, an infidel. If to be faithful to the moral sense and unfaithful to the traditions of the elders, is heresy or infidelity, then Jesus was an arch-heretic, an arch-infidel, and was put to death by Roman soldiery at the instigation of Jewish Pharisees, because God was to him greater than Cæsar, and the living spirit of the ever-speaking Eternal, of more value than Rabbinical interpretations of what constitutes divine revelation.

Whenever one rises to so broad and lofty a conception of truth that puny minds cannot explore the whole of one's horizon, then that spiritual discoverer is pronounced either a blasphemer or insane. It is mere absurdity to say Jesus was either God or an impostor, because he made himself equal with God. He did nothing of the kind. To say that he did is to agree with his blind and fanatical persecutors, and utterly fail to grasp the spiritual meaning of those words of his which unfold a doctrine of the divine indwelling, utterly beyond the comprehension of those whose mental eyes are so dim, that at best, to use a Gospel metaphor, they "see men as trees walking." The very fact of Jesus addressing a Power superior to himself, and calling that power The Father, is proof positive to any common-sense critic, unwarped by theological prejudice, that Jesus believed devoutly in a God, who was his God as well as the God of the rest of mankind, his Father as well as the Father of all humanity.

Throughout the Gospels according to Matthew, Mark, and Luke, the phrase "son of man" is constantly employed by Jesus when speaking of himself. It is only in the fourth Gospel, which commences as no history or biography would ever commence, that he seems to be conscious of his own importance, and to be working in any way for his own glorification. The fourth Gospel is both a Grecian and a Gnostic document, and savours so conspicuously of the Platonic doctrine concerning the Logos, that any student familiar with the classics can trace a decided parallel between Platonism and Johannism. Gnosticism made its advent, it is true, after the introduction of Christianity into Europe, but such an advent of Gnosticism was but a reappearance of a very ancient school of philosophy.

The much vaunted Agnosticism of to-day, is of course the only possible system which can be correctly speaking an antidote to Gnosticism, as Spiritualism is an antidote to Materialism, Atheism an antidote to Theism, and vice versa. Socrates was most certainly condemned to drink the hemlock, by reason of his determination to enlighten the Athenian youth concerning the inner meaning of the prevailing Mythology. Jesus was to Galilee what Socrates was to Greece; both teachers conformed to the scholastic as well as the universal mode of conveying instruction. Jesus spake to his immediate followers in parables which he interpreted to them only, while to the multitude he taught in parables which he did not interpret, because had he done so he would have been, to use his own powerful Kabalistic language, "casting pearls before swine," and giving "holy things to dogs.") Though up to a certain point Jesus adopted the classic method in the conveyance of spiritual truth, he aroused the ire of the priests and scribes against him by reason of his persistent attempts to enlighten all men upon the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven: this Kingdom being a kingdom to be established upon the earth, in which spiritual knowledge and power should take the place so long usurped by arbitrary temporal and ecclesiastical despotism.

It is a very open question, indeed, with many, as to whether the universalization of educational advantages tends to the uplifting of a people morally or not. (It is open to question, whether illiteracy and morality of a very high order may not and often do not go hand-in-hand. Your boot-black may be a superior boy, morally, to the son of the millionaire, who regards himself as a walking encylopedia during his career as an undergraduate at a university. Be this as it may, ignorance is, without doubt, the fruitful parent of countless abominations, and to fight resolutely against it with might and main, is a plain and imperative duty forced upon all of us by the necessities of society. The very fact that sin can in any case be attributed to ignorance, is sufficient reason for opposing it with all our might;) but it is just here, when we are discussing the great need of ridding the world of vice from the prevalent disorders which afflict it so grievously, that we come to a decided point of issue with our conservative brethren. The fear of hell, the dread of God's displeasure, never redeemed or uplifted anybody. Fear is only valuable protectively; it can never be so reformatively, so far as the wrong doer is concerned, as fear, when it acts as a restraining impulse, only deters people from the commission of wrong from motives of cowardice, and cowardice can be no part of religion.

(The religion of Jesus will never be the established religion of this or any other country, until your entire system of correction is altered. Punishment must be a thing of the past, reformation the work of the future. The picking of oakum, for instance, is not a corrective discipline so much as a punitive one. The only proper kind of work for criminals is work of the most useful and appropriate character. Every criminal should undergo a strict and healthy education, fitting them for useful and remunerative positions when the term of their prison discipline has expired. There can be no greater punishment for anyone than that meted out by conscience. Thus, when we leave sinners to their consciences, we place them in that lake of ever-burning fire, from which they cannot escape until they have paid the uttermost farthing; but it should be farthest from our thoughts, ever to seek to make any one suffer needlessly. All genuine corrective discipline is something vastly higher than punishment, as it raises the one who is even a victim to his own folly, and is in itself such salutary discipline that he who undergoes it is for ever after thankful for the sorrow which has worked in him genuine repentance, followed by practical reformation.)

We have dwelt so long upon this first word from the cross, that we fear the remaining six sentences must be passed over almost without exposition. But there is an old saying, that the first step, either upward or downward, is the most important step of all; and if this be true, its truth must be our excuse to-day for consuming so much time upon the first utterance of the seven we have to consider, as it is the key note to them all.

The second utterance to which we shall call your attention, is the answer made by Jesus to the penitent thief: "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise"; prefaced with the emphatic prefix, "VERILY, I say unto thee."

The two thieves who were crucified with Jesus on Calvary represent two classes of sinners, very common now as then. One class is composed of those who sin wilfully, the other being made up of those who sin thoughtlessly. The wilful sinner is he who with open eyes refuses to be guided by spiritual light: he loves darkness rather than light; he knows his deeds are evil; he takes delight in sin, and hates the thought of reformation. To such as he apply those awful words concerning the unforgiven and unpardonable sin, Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, which never can be forgiven either in this world or that which is to come.

(We believe in innate goodness as well as in innate depravity in man, as you very well know. As you are also aware, doubtless, we do not agree with the Swedenborgian doctrine of the final confirmation of any soul in evil; still, it is a fact which must be admitted on all sides that there can be no reformation, and no forgiveness or sense of forgiveness, until the party who has done a wrong perceives it, and desires to amend and make atonement.) The impenitent thief represents those who go out into the spirit-world without a wish to rise; they enter the ranks of those who were disobedient at a former period of special spiritual enlightenment, and have not thrown off their love of evil, through entire dispensations. The Epistle of Peter declares that Jesus went and preached to spirits in prison, who were rebellious in the time of Noah; the Noachian Deluge symbolizing the culmination of a spiritual and temporal cycle.

(The Orientals, who comprehend better than Occidentals usually do the procession of dispensations, have calculated the length of each separate Messianic period to be about 2,170 years, during which cycle of time the sun passes through one of the twelve zodiacal signs in the journey around the more distant sun Alcyone, as the earth in its annual revolution accomplishes a passage through one of these signs in every month. It is true that these divisions of the heavenly bodies into zodiacal constellations, is empirical, at the same time these constellations were employed by the savans of antiquity to set forth spiritual truths in relation to the earth and the spiritual spheres surrounding it. One thing is evident, viz., the remarkable progress made by the earth, whenever one of these periods reaches its culmination. If the year has twelve months; and three be summer, three winter, three spring, and three autumn; and you know when to expect the longest and the shortest days, seed-time and harvest; if you know when to expect the birth of the lambs and the advent of spring-flowers, and when to make provision against the stormy winds and snows of winter;—is it incredible that the spiritual students of ancient days were able to calculate the length of time that must elapse between the beginning and ending of a cycle or dispensation of time? The larger movements of Spirit are regulated with as nice accuracy as any affairs of earth can be, so that the wise men guided by the Star of Bethlehem (doubtless the pentagram or five-pointed star), to expect the advent of a new dispensation of truth to earth, were led by the twin sciences of Astronomy and Astrology, as well as by that interior light, without which all external calculations would have been devoid of spiritual significance.)

We are told of the repentant thief being led by Jesus with him into Paradise, a term always used to signify a state of expectancy, preparation, education, growth, but not fruition. The disobedient and benighted spirits of a former age, confined in Hades, are made aware of the advent of a new angel to the earth, and so many as are ready to respond to that angel's call, are released from their prisons and updrawn to more spiritual and progressive states. Why went the repentant thief out into these realms with Jesus, but because there is but one way whereby spirits who have committed wrong finally outgrow it, and are released from its consequences? (Has any one been dishonest on the earth? Then his mission to the earth when he influences it from the spirit-side of life, must prevent and counteract dishonesty. Those warnings against dishonour; those impulses which seize you unawares at times, and seem like voices calling you, and hands pulling you away from scenes and acts of perfidy, are literally due to the contact with you of those in spirit, who have suffered from the commission of sins you are liable to fall into. Your guardian angel reaches you through these intermediaries, and they work out their own redemption by preventing wrongs similar to those they have once committed.)

Interpret this story of the penitent thief in the light of this view of spiritual existence, and while it will not endorse the theology, which tells the sinner there is an instant passage for him from the gallows to glory, if he but rely on Christ for pardon, we may assuredly state without the slightest hesitation, that no one can ever even wish to be reformed, without at once being set to work in the spiritual vineyard.

The penitent thief's petition was a very modest one. He only asked to be remembered by the saviour when he came into his kingdom. He expressed faith in the ultimate triumph of right over wrong. He saw beyond the jaws of death the glorious victory of the spirit over death. He recognised kingship of soul in one who was doomed to a malefactor's death. The very expression, "Lord! remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom," was a marvel of spiritual insight, and proved the speaker of such words to have been already led by the spirit of truth, to forsake evil and to conquer the love of it.

The lesson we draw from this second episode, is an evidence of the second step towards spiritual perfection we may all take as a result of our suffering. Jesus first attributes human sin to ignorance, and prays forgiveness for his persecutors. The forgiving spirit is the base-rock on which all spirituality must rest. The next time he expresses himself, he promises to help a penitent in carrying out his virtuous resolves. He overlooks the past completely, holds out the right hand of fellowship to a fallen brother who desires to rise, and gives him a good new start, lending him his own companionship and assistance.

Do most people act thus magnanimously? A great many well-disposed people take a fallen person to reform, but they let every one know they are performing an act of magnanimity, by taking one who has been a great sinner into their household. No greater mistake, however, can ever be made than talking about the past weaknesses of those you are striving to assist. A penitent is sure to be sensitive enough without having his or her former transgressions made the subject of comment and criticism. Remember always when you have dealings with those who have been led astray, that the less the world knows about their past life the better. Never allude to it, try not to think about it, give them credit for a present desire to live virtuously, and be sure reminders of past folly are always dangerous, unless administered with the utmost kindness and delicacy, by truly wise and sympathetic friends. "Let the dead past bury its dead," and feel that when a sin or weakness has been truly repented of, the thief, no longer in the love of theft, is a thief no longer, and must be treated as an honest and respectable member of society.

The second great step towards perfection of character is, to forgive wrong and never to pride yourself on having done so to the pain of the penitent.

The third utterance ascribed to Jesus on the cross is: "Woman! behold thy son. Son! behold thy mother." In the narrative before us, we have presented to our minds a touching picture of that love for others and care for their welfare, which ever characterizes the true exemplar of mankind, even in the midst of excruciating bodily torture.

Some, who have prepared themselves for fault-finding and harsh criticism, whenever they open the Bible, have found much fault with the character of Jesus on the score of his undutifulness to his mother, and disregard for her feelings generally. Some have even gone so far as to say, that he was almost entirely lacking in filial love and devotion, and to support such a view they cite a few passages in the authorized English version, which seem at first sight to justify the assumption. For instance, when he was twelve years old, and he had accompanied his mother to Jerusalem at the annual feast, he caused both his mother and her spouse much anxiety by absenting himself from the company, and remaining two days in the temple, disputing with the doctors of the law, hearing them and asking them questions. Then at the marriage feast at Cana of Galilee, when his mother was present, he seems to have spoken disrespectfully to her, though she showed the greatest respect for his commands, and told the servants to do whatever he bade them. On another occasion, when it is said his mother stood without, desiring to speak with him, he gave utterance to that startling question: "Who is my mother?" which would electrify a well-ordered English company, were it put by a son under similar circumstances to-day. These and other instances are among the most prominent examples of the seeming disregard of Jesus for his mother.

Roman Catholics explain these passages differently from Protestants; and in the case of the conduct of Jesus at the marriage feast, the Vulgate makes it appear in quite a different light to King James's version. The Vulgate rendering is: "Woman! (or mother) what is this to thee and to me? Mine hour is not yet come." A priest of the Church of Rome preaching on this, the first recorded miracle of Jesus, would not only exculpate Jesus from all possible charge of incivility to his mother, but might even go so far as to say that though his time for working miracles had not then arrived, he performed this his first public miracle in compliance with his mother's request.

As we have no time to enter into a discussion upon this point to-day, we will content ourselves with offering a very few practical suggestions which seem to grow naturally out of this prolific and attractive subject. First, the conduct of Jesus, when twelve years of age, can be justified in one way, and that a way in which all your children can be justified, if they seemingly disobey or neglect their parents. (A parent must never stand between a child and his sense of right. Honour your father and mother, but do not blindly obey them, as things are not right because your parents do or advise them. There are many circumstances in life, where young people have to decide between their parents and their own conscience; that is, a choice between God and man. If your parents unduly interfere with you and try to force you to neglect duties or effect compromises with conscience, then disobedience of a calm, dignified order is right. And this remark applies also to keeping and breaking law. There is a higher law than the law of the land, and those who disobey the outer to obey the inner law, are only discarding the letter for the spirit, and are therefore not sinners.)

We do not suppose the mother of Jesus ever stood between him and his duty, but his remarkable words: "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business," convey very distinctly his supreme conviction that he had a mission which he came into the world to fulfil, and that that must be fulfilled in spite of every possible obstacle. Perhaps he was an ardent, hot-headed boy, an impulsive youth not quite sufficiently regardful at times of his mother's feelings. If this was so, then mellowed and chastened by suffering, how much more beautiful does his character appear on the cross, when thirty-three years old, than when, as an ardent boy of twelve, he doubtless enjoyed confounding the Sanhedrim with his wonderful wisdom.

The thought, however, we wish to bring into especial prominence with reference to his apparent slight of his mother, when he asked: "Who is my mother?" is this: his drawing the attention of the bystanders to a great law of spiritual relationship, entirely overlooked by those Spiritualists and others in the present day, who make of heaven a large family mansion, where aunts and uncles, nieces and nephews, live together in the bonds of physical kinship for eternity. Relationship of spirit is something so much deeper than relationship of body, that it becomes arrant folly to expect to meet and live with all in the spirit-world, to whom you have been related by ties of blood on earth. If there has been a tie of spirit as well as a tie of blood, then you are truly united in the spirit-life, but if there be no such tie of spirit, then all the blood affinity in creation will not unite you, whereas if there be a tie of spirit, no earthly power can ever separate you, except temporarily, and then only in seeming.)

Jesus answered the question he raised. He told who his mother was; she was the one who stood nearest to him in her devotion to his Heavenly Father; she was the one between whose soul and his the deepest bonds of sympathy were found; and there is no reason to doubt that in his case, she who was his physical mother was his closest companion in spirit. But it is not always so. Unnatural mothers who desert their children, those who bear unwelcome children, have not the motherly impulse which binds them as mothers to their offspring. In the spirit-world, while the foster-mother, who has discharged all a mother's duty and shown all a mother's love, will stand much nearer the child she has befriended than his mother after the flesh. (Some people are very anxious about relationships hereafter. If all could realize that a true affection is of the spirit only, and that material kinship has no necessary connection with it, how much more rational would be their conception of true family unions in the hereafter, and on how much more solid a basis would friendships for eternity be seen to stand.)

Another thought which presses in upon us at this time is that of the peculiar regard felt by Jesus for his beloved disciple John, the one whom he singled out from all the rest as his closest companion. He had seventy-two disciples we are told, and twelve apostles, who were his immediate pupils and followers; three out of this twelve, who accompanied him whithersoever he went and were privileged to witness his transfiguration, but only one most intimate friend of all, about whom he was most deeply concerned in the hour of his final anguish, and to whom he confided his mother.

It may seem strange, that the first words of Jesus on the cross were about his enemies and a penitent thief, but these enemies and that thief were in more pressing need than the highly spiritual and devoted mother and friend, who are not mentioned till afterwards; and we may very justly remark, that no one can really be said to truly fulfil family and friendly obligations aright, unless he first cultivates those loving and compassionate dispositions which make the love of one's enemies possible and practicable. There are people on earth to-day, who love their enemies and would do all in their power to serve them. It is easy to be kind to those who are always kind to you, but kindness to a foe is a glorious triumph of spirit over temptation. Still, though kindness to enemies and forgiveness of injuries must ever constitute a most important part of true spirituality, there are nearer ties binding us to those who are peculiarly with us in spirit, even in the celestial spheres, and the special friends who stand nearer to you than all others on earth, may still be your chosen companions and most intimate associates in the life above.)

The fourth sentence spoken by Jesus on the cross was: "I thirst"; a simple natural exclamation wrung from him by the heat and his sufferings, and yet considered spiritually doubtless expressive of a burning desire to realize the benefits conferred upon the world by his life of humiliation and sorrow. At this point the strength of Jesus seems utterly to fail, and many there are who with cold and callous tongues have slandered the hero of Calvary, affecting to see in this and especially the next and fifth utterance: "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" evidence that Jesus died in despair. Many and many are the views taken of these mysterious words, but as two are peculiarly prominent in the world at present, we will endeavour very freely to point out the fallacy of both, from our standpoint, while we endeavour, though very imperfectly, to give you our own conscientious interpretation of the passage.

One theory is that of the strictly orthodox school, which teaches that God literally forsook his Son on the cross, because he was there atoning for the sins of the elect, and was made accursed, as the sin of God's people was laid upon him, and he bore it vicariously that they might escape the punishment due to it. This view we set aside as derogatory to the character of the Infinite, and utterly at variance with all truly enlightened views of the nature and object of punishment for sin. (The other prevailing theory is a dastardly one: it is that Jesus really died in despair. No language can be too strong to express our deprecation of so wretched a doctrine, for even should you regard Jesus as a deluded man, should you fancy him having made a mistake in surrendering all earthly hopes and pleasures to accomplish an impossible task, you can scarcely question his sincerity, unless your own lives are so paltry that you cannot conceive of real disinterestedness.

No one who ever strives to do his best goes out of earthly life despairing, though apparent despair is often a discipline through which many have to pass ere they can attain to that spiritual eminence from which they can look back upon all the sorrows of time, and be thankful for them all.) Jesus no doubt experienced, just before the closing scene in his life's tragedy, a feeling akin to what often causes the most intense pain to multitudes, who are struggling against tremendous odds, and have at last to face the fact that, in a worldly sense. their lives have been failures. To be obliged to suffer, year after year, on behalf of others, and then find yourself at last in a position in which you feel your own impotence most keenly; to go on labouring in a righteous cause, and at length to have to leave the world without seeing any results attending your undertaking, is the bitterest drop of all in the cup of human sorrow, many a true worker has to drink to the very dregs. It is comparatively easy to be brave and gay on the battlefield, with the drums and fifes sounding all around you: the very noise of the cannon, the rushing hither and thither of the men, the excitement of the whole scene makes you forget your danger, or, at least, enables you to put on a brave front and face the enemy; and then the thought that you are fighting for freedom, and may die gloriously for country and for freedom, spurs you on. Your sacrifice seems worth something. (You cannot but picture to yourself the benefits to others accruing from your loss and that of your comrades: but some of the world's greatest heroes and heroines have been left to die of starvation in wretched garrets, or have pined to death in gloomy prisons in which they have wasted out their existence with no prospect of release, and no hope of blessing others. Some there are who seem fated with persistent ill-luck; whatever they touch turns to ashes in their grasp; they live only to suffer and be disappointed, and no one seems any the better for their misery. Such experiences are the hardest of all to endure, and to those who in such distress of mind and body cannot see the hand of God in their affliction, and can trace no light beyond the tomb, life is truly a heavy burden, and we do not wonder if, sometimes, such lives end in suicide.)

But Jesus rose above even this his greatest trial of all, impaled upon the cross, without an earthly friend or helper who could aid him: this last and greatest trial seemed all that was needful to complete his earthly work, and enable him to utter his sixth cry, "It is finished!"

How very few there are who can expire with such triumphant words upon their lips! The wail of most at the hour of earthly dissolution is: "It is unfinished." There is so much more to be done, and they have neither time nor strength now to do it; the sun sets and their day's work is not completed, so they dread to appear before their judge with "nothing but leaves" in their hands.

Very often a great and crushing sorrow is the very thing absolutely needed to bring out the full strength and glory of a character, as choice exotics are often forced into bloom by excessive heat, that they may be ready to grace some nuptial board, or appear in the place of honour at some splendid national or religious fête, so there are some spirits whose experiences are akin to those of Adelaide Proctor's heroine, in the story of "A Faithful Soul." (The poetess tells us a spirit was in purgatory, but almost ready to be admitted into paradise, when her thoughts strayed lovingly toward a dear one on the earth, to whom she had confided all her love, and whom she truly believed had responded fully to her heart's affection. She asked permission of her angel guardian to go and console her sorrowing lover, and was told that a thousand years of further purgatorial cleansing would be needed if she did so. She gladly accepted the penalty, so anxious was she to console the object of her love, of whom alone she thought, never of herself. The sight of his infidelity, or inconstency, so grieved her, that within the compass of a single moment of earthly time, her suffering was so intense that it was equivalent to a thousand years of ordinary purgation, in the effects it produced upon her who endured it. This was the final stroke which weaned her from the earth, and in that intense though momentary suffering, she became ready to join the happy souls in paradise. No greater mistake can be made than to suppose that the greatest sufferers are the greatest sinners. Suffering is a part of education, and were we to do without it, we should never be prepared for the happiness which cannot be ours, until the power to realize it has been brought out by pain.)

The seventh and last expression attributed to the Gospel hero is: "Father! into thy hands I commit (or commend) my spirit." This saying is the grandest and loftiest of them all. (Complete submission to the will of the Eternal, means complete and lasting joy. When all the stormy scenes of life are over, and the tired spirit forsakes the failing tenement of clay, happy will it be for each of you, if you can with calm and blest assurance feel that you are but going into a Father's arms, to take your abode in a Heavenly Father's house. How short is earthly life; though it should extend through cycles of time, how brief would it still be when contrasted with eternity! In the stupendous light of the soul's immortality, the importance of all earthly things fades into utter insignificance; and yet earthly life, with all its alternating joys and sorrows, hopes and fears, is necessary to prepare the spirit for the life beyond.)

May you all be so inspired to live in harmony with conscience here, that the change called death may be to all of you a happy exit from scenes of difficulty and imperfect joy below, to larger liberty, deeper love and clearer vision in the Life Immortal!

IMPROMPTU POEM.

A GLIMPSE OF PARADISE.

I beheld a Golden Ladder, in the visions of the night;
I saw bright angel spirits, wing toward the earth their flight;
I saw a golden ladder, as Jacob saw of old,
But the beauty of that ladder, in language ne'er was told.

The Steps were very varied: some seemed so small and low,
That any child might climb them, some were so high, I know
That only conqueror spirits, who'd wrestled in life's fray,
Could put their feet upon them, and tread their mystic way.

The First Step, which I noticed, was where the children play,
As innocent as lambkins, through the bright summer day;
The Second Step was steeper, and youths and maidens there
Were faltering as they trod it, it seemed so high in air.

I scarce could see the Seventh, it merged into the sky,
While oftentimes dark shadows and storm-clouds passing by,
Would whelm the travellers struggling, to reach its glorious height,
But always the pure summit was crowned in Heaven's own light.

Once on the earth I witnessed a child with weary feet,
Seeking to mount this Ladder; he would his mother meet,
And she had gone to Heaven, both priest and nurse did say,
And he was lone and weary, upon life's toilsome way.

His little feet were bruised, by the stones along the road,
His little heart was breaking, his little head was bowed;
But an angel came to guide him, to lead him by her hands,
And safely he was guided to the summit, where he stands.

One day the Ladder trembled, as though a raging storm
Had shaken its foundations, while dark clouds veiled its form;
The lightning flashed, while thunders with their terrific roar,
Convulsed the angry heavens, till the rain did in torrents pour.

Drenched to the skin, so weary, the child still plodded on,
Though frightened by the thunder, he still pressed bravely on;
And he could not see the angel, at times, it was so dark,
But still she held him firmly, though to her voice he could not hark.

I watched him struggling onward, when the storm had spent its power;
Graver and sadder seemed he, yet, like an opening flower,
I watched his dawning courage, his coming manhood's grace,
When he, a noble ruler, might fill a glorious place.

The years rolled by, and upward and onward still pressed he,
Laden at times with sorrow, at times seemed full of glee;
Till one day from the Ladder, his earth-form fell away,
And his happy, radiant spirit passed through the Gates of Day!

Then when those gates were opened, what visions did I see!
Of such serene enjoyment, as passes earthly glee;
The Mother greets her darling, the Child his mother's hand Presses with true affection, while o'er the blessed land
Not one poor soul is burdened, with the grief ye ofttimes know,
All see results of labour and its blessed purpose know.

There, in that lovely region, where souls begin to see
The accomplishments of earth-life, and sorrow's ministry;
All doubts and dangers ended, they read the power of thought,
And learn by what strange prowess, heaven's flowers to bloom are brought.

Oh! toilworn hands so weary; oh! hearts so full of care;
Oh! well-nigh breaking spirits, with the burdens that ye bear:
Remember earth-life is seed-time, and each loving deed or prayer,
Yea, each gentle thought is a seedling, ye must water and tend with care!

BENEDICTION.

May the angels, who, under the Eternal, keep watch and ward over all men, so guide you all through life's manifold scenes of trial and sorrow, difficulty and danger, pleasure and bereavement, gain and loss, that when this chapter in your soul's experience closes, you may gladly pass to spheres supernal, with songs of joy on your lips and praises to the Infinite for his goodness, in all your hearts forever. AMEN.

III.

THE COMING OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

(Delivered in Paris.)

The Second Coming of Christ. The Second Article in the Dominical Prayer. The Progress of Spirits through the Ages. Spiritualism and its Teachings contrasted and compared with those of Theosophy.

THE four subjects upon which we have been requested by the present company to discourse this evening, are each and all of them so vast, comprehensive, and far reaching, that it is impossible to do more in the very limited time at our disposal than simply give you the barest outline of such information as we possess, and opinions which we hold upon these fascinating and most important themes, ranging over a territory so vast, that it may almost be said to comprise the entire area covered by the Spiritual Philosophy,—a philosophy, let us assure you, which undertakes to offer the only really satisfactory answers which can ever be given to man on earth, in reply to his ceaseless queries regarding the whence and whither of the human spirit.

We hope at some time (in this city, when conditions are ripe), to give an extended course of lectures upon these and kindred topics, which through the kindness and talent of some of our kind and sympathetic friends, may be translated into the French language, and circulated broadcast over France, shortly after their appearance in English dress; as, though it may appear to the superficial onlooker that the French nation takes little or no deep interest in such matters, pertaining as they do to the immortal destiny of mankind, no one acquainted with the rapid and widely-extended sale of the writings of Allan Kardec, both before and since his passage from earthly to spirit life, can continue to believe that France is not hungering and thirsting for a Spiritual Revelation.

The works of Kardec were initial and preparatory, but he would be the last of all men, were he here in earthly form, to even permit the idea to go forth that he thought his works perfect or final. Sitting as he did at the feet of wise and enlightened spiritual teachers, he learned never to ignore the province of human reason, and most of all, never to close the door against the conscience or moral sense, which is indeed the true and essential Christ, Word or Logos which enlightens every man coming into the world; be he barbarian or civilized, Jew or Gentile, bound or free, Oriental or Occidental, one Spirit is at the base of all creation, one universal Soul, one Infinite Will, one sovereign Mind, at the centre of the universe; and that supreme, matchless, unique intelligence men call God.

The great beauty of Kardec's philosophy consists in the fact of his always having conscientiously endeavoured to harmonize all life-experiences with the one absolute and essential principle of Justice, which he conceived as Love and Wisdom united in their most perfect forms. Looking upon all ecclesiastical dogmas and creeds as transitory, he, in common with all truly spiritually-minded men, was constantly expecting and inviting a New Revelation, not to contradict or supplant, but only to explain, continue, and more perfectly unfold the inner meaning of the teachings of the seers and sages of the days gone by. Therefore, "The Spirits' Book." "The Book on Mediums," "Heaven and Hell," "Genesis," and other works by the same author, are all endeavours after the perfect way, the perfect light, the perfect truth. These works have prepared the studious and intuitive among French philosophers, to look for a fuller and more lucid interpretation of the laws of being, than even the spirits inspiring the mediums, whom Kardec assisted to unfold and exercise their gifts, could give at the time when he and they sat regularly together for spiritual communion.

If it be asked: Why cannot the highest and most perfect truth be given to earth all at once, or at any time and in any place where truthseekers are gathered together? we answer: That whenever the Spirit of Truth is made manifest, every man must hear in his own language of the wonderful works of God; therefore, there must ever be a diversity of tongues, gifts and interpretations, till all have arrived at an equal standard of spiritual perfection. Then will the Babel cease, and one voice only will be heard, and that will speak the universal language of the Spirit, making truth known on earth even as it is known in heaven.)

As we have been requested to express a few thoughts concerning the Second Coming of Christ, we must beg of you to consider how it can be possible for the true Messiah to come to any mind, until that mind is prepared to recognise his mission and understand his teachings. Can the sun-light come to you, if you dwell in darkness, immured in gloomy caverns, prisons, or cellars, into which no light can penetrate, because there are no windows to admit it? Can the air make known to you its advent, until the casement or the portals shall be open to receive it? Can the earth bask consciously in solar warmth and light, while she at night-time is turning her face away from the solar orb? Can the stars make known their presence to you, though they shine ever so brightly in the ether space around you, if mists and shadows arise from the earth, engirdling the planet and rendering its atmosphere so dense, that only the blackness is discernible? In the material world analogies abound which clearly and logically portray the means whereby spiritual truths are made manifest or concealed. God, you are told, has always had a chosen people, but the records which inform you that this is so, tell you also that God is no respecter of persons, that there is naught but impartial justice in the divine decrees. (Such apparent contradictions as these lead the casual and the flippant reader of the Bible to pronounce it a mass of contradictions, or else to accept it blindly without investigation, as the infallible and entire Word of God. But God's Word can be confined between the covers of no book, however sacred: no institution and no age can enjoy a monopoly of truth, or bask alone in the favour of the Eternal Spirit; but in every age and to all peoples, the divine fiat has gone forth: "Let there be light!" and there was light.)

You are told in the first chapter of Genesis, that on the fourth day God made two great lights, and set them in the heavens: the sun to rule the day, and the moon to rule by night: and that he made the stars also. The scientific student of revelation, who is a naturalist, a geologist and an astronomer as well as a theologian, can perhaps believe that not till after what is geologically termed the tertiary period, sun, moon and stars appeared upon the earth, and that in the fourth great epoch of creative energy, God made them appear to earth as the vapours dispersed, and the atmosphere of earth became so clear that they grew visible. But where is the man of letters at the present day, who accepts the Mosaic cosmogony literally, except as a crude and primitive fable or allegory, by means of which the author of the Pentateuch instructed his infantile scholars, who sought from him an explanation of how the world and all the orbs of light sprang into being at their origin.

The first chapter of the fourth Gospel tells us of the logos or divine word which was in the beginning, was with God, and which was God, without which not anything was made which was made. This Word or logos, a little later on in the same chapter, is described as the light and life of men: as the light which shined in darkness, which the darkness could not comprehend; and as the light which lighteth every man who comes into the world. Then the writer goes on to declare how that light was manifest in personal form, embodied on this planet in the form of the ideal or perfect man: and how that light and life, declaring itself as the essential ego or divine individuality, spoke of having existed before Abraham, being older than all the prophets.

This mystical language undoubtedly refers us to a divine indwelling spirit in man, which the Orientals have called the atma or Divine Soul. The philosophers of Greece always made a distinction, and that not without a very decided difference, between the animal or rational and the divine soul. The seven principles of being, acknowledged as comprising man in his perfect state by Oriental Mystics and Theosophists, were all acknowledged by the ancients, from whom Scriptures in their modern form have come down to the present day. These seven principles of being include all that the Occultists call elementary spirit, or sub-human life, and all that the Spiritualists declare they hold communion with, when they enjoy blessed and delightful intercourse with "loved ones gone before," and exalted spirits described as guardian angels.

Theosophy and Spiritualism are not and cannot in their essence be irreconcilable, or in any sense antagonistic. They only become so when broad and comprehensive terms are employed to designate limited, contracted, and dogmatic schools of thought. The larger truth may also contain and make plain the lesser, but the lesser can never make false the greater; the fraction may be contained within the sum, but the sum can never be expressed in fractions, as all fractional parts are necessarily separately less than the sum, which is the whole, or all parts united. There is a great and most unfortunate tendency in many quarters, to underrate some truths, so as to bring others into more conspicuous relief. It may be that some particular truths are not at present adapted to certain minds, and that they may as yet be unable to comprehend the perfect unity, which is a salient and necessarily characteristic attribute of all true revelation; but nothing worth gaining is ever gained, and much well worth preserving is hopelessly lost, by any attempt to limit or monopolize the divine outpourings.)

God is infinite, and man is finite. Man is ever circumscribed to a limited area, and can only do so much work, spend so much money, and visit so many places: therefore, an idea of the Divine Being borrowed from human experience in outward life, is always a dwarfed and circumscribed idea. To hear many persons talk of the divinity of Jesus Christ, of the Word of God, of the operations of the Holy Spirit, of the scheme of redemption, the plan of salvation, and other profound spiritual subjects, you would certainly infer that God was a being of the most arbitrary limitations: that he could love just so many but no more; could send his Son in one human form to one world once, to offer to his children salvation, and then at length to judge them, but no more. You would think that God could only write one book, could only work through one institution, and that, if we accept the mission of Jesus, we must regard all other spiritual teachers as deluded or impostors; while to accept the Bible and embrace Christianity, must mean to renounce all other sacred treatises, and separate oneself entirely from all other systems of religion.

(The Christian missionary goes out to Asia to convert the heathen; and by heathen he often means not only the idolatrous, the degraded, and the illiterate, but under the term "pagan" he includes all the most enlightened, spiritual, progressive, and saintly mystics of the Brahman and Buddhistic types. Among heathen philosophers he includes Confucius and Plato, while no two men have left an impression upon the world for good, intellectually, greater than that left by these two noted sages. Still Confucianism and Platonism are insufficient to satisfy the deep yearnings of the human soul. So is Theosophy, as interpreted by Madame Blavatsky, Col. Olcott, and others of its distinguished leaders; as in the midst of the most brilliant intellectual activity there is a dearth of that spiritual food which is the true bread of life, the manna which comes down from Heaven, feeding the soul with the fare of which angels partake, and wherewith even they are satisfied.

The term "Christ" has many meanings to the exoteric student. Sometimes it conveys the idea of a priest or king solely, one who has been anointed with consecrated oil, and ordained by the imposition of apostolic hands to the work of ministry; but the Jesus of the Gospels was not so anointed. According to the Evangelists he came not as a king or priest appointed or ordained of men: his kingdom was not of the terrestrial world. He had no gorgeous jewels, no robes of state, no brilliant retinue, no flattering courtiers at his feet; his followers were fishermen and many common people, who heard gladly though the chief priests and rulers defied him, persecuted him, and at length put him to death. His court was composed of sinners he had converted from the error of their ways, and who from gratitude for so great a blessing were willing to share his toilsome lot, and ease, if might be, the load on his burdened shoulders. His birth was that of a pauper, his death that of a criminal, and yet his name is, according to the New Testament, the one name given unto men whereby they may be saved; the name at the mere mention of which, every knee in heaven and earth must bow.

The Church on earth has been so literal in the construction it has put upon this passage, that whenever the name of Jesus occurs in the service, caps are lifted or heads bent down; but what means the name, but the outward expression of the spirit? The name of God signifies not the titles applied on earth to Deity, but the manifestation of divine life in earthly form, and when it is predicted that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, the writer of the esoteric document, from which the words are taken, means that divine or celestial expressions of life on earth shall yet so completely dominate all forces and forms of matter, so thoroughly subdue all forms of pride, tyranny, selfishness and imposture, that when the true Golden Age shall have dawned, right will be sovereign instead of might, and those alone accounted highest and most worshipful through whom the spirit of truth is most perfectly made manifest in love.

You will pardon us if, for a moment, we refer you again to the earliest chapters of Genesis, and this time ask you to carefully note the difference between the man (mankind), male and female, created in the first chapter, and the Adam, formed in the second. This Adam was the first spiritual messenger, of whom the Jews had preserved any written record. He was to them the first man, the source whence they derived all their characteristics as a peculiar people. This the esoteric Jews fully understood, while the ignorant and bigoted believed all Gentiles were sons of Eve, by the serpent, while they (the Jews) were sons, by Adam; and this in a certain sense the Talmud teaches, only the Talmud being itself an esoteric book, can never be correctly interpreted by literalists, as the letter never does more than constitute a veil or covering for the inner meanings conveyed to the initiated, by means of those very veils which conceal them from the vulgar.

Christ is called the second Adam, in the Epistles; and it is declared that, as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But "Christ" is here a title applied to the Spirit, and especially given to Jesus by the writers of the New Testament, as the most perfect manifestation or expression of the Spirit witnessed upon earth. If all must die in Adam the first, all be alive for evermore in Adam the second, then a distinction is made between the simply rational and the inmost or divine soul; the former in and of itself is not immortal, the latter lives for ever, and is like Melchisedek, who was the symbol of the soul to Abraham, without beginning of days or end of life. Thus our considerations of this subject cause us to arrive at this conclusion, viz., the soul is alone immortal. Outer personalities, astral bodies, all may be but shells, envelopes, or derivations, but in them is no life per se. The essential unit of life is eternal and immortal, has an unbroken consciousness through all the ages, and is indeed the breath of God in man, the candle of the Lord, the spark from heaven's eternal fire, individualized for ever.

In Kardec's Philosophy, and in that of Roustaing, great stress has been invariably laid upon the doctrine of Re-Incarnation—not a particularly happy word, as it does not convey the idea of spiritual embodiment anything like so clearly as the term Re-Embodiment, now more generally made use of by advanced spiritual teachers. Both incarnation and re-incarnation are faulty expressions, if the lexicons be correct, as reference to any dictionary will tell you that incarnate means "made flesh": so we have it in the creed of the Church—"he was made flesh" (incarnatus est).

Now, spirit can never be made flesh, though it requires spirit to make flesh, as no flesh is eternal, and no material can exist except when and where spirit operates to produce it. The spirit never becomes material, though it derives perception of material things through a material organism. The soul and the body are always perfectly distinct, and in order that a spirit should produce, animate, and control a body, it is only necessary that there should be a vital union between the spirit and its organism. This is proved by psychological facts, and notably by theosophical experiments, which, instead of simply demonstrating the existence and power of elementary intelligences, prove absolutely the sovereign and supreme sway of human intelligence over all forms of matter and lower grades of spiritual being. Supposing Madame Blavatsky, or any other Theosophist, really does accomplish all that is done in the name of Theosophy, according to its organ in India and the testimony of its friends in Europe,—What can be shown more clearly than that the human mind, or will, or spirit, is capable of disintegrating and reuniting matter, and controlling weaker wills and lower spirits till they perfectly obey its domination? Spiritualists may plead for the agency of disembodied spirits, and pronounce Madame Blavatsky a physical medium, but what are disembodied human spirits but those who were once embodied, and what powers can there be exerted by the disembodied, which are not present, even though usually latent, in the embodied man?

The doctrine of Re-embodiment naturally leads the thinker to something like the following conclusions, if he only carefully follows out a logical train of deductive reasoning, which must inevitably lead him to that point where he acknowledges at length, with the understanding as with the sentiment of the spirit, the Divine Justice in all the affairs of life; the Universal Paternity of the Divine Mind, the universal fraternity of mankind, and the necessity of every conceivable human temptation and trial, to round the spirit out at length in the full glories of resplendent angelhood.

The angels,—What are they, and how do they differ from ordinary spirits? is a question repeatedly asked, but never answered till the soul understands the meaning of the command: Be ye perfect! and knows that the perfect way is the path of everlasting blessedness, because of perfect love to God, and love to all souls in the universe. Celestial life is quite distinct, in its rounded beauty, from that cherubic or seraphic life, which is associated with the idea of perfect innocence and purity, compatible with childish simplicity but not with mature spiritual development. Paradise has been forfeited, the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil has been partaken of at the instigation of the serpent, or man and woman would not be here struggling with sin, battling with temptation, shut out from a realization of heavenly things, as the dwellers on earth usually are.

The Christ-man is he who has been subjected to every human trial and sorrow, and yet has overcome them all. He has been in the wilderness with the wild beasts, and has known what it is to have the tempter appear to him as an angel of light, telling him, if he yields to sense and not to conscience, he shall be accounted worthy to take rank among the gods. "It is finished!" is the parting ejaculation of one who has braved every storm, completed every work, and at length has grown prepared for that supreme triumph over death, which makes the resurrection and ascension possible.

The narrative of Christ and his earth-experiences is utterly unintelligible to all save those who can read between the lines the history of the progress of the spirit, but when the real nature of the spirit is understood, then both a personal and a corporate, an ideal and an actual, Christ can be not only imagined, but actually perceived and inwardly realized. After the flesh we then know Christ no longer, but in the spirit he is with us always. We do not say that a knowledge of an historic Christ is needful to all, for were it needful it would be vouchsafed to all mankind, and there could not be, as there are, hundreds of millions of human beings destitute of all knowledge of his very existence. It is not needful to know anything of history to know Christ, neither need we use the terms Christ, or Christian, to signify our allegiance to the spirit of truth.

The Kingdom of Heaven is within, and when we pray, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven"—What can we mean, if we pray devoutly and sincerely, but that we long to see the day, when in ourselves and all around us, the Will of God, which is essential Justice, Love, and Wisdom unclouded, shall be obeyed, and obeyed because it is beloved? Coercive measures may be necessary among ruffians and barbaric peoples, but they never tend to a love of law, only to a fear of it, and frequently to its hatred. The law of love and the love of law are inseparable, and who can intelligently love or obey a law he does not appreciate, because he does not understand it. The rigour of the letter of Mosaism can never win the world to the simple Israelitish trust in Jehovah, as an Infinite Parent, which made the Psalmist exclaim, in a moment of filial trust and grateful recognition of God's bounty: "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." "The Lord is good to all; and his tender mercies are over all his works." These, and many other beautiful passages from the rich treasury of ancient Hebrew literature, express not slavish fear nor servile submission, but are full of that fervour of love which is the essence of all true religion.

Can we have any ennobling idea of God, if we merely rest on sovereignty, and declare that all are not equal in God's sight, and that it is not for us to complain of inequalities, because God is a sovereign, and has a sovereign right to do as he pléases with his own; while all we receive is a free gift from him to us? We do not deny the sovereignty of Deity, nor man's entire dependence upon the Infinite Spirit for life, and breath, and all things; but upon the simple plea of sovereignty, you can justify the awful travesties of Calvin, when he taught the reprobation of some and the election of others. Calvinism, Fatalism, Mohammedanism, Secularism, and, alas! Judaism and Christianity only too often have this fearful blot upon their escutcheons. Neither the God of the Calvinist, nor the Mohammedan, nor the orthodox Jew, nor the narrow-minded Christian is impartial; while the "nature," at whose shrine the Secularist bows, is but a blind, remorseless tyrant. Struggle as you may to reconcile all human inequalities by the theory of Divine Sovereignty, or that of Secularism, which denies intelligence, affection, and consciousness to the Power that moulds our lives, brings us into being, and hurries us out of it, you will utterly fail to evolve a philosophy acceptable to the highest minds on earth. Man has thought out a wiser and a better God, and possesses a truer and more loving nature.

(Where the philosophy of Re-embodiment chimes in so beautifully with the deepest and truest thought of man, is where it takes its stand upon the cardinal, primal, central, and ultimate affirmation of Divine Justice. This justice being the base of all the operations of nature, no one is preferred before another. God has no favourites, all are equal in his sight. His universe is the expression of his infinite benevolence, while those who have suffered most, have learnt most and enjoy most; while those who have suffered least, have learnt least and enjoy least. We do not care what your theories or hypotheses may be, if you grant the truth of this divine and central axiom, but we shall for ever refuse to bow before a God or Nature which substitutes caprice for justice, and partiality for equal love.

No one can fail to see in the best and brightest lives, lived out on earth by saint and seer, by prophet, martyr and reformer, an evidence of this most perfect justice at the centre of all being.) The child is instinctively just, and it needs the sophisticating influence of earthly commerce and self-interest, to make foul play acceptable to any of your children. All men and women, wherever found, instinctively admire a truly just and absolutely impartial person; such an one can always influence a family, control an army, or a State; mutiny can never continue where he is in command, and if, from age to age, we see with increasing brightness this love and sense of perfect justice and impartial goodness developing in human life, surely no one in his senses can question the existence of Infinite Rectitude and Impartiality as the base and centre of all existence. (If you can acknowledge and adore this Justice, and yet be opposed to the philosophy of Re-embodiment, we do not think on any moral grounds you can need to accept it, as you have learned the lesson it is ordained to teach; but to those who cannot otherwise perceive this loving justice in all the affairs of life, Re-embodiment offers such explanations of life, and such consolation in the midst of adversity, as nothing else can give.

The mystery of creation is insoluble to the modern Scientist, who can perceive nothing beyond mere law, or fate, governing all things. Among physical Scientists, no one, perhaps, stands higher than Darwin, the far-famed apostle of Evolution; but Evolution without Involution is inconceivable. Nothing can be unrolled which has not first been rolled up. The outer universe is like a scroll, gradually opened, revealing the mystic characters which Spirit has written upon it through all the ages. To the purely materialistic mind, the lesser is constantly evolving the greater, the lower producing the higher: blind force begets intelligence, and man, composed of primal atoms or of molecules, is supposed to possess powers and attributes which these atoms or molecules do not individually possess. But surely the merest tyro in science must be aware, that combinations and multiplications cannot create attributes foreign to the nature of substances multiplied or combined. Before anything can be evolved by multiplication or combination, the essential elements must exist in the primal atoms, and if it be possible to trace all life—organic and inorganic, mineral, vegetable, animal and human—to original atoms, then these must be self-intelligent, if they are really the basis of existence.

To illustrate: a single atom may be so infinitesimal, that it is quite invisible, both to the naked eye and with the aid of the strongest microscopic power available, while a million atoms combined may be clearly visible. Would it be possible for the million (all alike, primarily or individually) to manifest size and form, unless each separate atom had size and form? The size and form in the one case may be so minute that it is beyond microscopic detection, in the other, so great that it is easily perceived by unassisted human vision. If it be true, that size, form, colour, or any material attribute, must exist in the unit or it cannot be manifest in the bulk,—will not the same course of necessary reasoning lead us, by processes of logical deduction, to the inevitable conclusion that will, mind, spirit, intelligence, use what word you choose to express the governing force in nature, must lie at the root of all existence? Thus the spiritual man is the real man, the spiritual world the real world; while original cells, or primordial cellular tissues, or animalculæ, in the form of protoplasm, can be only the earliest and most rudimentary manifestation of Spirit in its primal contact with the earth.

The monad is the first; the duad, the second; the triad, the third registration of spiritual impulsions through matter; while every type of life registers further and further efforts of Spirit, till at length the human form is produced, and Spirit rests from the work of producing any further types of life on earth. This is what is meant by God "resting from his work on the seventh day" or first Sabbath of the world. God (or to speak correctly the Elohim, or divine emanation, i.e., the Divine Soul) was engaged through countless æons, vaguely called days, in the creation of species. The evening and morning alluded to signify alternating states of impregnation and harvest: the night between the evening and the morning, the period of gestation or germination, which is always carried on in secrecy and darkness within the earth or womb.

No type produces its successor, but every type has been necessary to induce that condition of soil and atmosphere, which rendered the advent of the next higher type possible. We avow our faith in direct and specific acts of Spiritual Creation, and declare this truth not inconsistent with any demonstrable theory of evolution. The Darwinian order of the succession of types may be correct; the only error may be in supposing that there is no direct spiritual impulse, to produce each separate and successive type. The monkey did not develop into man, but the monkey was an earlier manifestation of Spirit than man. The spirit, who was yet to form a human body, first produced the organism of an ape: but no animal form contains or embodies the Divine Soul, but only gives expression to certain emanations from the Soul-unit, which is never embodied in any form below man. Therefore, the animals are not immortal; they have no persistent individuality, while the life that animates them is a derived and reflected life.

If this be true of animals, may it not, say some, be true also of savages and of all human beings who have not attained to the dignity of spiritual self-hood. The doctrine of Conditional Immortality is finding favour in many quarters to-day, because it appears from many passages in the New Testament that immortal life is a reward; and to those who are not New Testament Christians, the doctrine commends itself as consistent with earthly life as a state probation, and heaven as a state of felicity, never enjoyed until earned. There is no good ground, however, for supposing that the individuality of any being is ever lost. The only question is: Had that being ever a conscious and distinct individuality to lose? We never knew of a human being who had not some soul-life within him; and we cannot conceive of the human form except as the expression of the human soul directly, while the perfect man is the Christ-man or Messiah, who manifests not simply some of the life of the soul, dimly through the veil of flesh, but manifests the fulness of the Godhead bodily; and that fulness of the Godhead is naught else than the full display of the soul-life, which is one with the Divine, and is the direct link between man and the Infinite Spirit.

At first, when the soul approaches the earth, though it has all divine possibilities within it, these are but in embryo, and the embryonic emanation from the yet unembodied soul, produces upon earth the simple monad. Through all the succession of types on earth, the soul is labouring unseen, till at length it presents not a form derived from some of its attributes separately, but a form produced by all its attributes conjointly. As there is great difficulty in the way of realizing how the types first appeared in form upon the earth, we must call to your notice the fact of materialization, admitted alike by Spiritualists and Theosophists: though the Theosophist explains the phenomena differently from the Spiritualist. It is recorded by Spiritualists that in many séances flowers have been materialized, and then have as suddenly and mysteriously disappeared. It is also stated by many competent witnesses, that human forms have been gradually built up from the floor, apparently; at first appearing like thin columns of moving vapour, and at length assuming the full proportions of the human body. It is stated by those who have had experience with Hindoo Fakirs, that a perfect tree from the seed of a gourd has been developed, and has flowered and then dematerialized in less than half an hour. The friends of Madame Blavatsky declare, that in her presence they have seen a cobra formed and then as mysteriously vanish, simply by her placing her handkerchief on the table, and employing her occult powers. Whatever explanation may be given of these phenomena, they must command the attention of the scientific world, in the near future, to an extent they have not yet done; and whether the general conclusion be Theosophic or Spiritualistic, in either case, immense light will be thrown upon the problem of creation; will or intelligence, whether embodied or disembodied, being indispensable to the production of such marvellous phenomena.

Apply the fact of materialization to creation, or to evolution, and you can understand how the original types first sprang into existence. At certain epochs of the earth's history, a type pre-existent in spirit assumed a human form: and as the spiritual medium declares that he or she is under the control of higher spirits than his own; and as the Theosophist, the initiate, or the adept, declares he has elementary spirits under his control, so both statements may be correct. The higher ever controls the lower throughout all space. Rise high as you will, there will always be some power above you, and to that power you may stand as a medium or subject. While subject to the higher, the lower may be subject unto you; and so throughout the boundless realms of space, life may appear as a ladder, upon the rounds of which intelligences ever stand, each round controlling the one beneath it.

The first human beings who appeared on earth, may have entered life through the portal of Spirit-materialization: and in the coming days, when celestial life shall be ultimated below,—not the mere typal germ, not the lowest and crudest expression of life will be made manifest, but glorious souls will take upon themselves a form as they may please, and the Second Coming of Christ, in like manner as he ascended, may be interpreted spiritually, to signify his re-appearance on the earth, in all the glory of celestial presence.)

Not as a puling infant,
Not as a weakly child,
Not as a man of sorrows,
Will the Saviour at length appear;
But he who comes to gather
His sheep into his fold,
To number up his jewels,
And place them in the gold!
The radiant golden setting
Of heaven's immortal state;
Will take them to his Kingdom,
Through Purity's white gate,
Through pearls from sorrow formèd,
Through gems from pain grown bright,
Into his endless Kingdom,
With unspeakable delight.

IV.

SPIRITUALISM, AND ITS TRUE RELATIONS TO THEOSOPHY AND TO CHRISTIANITY.

(Delivered in Paris.)

Spiritualism and Theosophy, continued. Spiritualism and its True Relations to Esoteric Christianity, and to every Social and Political Reform. Who was Melchisedek? The Hermetic Philosophy. The Coming of the Kingdom of Harmony. Anno Dominæ. The Golden Age, and final Destiny of Earth.

IN our last Lecture, we were only able to vaguely touch upon a few of the most conspicuous ideas, which the four subjects suggested to us on that occasion, brought into prominence. Could we give, say twelve consecutive Lectures upon the esoteric side of Spiritualism and Theosophy, and then sum up our remarks by showing what practical influence for good spiritual teaching must necessarily exert upon the world in the transformation or transfiguration of earthly life, we might be able to present you with something like a systematic dissertation upon the various themes with which you have requested us to deal. As it is, we must leave it to yourselves at your own leisure, through private meditation and such inspiration as you can individually obtain, to supply the manifest deficiencies in the scheme of philosophy we are endeavouring to present to you; as we can at best do no more than just touch lightly here and there upon some of the sublimest truths and deepest principles of spiritual being, into which you are evidently such anxious and studious inquirers.

In our previous Discourse, we called your attention to the seeming conflict between Theosophy and Spiritualism, as no real conflict at all. Certainly, nominal Spiritualists and Theosophists are often bitterly opposed to each other, and say unkind—and, we think, unjust—things, sometimes the one of the other. Such conduct ill becomes seekers after truth. We must credit all our fellow students with sincerity equal to our own, and in all docility and humbleness of mind, must allow that none of us have all the light, or are able to discover all there is of truth.

Students of spiritual things are like persons on a mountain-side: some are nearer the summit than others; some very near the base. Those who stand highest have the widest view of the gorgeous natural panorama spread out before them; those who have gained the summit, can look all round and view the scenery from all sides. Perhaps on one side there are hills; on another, water; on another, table land; on another, a deep declivity. Those who look only to the north, cannot see what is to the south; those whose eyes are turned westward, cannot see what is to the east; and is it surprising, while all are climbing on the various sides respectively, diametrically opposite views should be taken of the surroundings? Yet all these views are right, as relative or partial truths; all are wrong, as absolute or final conclusions.

Students of religion, of the spiritual nature of man, or indeed of any natural science, are like these mountain climbers: one sees one side of a truth, another sees from another standpoint; and like the men in the fable, who disputed over the colour of a chameleon, they all were right in declaring what they saw; till at length a wiser man than any one of them interposed, stepped in and told them how the white chameleon was also red, blue, yellow, green, purple, grey, or any other colour they had seen it—it looked different in different lights. Science points you to the perfect ray of white light, and tells you white is the sum of colour. There are three primary, and a much larger number of prismatic, hues, but altogether they form white. Some who only saw the blue ray, might declare light is blue; some who saw only the red or the yellow, might declare light to possess only the one colour they perceived.

So with the jarring sects, so with divided schools of thought, wherein many men have many minds. The Christian, the Theosophist, the Jew, the Buddhist, the Spiritualist, and the controlling spirits,—all are right and all are safe when they confine themselves to declarations of what they know; but just so soon as arrogant and negative assumptions are put forward as incontestable facts, and that is pronounced impossible or untrue that some particular individuals have not discovered, then the strife commences, the clash of weapons is heard, battle begins in darkness, and persons are often accused of bigotry and uncharitableness, or folly or guilt, merely because they refuse to put out their eyes because some of their neighbours are blind, or to shut their ears to all the voices of the Spirit because some of their companions are deaf.

Should you visit Brighton, or any other South Coast town in England, and look across the Channel with the naked eye, you could not possibly discover France, while from Dieppe you could not view Newhaven; and were it not for the traveller, who has crossed the water in a boat, or for the powerful field-glass which supplements your vision, those who had never seen across the waters, and had never crossed them, could not imagine what lay beyond. Facts are what we know; what we only guess at should be put forward most modestly and tentatively, while they who are assured of the truth of facts, no matter how stupendous, are always justified when questioned seriously upon them, to give direct affirmative answers to their interrogators. Still there has always been need of secret orders and occult brotherhoods, to give special training to those who were prepared beyond others, to understand and exercise supernal powers of spirit over matter; and as dangerous weapons and sharp tools are only safe in the hands of the wise and mature, while the ignorant and infants would soon wrest them to their own undoing and that of others, so there have ever been but few upon the earth, who have been capable of rending the veil and peering behind the screen of symbol into the inner mysteries of the Spirit. You are doubtless aware, that while Freemasonry acknowledges three necessary and common degrees of initiation, viz., Entered Apprentice, Fellow Craftsman, and Master Mason; and while entrance into the blue lodge is needful to entitle to the advantages accruing from entrance into the brotherhood the world over, still there may be many higher degress taken than these three; while the Past Grand Master of an ordinary order, may not know anything of even the first principles of some higher and more secret brotherhoods beyond, the very existence of which may be unknown to the mass of mankind, ordinary Masons included.

Some years since, when a Theosophical Society was started in New York, it was declared that it was necessary to take nine degrees to qualify a member to enter into the full mysteries and powers of the order; that only three degrees could be taken in Europe or America, the remaining six could only be taken in the East. Since that time you have heard much of Koot Hoomi and the Himalayan Brothers, while "Isis Unveiled" and the "Theosophist," also, "Ghost Land" and "Art Magic" have familiarized the reading public with some of the mysteries of Occult Science and Brotherhoods; but all the orders which are made mention of to the public at large, are quite external compared with that most powerful and divine of all brotherhoods upon the earth, viz., the Order of Melchisedek.

This Order is composed of the Sons of God, or, as they have also been called, Sons of Osiris, or Sons of the Sun. This Order never varies from age to age. Its immediate inspiration is from the Guardian Angel of the Planet, who never changes, and who is the God or presiding Deity of the world. Under the dominion of this Supreme Archangel are twelve angels, who manifest to the earth through twenty-four embodiments, twelve males and twelve females constituting this Order, the very existence of which is practically unknown to all but those in communion with it. The members of this surpassing Order, are the ruling spirits of the planet. The Order itself is in the spirit world, but there are always upon the earth the perfect circle of chosen representatives, and these are they who have attained to oneness with celestial spheres of life.

Predicting a Messiah, the prophets of old declared that he should belong to this Order, while in the Epistle to the Hebrews, Christ and Melchisedek are identified. Jesus was always regarded by the early Christians, who were Gnostics and esoteric Spiritualists, as the earthly manifestation of this Divine Circle, while the entire radius of the circle comprised the 144,000 redeemed out of all the nations of the earth, and styled the first-fruits of the Heavenly Kingdom, in the Apocalypse.

Tracing the progress of this Order through twelve dispensations of time, and allowing that 144,000 expresses the number of those ingathered in each successive dispensation, the number of souls who attain to oneness with this Order is 1,728,000 during the grand cycle of time, in which is accomplished the precession of the equinoxes, during which period of 25,840 years or thereabouts, the sun travels through all the zodiacal signs, and completes its journey around Alcyone, the far-distant star, or to speak correctly, the central sun of this universe, and often called the centre of the sidereal heavens.

It is to this sun that the apex of Egypt's greatest Pyramid was designed directly to point, and as Professor Piazza Smyth, the Astronomer Royal of Scotland, has suggested in his able and fascinating work, "Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid," in the year 2,170 B.C., the polar star (Alpha Draconis) shone directly down the shaft of the Pyramid, while twice every year—once at the vernal and again at the autumnal equinox—the sun illuminated the entire disc of the stupendous fane, with golden rays of glory. Whatever may be the meaning of the lidless sarcophagus in the King's Chamber, to the student of weights and measures, —granting the perfect demonstration in the Pyramid of many a mathematical problem, and granting also its proof that the Egyptians of old possessed a system of weights and measures vastly superior to the French metric system, now almost universally regarded as the best extant,—the Pyramid of Gizeh was evidently intended as a Masonic Temple, a temple of science and religion, a temple to the sun externally, and to the Deity esoterically; as the sun was ever regarded as the manifested presence of the planetary Archangel, while Alcyone was revered as the home of God.

Modern scientists may turn a deaf ear to spiritual interpretations of ancient mysteries, if they will, but who is great in the scientific world to-day, who does not know that either the pryamidal form is a blank, or it is the expression of ancient spiritual and scientific knowledge. Professor Smyth sees in it a prophecy of Christ, and predicts his second coming and the end of the world shortly, as the Grand Gallery 1881½ inches in length, is by him understood to refer to the duration of the Christian era. This gallery then abruptly terminates, but following a tortuous passage through which it is extremely difficult to crawl along, what is the surprise of the explorer at finding himself in the magnificent

King's Chamber, where all is light and beauty, but in that chamber as in all other parts of the Pyramid, there are no hieroglyphics or inscriptions of any kind,—the Pyramid speaks only in form, in its simple expressive design, and to those who are altogether uninitiated it speaks not at all. It is the stone which the builders have rejected, and is destined to become the head stone of the corner in the temple of material science; while viewed spiritually, the truths it symbolizes and the spiritual facts it declares, are destined yet to be acknowledged as the keystone of the Arch, by all who in the coming era shall become Masons, in the true Lodge of the Spirit.

It has been said by some interpreters, that the Pyramid speaks no more after 1881 or 1882 A.D. True it is that about the middle of the year 1882, the 1881½ years symbolized by the Grand Gallery came to an end, but it is difficult to compute with precise accuracy the true year of the commencement of the Christian Dispensation, especially as there are those who have studied the records deeply, who declare that Jesus was born about 100 years earlier than Christian historians declare, while others make a distinction between the culmination of astronomical and spiritual cycles, the latter being said to culminate about 300 years later than the former. It is useless to try and prove spiritual truths merely by reference to external history, as that history is by no means infallible or indubitably correct, and spiritual facts do not in any sense depend upon the letter of history. No one really lives the "Christ-life" by simply believing that a star shone over Bethlehem 1884 years ago, and led the Persian Magi to a stable where they found a babe, in whom the predictions of Isaiah were fulfilled. Many there are who believe in the letter of sacred documents, who know nothing and care nothing for their spirit. These are not in communion with the Christ Sphere or Star Circle. These know nothing of vital union with celestial states. These have ideas about God and immortality accepted blindly upon authority or tradition, but being destitute of interior light, they are in gross internal darkness: the light that is in them is darkness, for it is only the letter which killeth; while they who have by celestial influx received the light of the Spirit, need not that any man should teach them, for the Spirit teaches them from within. The Holy of Holies, the Ark of the Covenant, the Mercy Seat, and the Shekinah are all within, and Solomon's true Temple of perpetual wisdom is enclosed within their shrine of outward life.

The religion of Jesus, considered esoterically, is the simple universal religion of the Spirit, which acknowledges one universal Deity, and the manifestation of that Deity to man through the medium of his own soul. Who can read the Sermon on the Mount, the Golden Rule, the two Great Commandments, upon which Jesus said all the Law and Prophets hang, without perceiving at a glance that Jesus insisted upon universal truths, and enforced the essential precepts of the Hebrews upon the minds of all his hearers.

What says the Sinaitic law? Nothing, but what your best social reformers of the present day can heartily endorse. The recognition of one spiritual Deity; and the paying of undivided homage to the Eternal mind alone; the prohibition of all profane language and impious oaths; the observance of one day out of seven as a day of rest from labour, that man and beast alike may be refreshed and reinvigorated for the next six day's toil; the utter overthrow of murder, adultery, theft, false witness against one's neighbours, covetousness and all uncharitableness and injustice; surely this will be regarded as good by every intelligent utilitarian, who simply seeks the physical and worldly good of the human family. The commandments of the Decalogue are all wise and true, while the rigour of their enforcement by imperfectly enlightened legislators, was completely set aside by Christ. He came not to destroy but to fulfil the law; but not to endorse or perpetuate human cruelty, aggressiveness and violence; though no doubt the sanctions and penalties common among mutinous Hebrew tribes at certain degenerate and idolatrous periods of their history, were necessary to the enforcement of law and the maintenance of order, and were really intended to protect society, at the expense of disturbers of the peace.

Though we heartily dissent from corporal punishment in all its forms, we know of parents and teachers who conscientiously employ it, believing it to be for the good of those under them and dear to them. "Spare the rod and spoil the child," they interpret literally, forgetting that the severest suffering any delinquent can undergo, comes to him from the upbraiding of his own conscience. There are judges who believe they are doing right when they sentence criminals to execution, but woe to those who believing such penalties to be sinful, pronounce such doom upon their fellow-men, to maintain their seats and salaries, or who strive to soothe their smarting consciences by applying that most abominable and treacherous of all infernal salves: "If I do not do it some one else will, and it might as well be myself as another." It might not as well be yourself as another: there may be others who are in similar positions to your own, who have not your light, and for them to sin in ignorance is not sin to them; for you to sin with your eyes open is sin to you.

The whole doctrine of the Gospel hinges upon individuality and individual accountability. "No man can deliver his brother, or make agreement unto God for him." "Every man shall bear his own burden." "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." These and hosts of similar passages from the Old and New Testaments might be quoted to show how thoroughly the essential religion of all Bibles is in accord with man's intuitive sense of right, and how the really inspired "Christ of God" ever points man to his own indwelling soul, and teaches him there to find the Deity.

All foolish disputations about the personality of God are vain. God may be more than personal, he cannot be less. Every attribute we love and admire in man, as our spiritual being unfolds, must have its counterpart in the Eternal, whose offspring we are; and it will not be till spiritual culture is pursued with that assiduity with which physical and intellectual pursuits are followed, that there will arise upon earth a multitude who will unite in common brotherhood, to make practical the teaching of the Golden Rule.

The word Christianity is unimportant, so is the use of the name Christ, but the Gospel, called the gospel of Christ, is eternally true, and practically beneficial to all minds in every age. That nominal Christianity is not essential, we have only to turn to Matt., vii., to hear Jesus say: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Jesus says that those who do his Father's will are truly his relations, "the same is my mother and sister and brother;" and when we enquire as to what that will truly is, do we not find it beautifully set forth in that inimitably touching and graphic description of the judgment, recorded in Matt., xxv., where Jesus says as plainly as tongue can speak, if words mean anything, that the doing of God's will is all summed up in a life of pure benevolence. He who never turns a deaf ear to the mourner's cry, who never refuses to extend the hand of sympathy to the down-trodden and oppressed; he who can call a Magdalen a sister and a prodigal a brother; going in and out among the destitute, the sinful and the sad; compelling even the libertine, the drunkard, and the blasphemer to feel the power of all-constraining love;—he who does these things, shall never fail. The fifteenth psalm and the Gospel of Jesus, describe the righteous man in precisely similar ways; and should you turn to the Vedic Hymns, the Precepts of Hermes, the Law of Buddha, the Maxims of Confucius, or the Teachings of Zoroaster, you would find that there is in all theologies a golden thread of love, which truly glorifies them, and which justifies the esoteric interpretation of the old Hebrew declaration: "The Lord is one, and his name one;" name being synonymous with outward expression or revelation. Surely it cannot be derogatory to the dignity of Jesus, to declare that he as a truth-teller revealed in many instances precisely what the ancient seers had taught; not the originality or newness, but the truthfulness of what is taught is the true touchstone by which we may try the spirits who communicate with us, and decide whether they are or are not of God. Truth, the same in every age, has appeared in many guises, been clad in many varying habiliments, but if we dig deeply enough we shall assuredly find a unitary basis for all the religions of the world, upon which they all rest secure for ever.

Can any one read the Gospels, and declare that Christianity must needs be founded upon what these say Jesus taught, and then identify the religion of Jesus with those accessories and excrescences, which, notably since the days of Constantine, have disfigured the simple Gospel of Truth? The accretions which are hiding truth are like the eclipsing vapours which, rising from the earth, obscure the sun; and unhappy indeed are they who worship the earthly miasma, and imagine they are paying homage to the divine light.

Christianity to-day is in precisely the same predicament that Judaism was in 2,000 years ago. The light of the Spirit had been quenched by sensuality, dominant tyranny, and the worship of Mammon, which is the grossest of all idolatries. The spiritual significance both of the Law and Prophecy was hidden from the people. They engaged in empty forms; they prayed like parrots, heathenishly using vain repetitions; they made an ostentatious display of devotion in synagogues, and at corners of the streets, that they might be seen of men; and they had the only reward such mock religion can ever win: they were applauded by their fellow Pharisees, and had the satisfaction of recounting, avowedly to God, but really to be heard and admired of men, their many virtues, in the holy temple which they profaned by their self-laudation and idolatrous self-complacency, and wicked despising of their fellowmen who, though outwardly more sinful than they, by reason of humility and desire to improve, were nearer to the kingdom of heaven, even though publicans and harlots, than were these self-satisfied formalists.

These outwardly pious people condemned Jesus bitterly, and pronounced his mission from Beelzebub, because he cast out devils and worked miracles of healing on the Sabbath day, thereby transgressing in their eyes unpardonably the letter of the Decalogue. But Jesus says, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." "It is lawful to do well on the Sabbath day." No outward observance which stands in the way of charity can ever be of divine appointment. There must ever be a misconception of the divine will whenever any command is considered divine, which does not always stimulate every pure and ennobling wish of the human heart. Jesus even justified his followers in plucking ears of corn on the Sabbath, to satisfy their hunger, though some would see in that act of theirs a breach of two commandments. He even justified the action of David and his companions, who ate the showbread, which none but priests might eat; and when discoursing on the law of love, he attributes every asperity of the olden law to the men of old, and not to the Eternal Parent.

True Christianity is therefore the religion of the Spirit. Compare it with esoteric Buddhism, or any other system of spirituality you may please, and it will be found in perfect agreement with the spirit and intention of every truly inspired teacher, through whose ministry the world has caught glimpses of the eternal right.

To return, for a moment, to the Pyramid and the mysteries of the ancient world, we must ask you to observe the very great difference which exists between the spiritual religion of Egypt, expressed mathematically and geometrically in solid masonry, and the animal worship which savours more of fetishism and idolatry. The grandest structures have no animal representations at all. The lotus flower, the cross, the ibis, the apis, the anubis, &c., &c., are all exoteric, and form no part of the symbolism of the Grand Pyramid. This is perfect unity in trinity, a perfect whole, a compact unit, and yet three-sided, resting upon a perfectly square base. The Square means Universal Brotherhood, and signifies the primal and ultimate unity and brotherhood of man. The Triangle represents Fatherhood, Motherhood and Childhood; esoterically, the Love, Wisdom and Power of the Eternal. The Father (Osiris), the Mother (Isis), the Child (Horus), signify respectively the Father-Love and Mother-Wisdom of the Eternal, as in the eighth chapter of Proverbs, Wisdom, personified, declares: "I was with him in the beginning." Wisdom is spoken of as she, while Love is the Word or logos, by whom all things were made. Love in man has unfortunately degenerated into lust and passion, but wisdom in woman has never become quite corrupt. But woman's wisdom is intuition: it is the hidden wisdom, the wisdom of the veiled Isis, but in the coming days, all over the civilized world, and eventually over the whole earth, will this hidden wisdom unite itself with love, and then there shall be a perfect birth of the Christ-child, or the Horus of the ancient days. Love originates, wisdom carries to perfection, all truths throughout the universe. The motive must be loving, the execution must be wise, and then the law is perfect and all-powerful. Then the children born on earth will not be born in sin nor conceived in iniquity. They will not need a baptismal font to cleanse them, they will not need to be born again of water (or matter), they will bask in the sunlight of the Spirit, and on the altars of their hearts will leap high the divine flames, the fires of the Holy Spirit, which will not only purify from dross but will enlighten and illuminate the inmost mind.

The most ancient philosophy of Hermes, upon which the old Egyptian rites and emblems are based, teaches these truths most explicitly, and they are symbolized in all the ceremonies of Egypt and of Greece; while in India, the Vedic or Vedantic philosophy inculcates precisely the same spiritual truths, and so closely do the books of Hermes and the Vedas correspond, that many scholars regard them as transcripts or probable copies of each other. The student who is searching for the cradle of man, and is wading through a mass of antique lore, assisted by the modern sciences, comparative theology and philology, cannot but think that either India gave birth to the Egyptian faith, or Egypt to the Indian. But it is not needful to arrive at any definite conclusion on a mere matter of history like this, to perceive the grand spiritual oneness of all ancient faiths; it is not needful to infer that one nation borrowed or copied from another, or that by means of immigration and emigration spiritual facts were made known to nation after nation: the Spirit speaks in every age and every tongue. The true illuminati have ever been led by the inner light and the guardian angels, who have been their inspirers; all alike have seen the sun, the stars, the constellations in the heavens above them; all alike have felt the breath and heard the voice of the Deity within; all alike have held communion with the angels, who visited them in their starlit towers or shaded retreats among the rocks, upon the mountain sides or in the valleys; all have been knit together in a fraternity of Spirit, which makes all members of the Star Circle. And these are they who can read in the heavens above them and in the earth beneath, the signs of the coming of a new Messiah; these can trace the king in humble guise, by the light of the Pentagram in one age, and the Sexagram in another; but all acknowledge the perfect Circle as the only absolute emblem of Deity, and that circle is Truth itself, the sum of all perfection.

Modern Spiritualism, with its physical phenomena and divers utterances (sometimes apparently conflicting), is only the harbinger of the New Era. Signs and wonders are envelopes: letter carriers, telegraphic messengers, rappings upon your doors, ringing of your bells to arrest your attention. Phenomena can never be the ultimate, and it is indeed entirely useless, unless it conveys a truth to your minds; and it is worse than useless, it is positively evil, when perverted to unholy ends.

And here we draw a very clear and well-marked line of demarcation between mere magic and genuine spiritual communion. Simple magic is not divine; it can, however, become so, if employed for holy ends. Jesus underwent the temptation in the wilderness, when he knew how fierce the struggle was which wages in the medium's or initiate's breast, if he is ever called upon to choose between devoting his powers to self-glorifying magic, and a work of pure self-sacrifice and devotion to the interests of his fellow-men. We are told that the devil requested Jesus to convert stones into bread, to satisfy his personal hunger in the desert, and that Jesus withstood the tempter, and replied to him in these words: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Then we are told that Jesus did produce bread, and with it fed several thousands of hungry congregants who had assembled to hear him, and had travelled far without thinking of their material wants, and who were famished with hunger.

Taking these stories literally or figuratively, the careful student cannot fail to see the lesson which they teach. In the one case selfishness says, Work a miracle to gratify your own appetite; in the other, Love for suffering humanity prompts the exercise of miraculous power, to feed a starving throng.

The second temptation endured by Christ was somewhat like unto the first, though the first appealed to the flesh, and the second to the mind. When carnal appetite had been resisted and restrained, then the temptation was to vain-gloriousness, to love of display, to self-agrandisement in the eyes of the people. Imagine a man throwing himself down from a pinnacle or parapet, and, being sustained by invisible power, falling to the ground unhurt! How great would be the consternation among the people, how willingly would those who sought a sign, and could track the Messianic deliverer only in deeds of magical prowess, have come forward and crowned him as their king! But miracles performed for selfish ends, are only questionable magic. Angels do not stand by to protect those who rashly imperil their lives for no good end, whereas when one is on the path of duty and is obliged to encounter danger on some errand of mercy, he may rest assured that loving angels protect him on his way; and even though the earthly form should perish, the spirit would have conquered in life's fray, and be prepared for entrance upon purer and brighter fields of being in the life beyond.

The third temptation of Jesus was to the spirit. Worshipping the devil, literally means worshipping Mammon, sacrificing principle for policy; and should any magician or student of the occult undergo even such rigorous discipline as Jesus underwent in the desert; should he fast forty days and forty nights; should he succeed in completely subduing the flesh to the will; should he be able to work miracles innumerable, yet if he worked only for popularity and fame, for selfish interest and worldly gain, he would be but a Simon Magus withstanding the apostles of truth; a black magician, a wizard, a sorcerer, an enchanter or worker of spells, exercising an unholy, unhealthy, baneful influence upon mankind, and forming such alliances with spirits of darkness, as led people in the middle ages to believe that persons signed compacts with the evil one, selling themselves to the devil that they might win earthly conquests.

Goethe has illustrated the baneful effects of all such spurious courses in his "Faust and Mephistopheles." This learned poet and philosopher was no doubt acquainted with the Rosicrucian and other secret Orders, prevalent in Germany in the 17th and 18th centuries, and existent still, though of course veiled in the garb of secrecy from the intrusion of the vulgar. The fables of the Rosicrucians concerning the philosopher's stone and elixir vitæ, were not simply childish tales or imaginative dreams, as many persons imagine them. The transmutation of metals is scientifically possible. The crucible of the mystic foretells the triumph of chemistry in future years, while alchemy itself is a true science, when spiritually as well as physically understood. The philosopher's stone and the elixir of life will only be discovered in the moral world, however, when man has learned to govern will by spirit, as matter is governed by will. The Kingdom of God will not have fully come, the reign of the Prince of Peace will not in reality have begun, until man has passed beyond the magical departments of Theosophy, wherein the power of human will is made manifest, to that divine estate where the lower will says to the higher: Thou, not I, must rule! Theosophy in its modern Indian guise, and in its purely wonder-working phases, is but the exercise of human will over man, beast and matter; over elementary kingdoms of life here and in the unseen world; but the Divine Theosophy of Buddha, or the holiest of Lamas of Thibet,—of all who have truly followed in the wake of the most gifted of the world's true sages—is what the word Theosophy really means: the Wisdom of God, divine wisdom which will enable the devotees, at heavenly wisdom's pure and sacred shrine, to literally fulfil the predictions made by Christ concerning his followers: They shall heal the sick and cast out evil or obsessing spirits; they shall cure insanity, and relieve those oppressed by sin from its enslaving power; they shall take up serpents and drink of poisons, and yet shall remain unharmed, because they are filled with the Spirit's resistless might; and the soul having subdued every form of matter, by having perfectly controlled the human organism, which epitomizes all the forces of the three material kingdoms of nature, and having completely subdued the will of the mind to that of the Divine Soul, shall pass unscathed through every fiery ordeal of persecution and temptation; shall be able to demonstrate to a wondering and awe-struck people such supreme triumphs of the soul as Daniel made manifest in the lion's den, and Shadrach, Meschach and Abed-nego in the burning, fiery furnace, heated seven times beyond its ordinary heat, at Nebuchadnezzar's cruel command.

If any Materialist should cavil at such wonders, and pronounce them impossible, we can only say they are impossible to him, and to all on his plane of thought. But is not navigation impossible to many? Can every one steer ships across the ocean safely? Are not the feats accomplished in the chemist's laboratory impossible to many? But shall any deny them because they are exceptional, and can only be proven by men of special training? The lion-tamers of the East, the serpent-charmers, who toy with venomous creatures whose fangs have not been removed, can fascinate and control the lower life of nature, which corresponds to what they in themselves have overcome. No one can tame and control any beast or bird, insect or reptile, until he has first subdued that in himself to which that creature corresponds.

And when at length man shall be perfect on the earth, the planet shall be perfect also. Slaughter will be unknown, ravenous beasts and deadly plants will become extinct, as the earth no longer affords means for their development and subsistence. As the mammoth, mastodon, and other monsters, which roamed primeval forests, are now extinct, because conditions are no longer offered for their perpetuation, so will the earth at length outgrow all that is destructive and unsightly. The supreme will of mind over matter, and of soul over mind, will at length convert the whole earth into a paradise. Then will the Golden Age have come ; then will diseases and death itself be unknown ; then in place of death will there be peaceful and glad transition, and the soul no longer needing its earthly tabernacle, will dissolve it. Flesh and blood will never enter heaven, the material forms will never pass to spirit-life. Still, the ascension of Jesus into heaven, is typical of the translation which will at length be in place of death ; for those whose earthly careers are ended, will glide painlessly and imperceptibly from their material forms ; becoming invisible to mortal sight, it will appear as though their bodies went beyond the clouds, though every particle of material will gravitate to its place in the material kingdom, while the spirit, in a spiritual form, will ascend to its native element, and appear in outward guise upon an earth again, only if such reappearance be needed to demonstrate immortal life to the dwellers upon some outward orb. Death shall be swallowed up in victory ! There shall be no more death, and no more sea ; no more division, no more strife or wrong. The lamb of gentleness shall lie down with the lion of strength ; the little child of peacefulness, docility, and love, shall be the guide ; and the coming rulers of the world shall be those who, in gentleness and childlikeness, are prepared to occupy supernal thrones and judge the tribes of Israel.

The predictions of Jesus with regard to the future glory of his followers, refer to that divine estate of angelhood when the twelve powers of the mind, called the twelve tribes of Israel, in Kabalistic phrase, shall be governed absolutely by the soul within ; and those in whom this soul-life is manifest, are more than adepts, initiates, or magicians,—they are numbered among those who, like the Christ of Galilee, or the Buddha of the East, used all their powers solely for conquest over wrong, disease and death ; and who, therefore, with every magician's power, have beyond all this the invincible might and majesty of the Divine Soul. This at length must conquer. Hells there may be, hells there must be, hells there are, till this divine result shall be accomplished. A spiritual gehenna must burn outside the gates of earth, and outside those of Paradise, till every weed is burned, every iota of alloy consumed, every scrap of chaff burned in the unquenchable fire. But Dives in the flame is there for correction, for the burning away of the sin of selfishness, which made him on the earth forgetful both of brethren and the poor. He must suffer, and all must suffer, until by spiritual effort they span the gulf, bridge the yawning chasm, and through love to the brethren become themselves the angels who will do what as yet Moses and the prophets have not done.

Every one who has done a wrong on earth, must return to rectify it; every spirit who has wronged another, must meet that other and make restitution. The fires are ever burning, the crucible grows never cold, the law is eternal, the means of purification everlasting, the fire which cleanses never goes out; and into the everlasting fire, not that they may everlastingly remain in it, God plunges all his jewels, and only takes them out when all their alloy has been burned away!

This is the truth taught alike by esoteric Christianity, by modern Spiritual Revealments, and by true Theosophy. Nirvana, the Kingdom of God, of Christ, or Heaven, means not extinction of being, loss of entity or individuality; it implies oneness with all in love. As the globules which form the ocean and the sand grains which make up the hills are all individual, as the crystal dew-drops never lose their entity, so the soul, individual once, is individual ever. The soul that says, I AM! will never be less than the self-conscious ego it now is. The outward frame may change, ever so often; the astral body or spiritual form may change, as does the material envelope, but these are neither immortal nor individual; they are but ever-changing agglomerations of moving forces, which the spirit attracts, dissipates and repels. Memory, affection, understanding, will,—these are of the Soul, the primal unit only; and this four-fold nature of man is immortal, while the purely earthly part may but appertain to the elementary kingdom of nature, and be transported through the universe to other worlds, as they require what the perfected earth has rejected.

This Golden Age, or epoch of perpetual harmony, has been heralded by Spiritualism. Already the knockings have been heard, and thirty-three years after 1848, there were those who told you that the purely initial stages of the Movement were passed through, and that from 1881, the calendar should recommence with Woman's Era, Anno Dominæ instead of Anno Domini; but the perfect era is that of the Divine Duality, when the Christ and the Madonna, the lady and the lord, must rule together. But as man has had his special period of dominion, woman may also have hers, and therefore through two little female children, the Rochester knockings were produced, in the self-same year when the first Woman's Rights Convention was held in the United States.

To-day the English Parliament is agitated with the ever-recurring question of Woman's Suffrage. Protests against taxation without representation, are growing more numerous and influential daily, and surely no one who can read the signs of the times, can fail to see that the next great event in all civilized lands, will be the acknowledgment before the law of woman's perfect equality with man. No longer veiled in the harem or even in the cloister, no longer compelled to sit tacitly by, and while taxed as heavily as her brother, have no voice with him in controlling affairs of State; no longer refused admission to the priestly or prophetic or ministerial office, compelled to bow in submission to the will of lords and masters, she will take her place on earth as queen of society, even as the Catholic Church has declared that Mary Immaculate is queen of heaven. But how anomalous is the spectacle of crowds bending low in fervent adoration at Mary's shrine, exalting womanhood by pronouncing a woman "mother of God and queen of heaven," while the priesthood declares that through woman's intercession, the Son of God receives the prayers of men, and through his mother answers their requests, while she is called the spouse of the Holy Spirit, the daughter of God the Father, and the bringer-forth of God made manifest in flesh. How anomalous, we say, is the spectacle of all this supreme devotion paid to woman, by Jews and Protestants styled idolatrous, while woman is still forbidden to approach the altar to offer the sacrifice on the people's behalf, or to enter the pulpit to exhort both men and women to repentance.

All over the world the cry is going up to-day, that men, and young men especially, do not and will not go to church. A moral interregnum is feared and predicted, by reason of the present wide-spread indifference to religion. Morality is at a discount, vice at a premium, in the highest places of State. The law sanctions woman's degradation, but even in polite circles the male delinquent forfeits no right or privilege, except for unusually dastardly conduct; while the female sinner is ostracized and condemned. Where is the justice of a man-made law, permitting man a liberty denied to woman? Where is the justice of condemning one sinner and altogether exculpating her particeps criminis? Where is the justice of a state of society, which underpays female labour and imposes in many parts of Europe the hardest labour upon woman, and compels young men to devote some of the best years of their early life to the indolent and demoralizing life of members of a standing army?

Is it not a fact that one of the loudest cries raised against woman's entrance into Halls of Legislation, arises from the plea that they are not fit for women, that woman should breathe a purer atmosphere than that of those fetid halls? But must legislation ever be carried on in impure places? Are legislative enactments necessarily so corrupt, that they can only be matured in centres of moral infection? If there be vice in Parliament or Congress; if the aggressive spirit rule and the voice of woman has not been heard there since their foundation; if to-day the nations are embroiled in warfare, and the best blood of the countries is shed on the battlefield; if civil service and other reforms be the great cries of the age; if present forms of government are so distasteful to the people that Nihilistic insurrection and Communal strife are the rule and not the exception all over Europe; if the cry of alarm goes up from England because of Fenian outbreaks and dynamite explosions, which neither the arm of the Civil Law nor the Church can quell; if the Russian Emperor is in hourly danger because of the detestation in which the office of Czar is held by the bulk of Russia's population; if Absolutism in Germany is threatening with forcible disruption, and England's policy with Egypt is more than questioned on every hand; if the French Republic be as yet insecure, and across the ocean America is fast becoming a prey to bribery and corruption, while only her immense size and her vigorous youth are her protection,—surely the time has come when, after 1,800 years, and more, of masculine monopoly—yielding so bitter a fruitage of crime, pauperism, vice, persecution, and war—the new era may be inaugurated with the voice of woman pleading for justice. And should a female Paul arise and forbid men to speak, telling husbands to keep silence in the church, and if they wish to know anything ask their wives at home, though the masculine half of the population would raise an indignant howl and pronounce the promoter of such a proposition an idiot, still the spirit of justice would approvingly witness the turning of the tables on man, that he for a while going out of office, should give to the other half of humanity the right to rule, at least, for a term in his stead.

We do not say that woman will be sole ruler in the New Dispensation, but we do pronounce this dawning age the age of woman's supremacy. That it would be, Henry Bulwer (Lord Lytton) foresaw, when he penned the "Coming Race," and portrayed the women among the Vril-Ya as superior to the men. Anno Dominæ, the year of the Lady, introduces to the world that female portion of the Spirit of Truth, which remained in spirit-life unknown to the earth, while the teacher Jesus expressed but one-half the Messianic angel to the world. But ultimately, and even now wherever the highest culture is to be found, men and women will rule and work together. For in the highest parts of the earth, the era of harmony, of true duality, is dawning, but where the single ministration is all that can be given, it will be woman's voice and woman's influence that will cause the wilderness to bloom and the arid waste to sing. It will be woman, who, by moral suasion and the power of right over might, will put down intemperance and fraud, abolish war throughout the earth, and lead the nations to a commonwealth of peace, while the governing body will be composed of persons from all the annexed nations, and there will be a Universal Parliament.

The dream of the near future for Europe, for America, for the Colonies—Australia, South Africa and British India—is the establishment of independent republics first, then the amalgamation of the various races and nationalities into one great united and pacific nation. As many streams may run into one great sea, and lose themselves in the vast body of water, though they take their rise in many sources and flow distinct until at length they empty themselves with many mouths into one great ocean, as the Amazon and its tributaries do, so to the prophetic eye of Spirit, the time e'en now draws nigh when all the most enlightened nations shall become one people, and the differences between races will be forgotten, as they were forgotten in old Rome, when she became the mistress of the world; because a Roman had in his veins the mingled stream, which bespoke for him an origin among long-disaffected and disunited tribes.

Even now the fusing process is in progress in the United States, even more than in England or Europe; and when this blending is complete, war will be impossible. You will have no enemies, and no people will be foreign to you. You will have opened all your ports to every nation. Absolute free trade will everywhere prevail. The rights and welfare of humanity, not of a single tribe, will be considered; and to be human will be enough, while patriotism will mean universal fraternity. The Crescent and the Cross will retire from Europe, and be no more the signs of civilization. The Circle will be the emblem of united life, while the Sexagram, (six-pointed star) will be the symbol of that actualized progression, which will give to half the globe, redeemed from strife, a foretaste of the yet far-distant age of universal peace.

Africa may yet be convulsed. The worship of Allah may lead the Fetish tribes to the acknowledgment of one God, while the earth, commencing its career through the second half of the Grand Cycle, at the middle point of which we now stand, will through the next six ages pass on into the embrace of those bright dual souls, who will yet perfect their form upon its surface. Then when every atom of the globe is harmonized; when human will controls matter utterly and absolutely, and the intellect, no longer proud and overbearing, bends before the Spirit, will God's Kingdom have come, and his will will be done on earth as it is in heaven.

And who are the workers, who, like John the Baptist, are preparing the way for this glorious consummation? Divers and singularly different are they. Carlyle and Garibaldi rebuking wrong, Gordon in Egypt fighting for justice and liberty, all who in any branch of science, art, literature, religion or reform are seeking to raise the human mind, even though it be by purely material means, all are among the heralds of the New Messiah. Those who know not of immortality even, as they also who are aware of it, are working for this glorious end. And most of all they who would emancipate Woman, and thereby unfetter the soul; give reign to intuition; let affection rule the earth; make the law loveable, and because beloved obeyed. Join in this work, and you, in your sphere, have entered upon the

GOLDEN AGE OF HARMONY.

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE STAR CIRCLE.

FAR from the earth!
Beyond its atmosphere, where planets roll
Majestic through all space, where worlds of light,
Unseen by mortal eye, shine in their places bright:
There can our eyes behold, in shining sparkling gold,
A Circle of Bright Souls, whose music onward rolls,
Outward toward the earth, and inward toward the sun,
That distant orb, Alcyone, round which, their courses run,
The worlds uncounted, through eternal day,
Matchless and glorious on their heavenly way.

By what divinest power; in what supreme estate;
Can souls immortal live, who've entered heaven's gate?
What is the angel-throng; what the archangel hosts;
What the nine choirs of soul, who make but truth their boast?
Can they approach the earth; do they to earth draw nigh?
Yea! nearer than ye think, with all your phantasy!

Each planet guarded is by a Celestial Soul,
Who, taking charge of it, as though upon a scroll, Writes all its history; and, by the potent will
That angels all possess, this angel, up the Hill
Of Progress,—howe'er long, with mingled wail and song,
With mingled peace and strife, through life and death, and life
Re-born, grown more divine through earth's experience,— Leads up the Human Soul to Heaven's sweet recompense!

Ah! can ye count the Stars, which twinkle through the night?
Say! can ye e'er discern one tithe of their pure light?
Can any human art, or scientific skill,
Pierce through the ether vault, and through the spaces, still,
Where worlds majestic move, and tell what life is there,
Or limit worlds unseen, floating in ether air?

Science may touch the earth, as with a magic wand,
And straightway to her sight, may nature's law expand
And show how atoms move, as they select their place,
And prove how robes * are formed; and how at length the grace

---

* Material forms are here spoken of as "robes" of Spirit.

Of manhood, womanhood, from childhood, may adorn
What once was wilderness, an arid waste forlorn.
Art may with magic power portray earth, sea and sky
While music may take wings, and soar on ecstacy,
E'en as Beethoven delved into the heart's deep well.
Or Mendelssohn, on wings, to heavens ineffable,
Carried beyond the earth the pleadings of the soul,
And outwardly expressed somewhat of God's control.

The Sculptor takes the block of marble from the mine,
And, by most strange control, may from it best divine
Th' expression of a saint, or some pure little child,
Who as a goddess stands to man, all undefiled ;
While from the brow of Jove Minerva glorious springs,
To bear along heaven's road, on intellectual wings,
Her consort, who is known as Ruler, great and high,
The mightiest of gods, the Chief Divinity !

Then Angelo, in Rome, St Peter's dome thought out :
And Raphael made divine, through genius none can doubt.
The form of human life, transfigured e'en below ;
While Phidias, in Greece, at Athens, dealt such blow
To marble, that it woke responsive to his touch,
As though his living breath impregnated so much
The solid bust of stone, that life shone in the eye !
In Art so great as this, perchance ye may descry
Some glimmerings of light from that perpetual Star,
Which ever shines on earth, with radiance from afar.

When Dante spoke of heaven, beyond all shades of night,
And Beatrice found enrobed in dazzling light,
In pure and snowy sheen transfigured, perfect love
Awoke his trembling lyre, and praise to God above
From every string sent up its pure and sweet refrain,
Which Milton seemed to hear, above earth's cry of pain,
When " Paradise Regained " his chosen theme must be,
And o'er the warlike years, he, Paradise could see,
Not past, but yet to be.

When Homer wrote of gods and goddesses, who strove
In ancient Troy, he caught some of that living flame,
Which through the passing years the poets all declaim ;
Till Wordsworth, Shelley, find, in dreams of perfect peace,
The light of that pure Star, which bids all passion cease.

But 'twas in Bethlehem, when Orient Magi stood Before a weakly babe, to offer treasures good ;
And 'twas on Indian plains, where pure Gautama found
The life of perfect rest, that heaven did most abound.
Confucius must point unto a Western Star,
Which shone in Buddha's eyes ; while Galilee afar
Must hear its valleys ring, and hill-tops sweetly sound
With that divinest voice, through which souls peace have found.

That Star, in ancient times, was unto Egypt known,
And kings and nobles bowed before its light alone,

While priest and prophet caught from heaven that living flame,
Which gave them the design their ancient structures claim;
Worship was offered to Osiris, God of Light,
And Isis counterpart, who ruled with mildest might
Of justice, bathed in love and wisdom, robed in peace.
There was the primal Star, whose light can never cease,
The matchless Central Sun, round which all planets run Through Constellations Twelve, passing, while man must delve
On earth, through every state which leads to heaven's own gate.

The Circle of the Stars must needs a centre find,
An all-controlling force must all in union bind.
That centre is pure rest, where all is calm for aye,
Where peace and order rule in love eternally.
Though there is strife around, that centre is the same,
Past, present, and to be, it shines with steadfast flame.

There, at the centre, dwells the Angel of the matchless space,
In which Twelve Planets move in orbits of supernal grace.
Twelve Systems, each with twelve mysterious Orbs of light,
They shine in union pure, harmonious to the sight
Of angels evermore, while to their uttermost,
One hundred-forty-four bright children this Star must boast.

There are Twelve Systems, which revolve in ceaseless day
Around Alcyone, while on their earthly way
They surely must include the system where ye dwell,
And take in Planet Earth, to whom the tale they tell,
That she is but a part of that mysterious whole,
Which answers to the voice of the Great Central Soul!

In man, one central Orb—one Centre—must be found;
That Centre is the Soul, I see revolving round,
When man is perfect made, twelve Powers of the Mind;
Then, again, twelve Gifts of Sense, which bind
The Spirit to the clay, and clay to life of mind.

In this most glorious whole—the circuit of the sky,
In this interior grace of soul ye may descry
The bonds which knit ye all together in one race,
Assuring each and all of future dwelling place,
Among those orbs of light, among those stars so bright,
Ye gaze upon by night, scarce visible to sight!

Now ministering to earth, we watch a gracious Queen,
One who, in earthly form, has persecuted been;
One who, at Holyrood, must sorrow, strive, and turn
Only to God in need: to him whose love doth burn,
Bright as that central fire, though all else should expire.

She, and a mystic band of virgin souls most white,— Clad in the purity which victors from the fight
Have won, through trials o'ercome, temptations dashed to earth,—
As the Vestal Virgins watched the temple fires of earth,
When Rome was Queen; so now, unseen by mortal eye,
The souls of many watch, and guide earth's destiny.

She, this illustrous Queen, is chosen at this day,
To give an outward form to truth's surpassing ray,
At one point of the Star; and there are many see
She holds her light to earth, in love and purity.

And there are other souls, who work in other ways.
The Star, the Sexagram, with undiminished rays,
Will be the typic Star, for this New Age to be.
The Star Circle in Heaven must shine eternally,
Twelve pointed; and when all earth's periods shall be run,
Then from the Tree of Life, twelve fruits, securely won,
Shall be the harvest growth, the yielding of the whole,
Which the Twelve Angels brought from the Region of the Soul

This Star shines with the light of every martyred soul,
Of every lowly life unrecognised below;
While every genius pure, and prophet's radiant light,
Give form unto this Star, as downward flows its light.
It is the Dual Star of Wisdom and of Love;
Its perfect name is TRUTH, high in the Heavens above.
Its outward shimmerings, near the confines of the earth,
Are breathings from those friends who wake, into new birth,
Whate're is pure within. Follow, ye all, this light;
To others be ye stars; then will life's path grow bright,
And heaven's immortal peace your spirits will infill,
And Truth, your amulet, will guard you from all ill!

BENEDICTION.

(May the Dual perfect Light of the Star of God's perfect Truth, ever wise and ever loving, be your constant Guide through Time and your Crown Eternally!)

V.

RESURRECTIONS:
THEIR SPIRIT AND THEIR LETTER.

(Delivered on Easter Sunday, April 13, 1884.)

THE Gospel Stories of the Resurrection, have been so often read and commented upon, that, perhaps, little fresh matter may be added in this Discourse, to what you have heard already. Nevertheless, as festival and holiday occasions bring many strangers to our gatherings, as well as our regular attendants, we feel that we may be speaking to some in the present audience, to whom what we have to say may place the matter of the Resurrection from the Dead in quite a new, and we hope a helpful, light.

The doctrine of the resuscitation of the physical body at the last Great Day, the Day of Judgment or final account, looked forward to with trembling hopes and fears by all the nations of the world, from times immemorial, we need scarcely remind you is by no means new, i.e., it did not originate with Christianity or any developments of Christianity, and few, indeed, if any, are the Christian dogmas, which in their traceable origin do not antedate the year 1 of the Christian era, by several thousands of years.

The Book of the Dead, which conveys, perhaps, more definite information concerning the religious beliefs of the ancient Egyptians than any other accessible document, distinctly unfolds the idea of a physical resurrection in the future, very similar to that looked forward to by Christians. The Egyptians were all believers in the immortality of the soul, but differed among themselves, even as the Jews afterwards differed concerning the fate of the body.

Pharisean and Sadducean views of immortality, were at variance as regards the resurrection only. All the Jews, who accepted the Talmud as in any way authoritative, were believers in the immortality of the soul; and though Moses made the earth the centre of moral gravity for man, so long as he dwelt upon it, the best Rabbinical interpretations of the Hebrew Law coincided perfectly with the universal faith of Orientals, in the immortality of the Breath of God in man, as the Soul is ever called by the Hebrews.

No one, reading the Gospel narratives, can fail to be struck with the animosity existing between Pharisee and Sadducee, on this very question of the Resurrection. Some commentators have called the Sadducees sceptics, and even infidels, but they were as good Theists as were the Pharisees: they disagreed only in the peculiar views they took of the fate of the body after death.

Sadducean conceptions of immortality and a future state, are more spiritual than Pharisean ones, as the latter bow blindly before a shrine of dust, and look forward to a perpetuation throughout eternity of the limitations of time and sense; while the former contemplate the spirit as entirely distinct from the body, and see no need of a carnal resurrection from the dead.

The Egyptians, from whom the Pharisees, no doubt, originally derived their ideas, were those who considered the embalming of the body a work of the utmost importance. All distinguished persons were so embalmed, that they might last for thousands of years before their bodily assumption into heaven, were the judgment delayed so long. There are mummies now in the British Museum which go to prove to every Egyptologist, that this looking forward to a physical resurrection was one of the greatest hopes and most noteworthy peculiarities of the materialistic side of the Egyptian religion. Some there were indeed among the Egyptians, who so confounded the real man with his physical nature, that those were not lacking to teach the inseparability of existence from the outward frame. Three forms or degrees of embalming were devised; and it was supposed by some that immediately the body crumbled into dust, the individuality of its former occupant was destroyed also. No one can listen to some Christian sermons preached to-day, avowedly in defence of immortality, without tracing a close resemblance to the most materialistic thought of ancient Egypt, if he knows anything of the nature of that thought; while even spiritual communications concerning the future of man, can scarcely be said to transcend the sublimest and most interior thought of the enlightened Egyptians of old.

Regularly, at Easter-tide, the Church arrays herself in her brightest garb, sings her sweetest songs, decks her altars and her priests in sumptuous array, and calls all the world to worship at the feet of the Resurrected Jesus; while in the glad Spring-time all nature invites the world to witness those stupendous transformations of scenery, which by their annual and orderly occurrence point the worshipper at the shrines of nature only, to that Supreme, revivifying Force in being, which only allows death to prey for awhile upon the beauties of the world, soon resurrecting them by the power of the Spirit working through the agency of what is popularly called "natural law;" till with each succeeding spring-time, the world has advanced yet nearer to that glorious Golden Age, or millennial period, so long foretold and so eagerly sought for by poet, seer, and prophet, in every age and clime.

(It was Thomas Paine who said, that a contemplation of Nature led not to Atheism but to Deism; and in Deism this brave reformer found what he called a positive and absolute antidote to Atheism. On the one hand regarded as the champion of infidelity by many Materialists; on the other, execrated by theological bigots because of his determination to cut loose from all theological restraints, this man—great writer, fluent speaker, and able politician, though he was—has been perhaps more misunderstood and maligned than almost any writer or agitator of modern times. Read his voluminous articles, peruse them carefully, criticise them fairly, and you will find in the teachings of the author of "The Age of Reason," some of the soundest and most natural Theistic arguments ever presented to the world. We do not wish you to understand us to agree with every rabid criticism made by Paine; his language is often excessively severe, and his conclusions oftentimes faulty and extremely external. Nevertheless, with all his defects he has marked an era in the history of literature and government, and when styled the Author-hero of American Independence, by an eminent American Statesman and man of letters, his praises were not too loudly sung.)

Turn to France, and the France of to-day—nominally and enthusiastically republican, yet with many seeds of monarchy still remaining—is turning from the Church with its ceremonies and its priesthood, to the acknowledgment of no other Deity than the God revealed through nature; whose words are spoken in the roar of the ocean, in the peal of the thunder, in the murmuring streams, in the babbling brooks, in the voices of birds, and most of all in the intuitions of humanity. And if to crown the meed of Revelation accorded through these strictly natural messengers, there shall come a direct voice from the Realm of Spirit, speaking through the prophets and prophetesses of the approaching new Spiritual Dispensation, France is ready to lend the listening ear, and to receive the new angels gladly.

But the power of the Roman Hierarchy has waned, and waned for ever, across the Channel. The magnificent ritual and music at Notre Dame, and the hundred other magnificent churches, where the ceremonies vie with those of Rome itself, all fail to captivate the masses of the people, as of yore. The Church is as vigilant as ever, but the love of the people is surely drifting into other channels. What shall those channels be? Who shall carve them out? Who shall direct the spirit of the new nation into the grooves of harmony and purity? Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, are three great words, and these are the watchwords of the new French Republic; but who shall translate them into the language of daily life? Who shall give to the French nation a word signifying Home? Who shall so change the tide of religious and social life, that the country shall be born anew into more than its ancient glories? Neither the Army nor the Fleet can accomplish this new birth.

(Your standing regiments of idle men, here and abroad, are a standing disgrace, not an honour to the nation which supports them. And in Germany, where every boy must enter the army and be qualified to take up arms for his country in time of war, are the morals of the land any better than with your Gallic neighbours?) In Germany neither Catholicism, Lutheranism, Calvinism, nor Judaism can control the masses. Religion there is at a greater discount even than here. Kant, Strauss, Fichte, Goethe, and a hundred other illustrious minds, have taught the Teutonic race to think for themselves. (But to what does Free-thought lead? Is it a desideratum, if it leads only to scepticism and a denial of everything, save what can be apprehended by the five senses of the body?)

How is it with Italy? Garibaldi may have freed the country technically. The Papal Dominions have long since been ceded to the Crown, and the Pope is now little better than a prisoner in the Vatican, supported by donations from England and America, while the Church is in ill-odour with the multitude.

(What of Russia, where Absolutism prevails, and Nihilism also; where the Czar is nominally supreme, and yet in peril every moment. The Russian Church is powerless to stem the tide of growing discontent; while here in England, dynamite outrages make the lives of many a daily terror; while Parliament dilly-dallies with the greatest questions of the day, and spends session after session in needless comment upon trifles.)

The one word which every true prophet and reformer must emphasize to-day all over Europe is Renaissance! and that means New Birth. You have had Ruskin endeavouring to bring about a renaissance in Art; you have had an attempted æstheticism caricatured in "Punch," and represented by Oscar Wilde; but renaissance is more than a resuscitation of pre-Raphaelite eccentricities, or even excellencies. The world is not a crab, for ever completing series after series of retrospective movements, in order to make onward progress. (Forward, not backward, is the cry of the prophet. Not with Ritualism to restore the Church to what it was before the Reformation; not with Æstheticism to restore the world to what it was in mediæval times; but with Modern Spiritualism, when divested of the puerilities and superstitions which are still unfortunately attached to it, will the true prophet ever throw in his lot, advancing boldly and bravely over the crumbling ruins of effete dynasties and exploded fallacies, over the wreck of Superstition's altars and those of dread, to where the angel in every household shall attest the fact of immortal being, and death shall be indeed robbed of all its sting, the grave despoiled of all its seeming victory.)

O Death! where is thy sting? O Grave! where is thy victory? Surely in the worship of Mammon, which has blinded the eyes of mankind, that the spirit is as though it were not, and the future seems to hold nought but oblivion and silence forever. Why are the joy-bells pealing forth their clarion notes to-day? Why have multitudes of worshippers and sightseers assembled in all the great temples of religion throughout the Christian world to-day? Surely the occasion is one of great joy! What good news has the preacher to tell, as he mounts the pulpit stairs and addresses that vast concourse of human beings? Some in his audience have come from far, for words of comfort; some have but yesterday consigned all that was earthly of their best beloved to the tomb; some have come, like the women in the Gospels, to anoint the inanimate forms of their beloved dead, with the sweetest spices they can procure,—the heavy sigh, the scalding tear, the simple flower laid upon the grave, the heartfelt prayer uttered or unexpressed,—all are noted by the angels; and though the preachers shall tell you the angels who came to the women at the sepulchre of Jesus, nearyl nineteen centuries ago, have gone away into heaven, and from thence appear on earth no more, still those brooding angels may smile, nay, perhaps, oftener weep, at the materiality of Christendom, as the preacher ignores or derides Modern Spiritual Communion; as they are still here to whisper in dulcet tones the heart-consoling message into the mourner's ear: "Your friends are not in the grave; they are arisen, and they go with you as perpetual companions, as abiding comforters following your footsteps where'er your journey lies."

The facts of physiology have demonstrated the fallacy of a corporeal resurrection, and no comfort whatever can the soul derive from the thought of perpetual imprisonment in a form of clay. Matter may not be evil, the earth may not be a hell, but the true place for matter is in its perfect subordination to Spirit. The true use of earth is as a school. Do you wish to remain in a preparatory school for ever. If you have graduated from the lower, you go to the higher seminary. You may return to school for a while, if you have not yet learned all the lessons taught in that school, and longer need its discipline; but once you have gained all the knowledge to be imparted there, you can never return to it except as a teacher. We do not say spirits will never be re-embodied on the earth, either as scholars or teachers. If the need shall ever arise for future embodiment, the need will undoubtedly be supplied. But possible re-embodiment, though scouted by some even in the ranks of Spiritualism, must surely be far less dreadful to contemplate than that awful resurrection on the last great day, depicted by Young in ghastly verse; and when to the ghastliness of the scene you add the blasphemy therewith associated by many in the orthodox church,—we mean the resurrection of the wicked to everlasting torment—the dogma becomes so heinous, that to advocate it is far worse than to proclaim oneself an Atheist. Better let the cold ashes lie for ever inanimate in the tomb, than raise them only to throw them to the devil; better, far better, think of your friends as living again in the flowers and grasses which adorn your burying-places, than believe that even one spirit shall have its body raised again by God, that it may endure eternal anguish.)

We do not wonder at prevailing hatred of religion, if such travesty of the divine character has been allied with religion as popularly presented for fifteen centuries. But what says the New Testament, from which these hateful dogmas are avowedly deduced: "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me," These and many other texts need only to be quoted, they explain themselves. Redemption is as wide as the fall; if all fell in Adam then all will be raised in Christ. But there is no gospel which provides a resurrection or a saviour for a smaller number than the number which have fallen into sin. Take whatever view you will of Christ or Adam, literalize or spiritualize the legends of the Old, and the gospels and epistles of the New, Testament as you please, the fact remains, no more are lost than are restored, no more die than will be raised again; and surely no person, with one spark of humanity within him, can sing the Easter Anthem, praising God in his heart that half the human race will rise to everlasting shame and sorrow.

Great interest is manifested by many in the purely literal resurrection of Jesus, while to us the spiritual triumph is all that seems really important. Literally, there can be no identical resurrection of the body, the body being so mutable that it changes completely in an average period of seven years, and somewhat every moment. Waste and recuperation remodel your structures so often, that you really have no individuality apart from your spirit, which holds all there is of your real being. The body of Jesus, we are told, even by the most conservative in matters pertaining to religion, was a perfect human body. He assumed man's flesh. and was subject for thirty-three years to human limitations. Even the Athanasian Creed teaches this. How then can there be a physical resurrection of the identical body worn by Jesus during earthly life? His body as a man was not his body as an infant. He lived long enough to accumulate between four and five distinct bodies, and if a physical resurrection of the entire earthly body of Jesus were to take place, would it not be necessary to raise every particle of matter which had ever formed his body? If he ate, drank, slept and discharged all the natural functions common to human life, this resurrection was impossible; and, as an earnest of our own, were it possible, it would be worthless, as every tyro in science knows that the very food employed in upbuilding the physical structure, may be derived from the resurrected bodies of defunct ancestors.

If the body which is to rise at the judgment, is the identical body in which the spirit passed from earth, how sad the prospect of a resurrection which in many cases must be the resuscitation of an impaired and unlovely structure, from which the burdened spirit was only too happy to effect a hasty exit, at the hour of its dissolution.

If the raising of Lazarus, of the Widow's Son at Nain, or of the boy restored to life by Elijah, be cited as examples of resurrection, then immortality would be disproved rather than proved by such a doctrine, as we are nowhere led to infer that these resurrected bodies were immortalized. It may be said of them, as Frederick Robertson, the eminent incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, said of the resurrections of inanimate nature every spring-time: "They all die again." Only the spirit is immortal; only the soul lives for ever; and whensoever you predicate immortality upon what is mutable, you embark upon a sea of difficulty and doubt, which can logically carry you nowhere but into the howling wilderness of blank denial of all, save what is transitory and perishing.

The instances of resurrection from the dead, to which we have already alluded, are not parallel with anything other than the accounts often rendered of similar wonders having taken place in various Oriental countries, where interment often takes place almost immediately after the patient is thought to be dead, especially when he has been suffering from a contagious disorder, or plague is rife in a district. In the South of Italy, it is quite common for less than 24 hours to elapse between death and burial. In the Orient this space of time is considered ample, and it is needless to remind you, that not so far away from home, where interment is usually deferred much longer, persons have been buried in trances, and even robbers going to plunder new-made graves, have awakened the supposed corpses by cutting the jewellery from the persons of the apparently dead. In the case of Lazarus, who it is said had been dead four days, we are only told the bystanders said so. The remark, he has become offensive, was not made by Jesus. Utterly unconscious of all outward things he may have been; utterly beyond restoration by any ordinary means that could have been applied; dead to all but the voice and will of Jesus, who—endowed with almost superhuman affection and will, a personal friend of Lazarus and his family, one at whose feet the family was wont to sit, as the disciples of the Greek philosophers might have sat before Socrates or Plato—may have alone possessed the power to call him back to life; and remembering that the life of Jesus was was that of a rigid ascetic oftentimes; that he had undergone forty days in the wilderness, alone with wild beasts and evil spirits, and had conquered temptation in its three-fold forms before entering upon his public ministry as a teacher and a healer;—one who knows anything of the records of what is now popularly designated Theosophy, will have no difficulty in finding an explanation of wonderful phenomena, so soon as he compares it with the goal towards which all true Theosophists are striving, and the accredited testimony of those who have made Oriental Mysticism and Magic a life study.

To the Adept, or Initiate, the Gospel is not paradoxical. It simply illustrates in the person of the Evangelists' hero, the practical carrying out of the laws and principles laid down by the sages of the Orient. It is quite beside our subject this morning to institute comparisons between Buddhism, or any strictly Oriental system, and Christianity. To our minds Christianity is only a later development of older systems, a more recent flowering out of the tree of religions in the world. Constantinian Christianity, which has equalled Mohammedanism in its devotion to the sword as a means of propagandism, is certainly no part of the religion of the Nazarene.

The assumptions of orthodoxy, on the subject of the resurrection of Jesus, are nowhere supported by Matthew, Mark, Luke or John, who simply content themselves with recording, each in his own way, that Jesus appeared to his disciples after his death and burial, and satisfied them that it was he himself who communed with them; all agree that the body of Jesus was not in the tomb when the women went to seek it on the resurrection morn, and all alike speak of the difficulty, even his most intimate friends encountered, in recognising him when he appeared to them. He had been dead only since Friday afternoon; they had possibly seen him on Saturday, when he was interred; all his disciples had sat with him at supper on Thursday evening, and yet though he rose before daybreak on Sunday morning, they mistook him for the gardener; and even Mary had a long conversation with him before she knew him, and she was last at the cross and first at the tomb. Would you forget the appearance of a friend in one, two, or three days? Would you need your friend to speak your name in some peculiar way, that you might know him, if he stood before you in the identical body in which he died so recently? It was only after Jesus had called Mary by her name, in the old familiar way, that she turned to him and said, Rabboni. Then, on the same day at evening, when two disciples were journeying to Emmaus, we are told Jesus met them on the way, and expounded Moses and the Prophets to them, and yet they did not know him till they had persuaded him to sup with them, and then he made himself known in the breaking of bread. True, we are told he made himself so visible to Thomas that the doubting apostle thrust his hands into the wound-prints, and believed, when he had material evidence that a solid body stood before him. But such occurrences as these, coupled with the statement often made, "he vanished out of their sight," show these manifestations to have been far more closely akin to modern Spiritual Phenomena than to any alleged corporeal resurrection, as taught by the orthodox.

Materialization has been the means of convincing hundreds, not to say thousands, of the precious fact that their beloved, miscalled dead, are yet alive. The triumphant spirit of Jesus may have disintegrated the material form, and thereby rendered it invisible. When on the cross, he exclaimed: "It is finished!" may he not have alluded to the completion of his earth experiences, and the final victory over matter he had won? The disintegration of a material body offers no insuperable obstacle to the chemist, who discourses glibly enough upon volatilization and etherealization of substance, by processes known to chemistry. Who is there of note in the scientific world, who refuses to call man's body an agglomeration of molecules? Who is there who dissents from the atomic theory? All scientific discoveries prove that it is within the power of man, under given conditions, to render visible things invisible, and invisible visible. The conversion of solids and fluids into gases, is a triumph of human intelligence. The consolidation of atmospheric particles into solid form, and the dematerialization of forms so constructed in the chemist's laboratory, is a simple triumph of mind over matter. And where shall these triumphs end? Who shall say to the human will: "Thus far thou canst go, but no further!" As well might Canute's flatterers attempt to persuade him he could control the ocean tides, as for modern Agnostics to persuade the rational Spiritualist that materialization is impossible. The philosophy of the subject is natural and scientific. Its applicability to individual phenomena must, of course, be decided by the amount of evidence granted at a specified time, and in a certain place. The Acts of the Apostles tell us, Jesus was seen by about 500 brethren at once, and inform us also that Saul saw Jesus on his way to Damascus; and yet Paul says after the flesh he has not seen Christ, but in the spirit only. He it is who declares there is a natural (animal) and there is a spiritual body; that flesh and blood cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven; though Jesus was seen in heaven by the martyr Stephen, and Paul was caught up to the third heaven by power divine.

The Resurrection is surely the complete and final victory of the soul over sense; and whensoever and wheresoever your own lower nature is entirely the servant of your spirit, you will have the freedom to come and go in ways at present utterly beyond your ken. The risen life, we are all implored to live, is not a life in which the animal body clogs the spirit for eternity; but life's conflict ended, the battle fought, the victory won, the soul governs matter where once it was ruled by it, and when a needed manifestation is vouchsafed, immortality is demonstrated by the power of Spirit over all material things.

No soul can die; no thought can perish; no good become extinct. Immortal is every pure desire; immortal the results of every noble effort. Only the outward form may perish; only the vesture change; while the soul, without beginning, knows no end, and at length arrives at its true Home, where life is a pæan of praise to the Infinite; a psalm of joy; a constant well-spring of happiness and bliss to all the universe.

Conquer Sense by your own Spirit, and the Resurrection, with all its glories, is yours for aye!

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE TWIN ANGELS.

BEHOLD! How all things die!
Death's cold and icy hand upon the flowers is laid—
They perish in their very bloom: Are they of death afraid?
Perchance they may be; still it seems to spirit's watchful eyes,
They only fall asleep to wake again at glad sunrise.

Behold, how forest glories fade! The trees grow sad and bare,
The cold wind whistles where the leaves once so abundant, fair,
Clothed the drear bark with verdant hue, thro' all the summer time;
But winter's cold and icy breath shears all in northern clime.

Somewhere, far off across the seas, the trees are always green,
The flowers never fade away, all things are decked in sheen,
Impervious to the hand of death, it seems to him who strays
Thro' orange groves, on isles of spice; but there the savage lays
In wait, and the tiger and serpent are there,
So of those fair groves ye must needs beware.

But 'tis in those fair tropic lands, the withering power of death
Is felt more quickly, than where your cheeks are fanned with the icy breath
Of the North-East winds from the Baltic Seas, and the frozen zone afar,
Where ye think ye can find the brain of the earth, and the mystic Polar Star.

Life feeds on death, and wheresoe'er life's table is thickest spread
With daintiest viands and beverage, whereon gods might be fed,
It is there Transition's Angel takes the fullest, broadest rule,
And this veiled angel—Oh! what is she, but a Teacher in Nature's School.

In the far-off ages, so long ago that ye needs must turn to the rocks,
And hear them tell of the direful storms and terrific earthquake shocks,
Which rent the crust of the planet of yore, before man his place could take,
As head of creation; 'twas then and there, in some dark and distant place,
That the Spirit of God in the storm-wind moaned, and in thunder's awful din, Prepared the way for the Age of Gold, which e'en now doth but scarce begin!

O beautiful Angel! whom men most dread: Why should we turn from thee,
And veil our faces with trembling hands, when thou offerest liberty,
To the captive spirit imprisoned here,
That sighs and prays for a brighter sphere?

But, mystical Angel! thou'rt not alone, or we might be afraid of thee;
Thou hast a fair Sister, arrayed with flowers, and with all the springtide's glee,
And her name is not Death, but Renewal of Life! she the Resurrection brings,
Fair Goddess of Spring, of the opening flowers, of the bird that most sweetly sings.
Were it not for thy veiled handmaid, Death, thine herald, we ne'er could know thee;
The sweets of reunion were never felt, if bereavements could not be.

O beautiful Angel of Life Renewed! by the sepulchre sit to-day;
To the weeping mourners, who come to grieve, and over their dead to pray,
Reveal, as thou didst in the olden time, the life which the Spirit doth know,
Say softly to every sorrowing heart: "Not dead but arisen!" Then go
And point to the Life, which all may share,
When Love conquers Strife and Sin everywhere!

BENEDICTION.

May the Angels of the Resurrection bring you all glad tidings of Life Immortal, and reveal to you the Father's boundless Love to all His Children.

VI.

RELIGIOUS TRUTHS AND CONTROVERSIAL THEOLOGIES.

THE attention of the World has perhaps never been more extensively called to the study of Comparative Theology than at the present moment, when this somewhat new science, with its kindred science, also a novelty, Comparative Philology, is arresting the serious attention of all classes of minds, scholars especially.

Until within the past half century the prevailing thought in Christendom was that all the inhabitants of the world, excepting Christians and Jews, were idolaters, bowing down to images of wood and stone, and believing these poor idols to be the supreme powers who governed and guided the universe. When occasionally a Unitarian, or an extremely Broad Churchman within the pale of the Establishment, undertook to say a kind word for the great religions of the world, far more ancient and widely spread than Christianity, he was denounced as a heresiarch or a blasphemer; as it has ever been the policy of professing Christians to claim for their own system a monopoly of truth, and for Christian countries a monopoly of civilization. Christians, it is true, are not singular in this, as it is customary for all partisans to exaggerate the excellence of their favourite institutions, while they persistently decry all others. But party feeling is not an element of true religion, neither has it any foundation in what is popularly termed the Gospel of Christ.

Let us spend a few moments to-day in considering the true origin and nature of Religion, and its relation to controversial theologies, always remembering that Theology is or ought to be a true science; as the word means the Science of God, or divine things; as Geology means the science of the earth, and Philology the science of language.

Many of the fiercest disputes between theologians have hinged upon the interpretation given to the logos, or Word, introduced to our notice not only by the author of the fourth

Gospel, at its commencement, but earlier by Plato, who discourses frequently and sublimely upon it. It is noticeable to even the most cursory student of language, that the termination only varies when the logos is changed into "logy"; and that these "ologies," about which we hear so much to-day, all spring from the identification of science, knowledge, treatise, word, &c., with the logos of the philosophers.

It is needless to state that "science" means knowledge, and that without definite and demonstrable information concerning a certain subject, there can be no science of that subject. If Geology and Philology are sciences, must not Theology also be regarded as a science, and must it not be the province of all true theologians to speculate no longer, but to commence with the demonstration of spiritual truth to the comprehension of their pupils, as far as may be? We beg you to bear in mind, however, that no abstruse mathematical problem, for instance, can ever be demonstrated to those who have no knowledge of mathematics, and no capabilities for succeeding in a study of mathematical laws and principles. Not every brain is a mathematical brain, as not every brain is adapted to classical studies. It is frequently remarked, the best Classic is the poorest Mathematician, and vice versa. University men usually excel either in one branch of study or the other, but not usually in both, and this not because of any opposition between Classics and Mathematics, but rather by reason of the fact that excessive cultivation of certain organs of the brain, has a natural tendency to induce depression in other directions.

No one who devotes himself to Pugilism is likely to become a great intellectual luminary. No one who follows warfare as a profession, and loves cruel sport, is apt to be a great expert at the peaceful arts, because of the inflammation of certain propensities, tending naturally to attract the forces of the brain to particular points, as centres which absorb more than their due allowance of the universal energy, which becomes focalized at these points, and from them rather than from other points in the organism, it is most extensively thrown out to the world.

No one in his right mind endeavours to limit knowledge by his personal attainment; no one but an idiot will be found to deny the existence of every thing which is not included within the narrow compass of what he has individually realized. The realm of sound is an unknown and utterly untrodden realm to the man who was born deaf, and if you ask him to give a definition of sound, as he fancies sound to exist, he must compare it to something he can approach through one of the four avenues of sense which are not closed to him: but you cannot accurately describe a noise by comparing it to anything which can be tasted, felt, seen, or smelt. and yet the deaf man who sees, tastes, feels, and smells, but does not hear, is obliged to compare sound in imagination with something his own perceptions have enabled him to apprehend; while the blind man, who compares scarlet in his own mind with a very loud noise, is equally at sea so far as correct apprehension goes, though in another direction.

The spiritual nature of man, to those destitute of spiritual perception, is necessarily an algebraic x, an unknown quantity: yea, it is to some more, or rather less than this: it is an unthinkable condition of being, as much so as Zöllner's Fourth Dimension in space is to a majority who have read his decidedly clever work, "Transcendental Physics."

Can there not be a fourth dimension in space? Certainly there can, says the eminent Leipzic Professor; but we, as three dimensional beings, cannot realize it, and had we only two dimensions ourselves, the thought of a third would be equally impracticable.

We all measure the universe by such measuring rods as we can devise and handle. We can sound no ocean without a plummet line, and thus the facts of existence by the majority of writers and speakers, are so superficially and impertinently dealt with, that a minimum of human knowledge is nearly always at a premium, and a maximum at a decided discount. Nothing can be more puerile and contradictory than materialistic negation. When those who are studying the facts of nature from their material side, bring us facts, we gladly accept them, and are willing to bow before any teacher, even though the sum of his knowledge be expressed in a treatise upon the habits of earth-worms, provided his knowledge of these lowly creatures is greater than our own. But should any professor of science undertake to blot out all the facts of nature, with which he is personally unacquainted, just because there are limits to his knowledge and powers of discovery, we should decline to regard him as any authority at all on matters concerning which he had at first the good sense to confess himself ignorant.

There can be no science of Agnosticism, no philosophy of ignorance, no text-books to explain to students the nature of non-existence. All scientific declarations are strictly affirmative. We could never know that 2×2 were not 5, unless we did know that they made 4. The knowledge that something is what it is, precludes all possibility of our thinking it may be what it is not. But where knowledge ceases and ignorance begins, science is necessarily cut short in her career.

From the earliest times there have been those on earth who admitted Theology into the category of their studies, and perhaps the most ancient Religion known to men, was that which is popularly termed Astro-Theology. The Astro-Theological system of Hindostan, Egypt, and other ancient Oriental climes, was so stupendous, and moreover so deeply spiritual, so intensely esoteric, that very few modern Egyptologists have done any more than just touch the outer fringe of the garment worn by religious truth in the olden days.)

Recently, a long series of consecutive papers have been published in the Medium and Daybreak, a London Spiritualistic Journal, the substance of which their author, Wm. Oxley, has just brought out in book form. Associated with these papers there has waged what has been termed a "Theological Conflict," in the same paper, extending over many weeks. In this conflict an attempt has been made to show, on the one hand, that Christianity is only a later development of the religion of Egypt, and on the other, that Jesus of Nazareth was a veritable personage, a great historical character, and the real as well as the alleged founder of the Christian religion. (The conflict has been on the whole well conducted, though in our opinion personal feelings mar almost every controversy most seriously, and because of this conviction we usually decline to enter into discussion or debate with any one, either by lip or pen.

In a debate each party has a client, each takes a position he feels bound to sustain, and the result usually is a pitched battle between two opponents, or two diametrically opposite classes of ideas, which are defended on both sides with heated partisan effrontery. In the presentation of what you feel to be truth to the world, it is better never to act and speak as though you had an enemy to attack or an opponent to silence Those lectures which give one the idea of having been given simply to answer somebody, are not as a rule most effective spiritually. Clear, impersonal argument, free from all suggestion that your audience necessarily disagrees with you, is far more likely to reach the intellect and sympathies of your auditors than any amount of aggressive reasoning, however logical.

We were once present at a banquet, where a number of distinguished orators had collected. One among the number was a man of fine commanding presence, bold eagle eye, lofty brow, possessed of an unusually large amount both of brain power and psychologic influence. His voice was loud and stirring, and could be heard at the farthest corner of a larger building than the Metropolitan Tabernacle. This fine, imperious, noble-looking fellow, with an immense amount of self-satisfaction, said: "I always go to battle, to fight the foe, when I ascend the platform. My auditors are my enemies, my tongue is my arrow, with which I pierce them to the quick. They fear me, they know they cannot resist my words, for I speak as one having authority. I never permit myself to address an assembly until my quiver is full of the sharpest arrows. I fortify myself with unanswerable reasons for all I advance, and I challenge the dissentient from my conclusions, to establish the fallacy of a single point in my argument."

When this celebrated orator had resumed his seat, an old, trembling man rose to his feet. With feeble voice, and snow-white locks, and tottering limbs he faltered forth his tribute to the power of speech. With winning smile and in kindly tones, utterly destitute of pride or hauteur, he said: "My friends,—I know you are such, and whenever I address a company, large or small, savage or civilized, I address my friends, and those whom I address know that I wish to be a friend to every one present. I have been in many lands, and spoken to many singular assemblies, but never to a hostile one. I have no enemies, as I feel no animosity toward any. I know I am not highly gifted, but God has used me—poor, imperfect creature though I am—to comfort some of his sorrowing children, and that is my mission to humanity, to try and be a comforter."

While the venerable man was speaking, tears were in many eyes. No heart in the room could have been untouched by his few simple words. Out of the abundance of his kindly heart, his mouth spake words of tender sympathy, and every one who heard him, knew he spoke from his own pure soul, and so he reached the souls of all whom he addressed. (The eloquent orator, the erudite scholar, the haughty priest, the crafty barrister,—all may wield an influence, but the influence of love is the only sovereign antidote to the innumerable ills which afflict society.)

How was it with these two speakers? The former had twenty times the learning of the latter; the latter had a hundred times more feeling than the former; the one hammered away at dry statistics, read genealogical tables from beginning to end, consulted authorities innumerable to fortify his position, and when he had established it, all he could prove was some unimportant fact of literal history. The aged man could never have competed successfully with the younger in scholarly attainments, and yet all who listened to them both said of the one: "He is a great orator, a smart, clever, well-read man; he pleads his cause finely, but after all we can't decide until we've heard what can be said by his opponent." Those who had listened to the saintly veteran, exclaimed: "We know he tells the truth, for we have the witness in ourselves; he heals our wounds, he ends our doubts, he dislodges our fears, he shows us light on the darkest pathway, and therefore we are assured he is sent by God, for he opens up our understandings, he silences our fears, and he makes us loathe our sins and deal justly by our neighbours."

We have cited this narrative, culled from our own experience, to illustrate our theme, as we feel it needs illustration in this day. When everything is being shaken, even to its foundations, it behoves all to see to the foundations, whether they be secure or insecure. (Controversy may wage till everything historical is disputed; and there are those who declare that Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism, and all the great systems of the world, are built on sand, and are themselves mere mythologies. The personality of Jesus is denied, so is that of Buddha. The Old and New Testaments are discounted as fabrications of the priesthood, or regarded as Kabalistic treatises upon the Solar Mythos. Osiris and Jesus are said to be the same, and both are said to be the material

sun. The disciples of Christ are said to be the twelve Zodiacal signs, while the Holy Spirit can be only solar light or heat.

The glowing symbolism of the East undoubtedly points to astronomical and astrological principles and facts. Mathematics and Geometry unquestionably must be called in to solve the problem of the Pyramid, and decipher the riddle of the Sphinx; while it is self-evident to us, that material science in the olden time was in the keeping of a learned and initiated minority, while the multitude were destitute of all such information as the priests possessed. As Egypt is the centre around which present controversies revolve, and as it is to Egypt that the thought of all Europe is turned to-day, politically and religiously, by reason of the present war, and the appearance of the Mahdi, it may be well for us to offer a few remarks upon that land and its antiquities, in so far as they throw light upon the subject immediately before us.

How old the Great Pyramid may be, is not decided. Professor Smyth, Astronomer Royal of Scotland, long ago fixed the date of its construction at 2,170 B.C., and by many ingenious interpretations endeavoured to foretell the second coming of Christ, as probable soon after 1881 A.D. It is true that Professor Smyth's predictions have not yet failed, because he takes into consideration, the narrow passage-way connecting the Grand Gallery with the King's Chamber, and as this measures at the least something over fifty inches in length, and each inch is said to represent a year, there is yet, even now, ample time for the fulfilment of the Professor's expectations, and even now may be the time of war and danger, prefigured by the narrow passage already mentioned. But as those of the school of Dupuis are too external on the one hand, so are Christian apologists apt to be too literal also, though in another direction, in that, while the Materialist sees only the letter of the allegory, the Christian often loses sight of principles in personalities, and limits all manifestations of truth to a single outpouring of the Spirit, once for all, in Palestine, through Jesus of Nazareth, at the commencement of the Christian era.

Professor Smyth has very forcibly called the attention of the reading world, to the suggestive fact of the site of the Grand Pyramid being truly central. It is stated that this is on middle ground absolutely, and that such central position

(the very centre of all the land upon the globe) could not have been chosen accidentally, especially at a time when knowledge was not ripe as to-day. It is further stated that this Pyramid pointed, at the time of its construction, directly to Alcyone, the far-distant star or sun around which the sun of this system accomplishes a period of revolution once in every Grand Cycle, and that the star alpha draconis (the polar star 4,000 years ago) shone directly down the shaft of the Pyramid, at the time of its erection.

Ignoring the celebrated wisdom of the Ancients, the Christian apologist traces the facts just referred to directly to deific inspiration, claiming that God himself must have been the architect and inspirer of this temple to his honour, in the land of Egypt; and as this Pyramid is frequently alluded to (though vaguely to the uninitiated) in the Old Testament, proof positive is supposed to be forthcoming of the authenticity and prophetic, as well as historic, accuracy of the Scriptures, when the mystery of the Pyramid shall be fully comprehended.

Without denying the prophetic character of the several books of the Old Testament, or derogating one iota from the dignity of Jesus as a Messiah, and a fulfiller of prophecy, it is quite possible to interpret the central wonder of ancient and modern Egypt, more universally than above; but to do so requires an amount of knowledge not ordinarily within the grasp of the Christian minister, who is taught to bend every fact concerning the ancient world, until it serves to establish the miraculous origin of Judaism and Christianity, and the purely human origin of all other systems.

What the Christian and the Jew are wont to say of Brahmanism and Buddhism, that the Brahman and Buddhist are equally apt to say of Judaism and Christianity, the view taken of Mohammed by Christians, is substantially the view taken of Jesus by Mohammedans and Jews; and where, we ask, is the logic or evidence to prove the divinity of one or two systems of religion, and the purely human character of all the rest? If God spoke to Moses, to Abraham, and to Melchisedek, why should he not have spoken to others not mentioned on the Hebrew scroll, but regarded with veneration as divine messengers by hundreds of millions of Orientals? Christianity and Judaism together do not embrace one quarter of the inhabitants of the globe, while the Oriental faith is shared by a much larger number. The spread of Mohammedanism has been quite as wonderful as that of Christianity, and proselytism has been carried on by Mohammedan missionaries in many instances quite as fairly as by Christian embassies.

Mohammedanism is spurned by many, and rightly, because it debases woman, keeping her veiled and in subjection to her lord throughout her lifetime, while it substitutes the harem for the home, and esteems voluptuousness as compatible with the loftiest spiritual exaltation. But, in Christian lands, has not woman been abased? Is she not to-day shut out from public offices, though taxed equally with man for all property she has earned or may have inherited? Has not woman been denied access to your halls of learning and your pulpits, until very recently, when she has been admitted to equality with man under protest; and has it not been that very church which adores woman in the person of the "Immaculate mother of God, the Virgin Mary," which has banished woman utterly from the priesthood, and declared that Paul's severest words on feminine subjection are none too strong? Though all over Europe in Christian lands the Virgin is adored, sometimes it appears to the exclusion of her Son, still outside the gates of all ecclesiastical and civil places of power, woman must stand knocking vainly for admittance, until the liberating hand of Republicanism, Free-thought, or Spiritualism shall open the long-closed doors to her, and admit her equally with her brothers to every place of rank and power and glory.)

The most ancient symbol of Egypt is the Circle, expressive of the absolute unity of the Divine Mind, and of all Nature. The spherical form is that of worlds perfected, and is the one form presented to you as symbolizing the perfection of unitary life in the Heavens. This form, most perfectly portrayed to the gaze of the ancient savans, in the sun Alcyone, was the accepted symbol of Deity, over all the land of Egypt, while the emblems of immortality were all closely allied. Among these, the serpent with its tail in its mouth was not infrequent. The most distant sphere known to be a sun was considered the highest expression of divine life discernible by man, and it was to the spiritual life there made manifest, and not to the matter of which the outer form of worlds is composed, that the ancients paid their homage. The ineffable centre of life was regarded as a central sun, while to this system of worlds the sun, which is the centre of this system, symbolled and expressed the ruler of the system spiritually.

Believing, as did the ancient astrologers and astronomers, in the inhabited condition of all worlds in space at some period of their history, much maligned and misrepresented though astrology has been and still is, the original astrological theory was in effect, that worlds all came into existence in the same way, were all governed by the same laws, all existed for the same purpose, all were intended to afford scope for the development of spiritual power, the ultimate attainment of the spirit being its exercise of complete dominion over all forms and forces of matter.

The angel who dwelt in the sun (Osiris) was not regarded as the Eternal Being, but as the angel or guardian of the solar system. This archangelic guardian of the earth, with Isis, his consort, was worshipped as the highest expression of Deity the human mind could directly contemplate, while under the direction of this supernal potentate, twelve angels were said to move, each having for his Kingdom one of the Signs of the Zodiac. It was further believed by the Egyptians, that the earth regularly passed from one spiritual dispensation to another, in an average period of from 2,150 to 2,200 years, and the completed cycle of the earth occupied a period of 25,840 years, or very nearly that space of time, it being universally conceded that the journey of the sun (the home of Osiris and Isis) around Alcyone, was accomplished in precisely the same amount of time required by the earth to complete the grand cycle of twelve Messianic Periods. At the culmination and commencement of each special spiritual period, it was always declared that some special angelic ministrations were vouchsafed to the earth, and from this recognition of periods (spiritual periods of seed-time and harvest), arose the doctrine of Avatars, Messiahs, and Incarnate Deities.

The Adam of the second chapter of Genesis, is considered by some as identical with Osiris, and also with Melchisedek, as he evidently refers to the most ancient Spiritual Messenger, of whom mention is made in the Jewish Kabala; and surely no one familiar with the story of the Exodus, can be surprised to hear that Judaism, considered religiously, is largely a derivation from the older Egyptian religion. The ornaments borrowed from the Egyptians by the Israelites, refer no doubt to ornaments and ceremonies, symbols and metaphors, which afterwards formed part of the Jewish forms of government and worship.

The oldest form of government known to man is Theocracy. All the governments of ancient Egypt were theocratic, as spiritual power was looked up to as the supreme qualification of rulers for the tenure of office. The civil rulers were always in subordination to the ecclesiastical. The prophets were the most highly esteemed of all, next in order came the priests, who were often members of royal families, royal personages being generally ordained priests. Sacerdotalism, in its darker aspects, was a far later development, and arose from the corruption of the prophetic and priestly office, when filled by selfish, designing men, who sought their own personal aggrandisement rather than the welfare of the people, on whose behalf they were expected to perform all their functions.

Free-masonry and Religion are so nearly allied, that the history of the one cannot be written without also writing the history of the other. Free-masonry, in its most modern form in Christian lands, has added many ornamental and external lodges, which appear to confine it to an advocacy of the Christian religion; but the Mason who regards his lodge as a kind of club or benefit society, who makes use of Masonry as a passport to favour at home and abroad, but who does not care for it except for financial reasons, social prestige, and its many collateral advantages, does not comprehend anything of the original scope of Masonry, which included a complete study of the occult sciences, and the practice of spiritual power.

The same terms may be employed in England to-day as in Egypt 6,000 years ago. The square may still form the base, the triangle may still be supported upon it; the three primal degrees of Masonry—Entered Apprentice, Fellow Craftsman, and Master Mason—may still be taken by all who enter the Blue Lodge, and are thenceforth regarded brother Masons by the fraternity in all parts of the globe. But it has been stated, and that truly, that there are not simply three, but nine, degrees which may be taken, and six of these degrees are beyond any height attained by the ordinary Past Grand Master. These degrees include the study and practice of Magic, and are acknowledged, even verbally, by none in modern society, save those who call themselves Theosophists, or profess to take extraordinary interest in the spiritual side of occult brotherhoods.

What does the ordinary man of the world, who is an external Mason, know more than others of Rosicrucian mysteries, of Eleusinian and Bacchic rites, and of the far-famed mysteries of Egypt and Asia? To him Magic is imposition, even Spiritualism is but an imposture, while the book of Daniel, the Apocalypse, and the Kabala are incomprehensible fables or absurdities. He is either a member of a Christian church or Jewish synagogue, dealing with the letter of Scripture only, or he is a sceptic, regarding all spiritual matters as superstition. But ancient Masonry, while it included all the external and collateral advantages attaching to modern Masonry, and was far more necessary then than now, was far wider in its scope and deeper in its purpose; as it constituted the brotherhood, which held together the learned and the inspired in all quarters of the globe.

The literati and illuminati, however, never disclosed the meaning of their secret rites and ceremonies to any outside their Orders, neither did the most ancient and powerful lodge of all, ever inscribe its secrets in hieroglyphics, all of which penetrate no deeper than the surface of the true wisdom of the ancients. Every so-called lost art, every science called modern, was known to the ancients. Plato speaking figuratively to the uninitiated, nevertheless, even to them discloses the fact of his acquaintance with the circulation of the blood; yet modern scientists attribute the discovery of this fact of human life to Harvey. Far away in Egypt, the builders of the Pyramid were fully conversant with the rotundity of the earth, and its spherical motions, though in modern times Galileo was condemned for divulging a tithe of this most ancient knowledge. Socrates quaffing the hemlock at Athens; the early Christians, who were Essenes and Gnostics, persecuted by fire and sword because they inveighed against heathen idolatries and attempted to unfold the "mystery of Godliness" to the world, are alike instances of the frantic endeavours made by interested parties, in times of corruption, to hold knowledge away from the people.

The modern priesthood includes those, whose knowledge is so superficial that they really know nothing of the "hidden wisdom" mentioned in the Epistles, and those also who know more than they think it wise or safe to divulge. The Pope's Encyclical against Free-masonry, is only a proof of the natural horror with which an arrogant hierarchy must always regard a rival secret power. The Church of Rome has its milk for babes and its strong meat for full-grown men. The Church never admits the laity into its inmost mysteries. but proclaims to them the Infallibility dogma, threatening them with excommunication in this world and everlasting punishment in the future state, if they heed not the voice of Peter's successor, who speaks with authority from heaven. But to-day this authority is questioned all over Europe, and that Protestant supremacy which has so long held sway, both in England and America, is also being rapidly set aside. The Church no longer has a monopoly of learning, therefore its influence is waning with the learned, while the working people are daily becoming more impatient of all restraint, and prefer even violent and suicidal revolutionary movements, to stagnation under the dominion of aggressive rulers.

The Logos or Divine Word, proclaimed as the Breath of God by Plato as well as by John, is that divine Spirit of Truth which the Hebrews traced to the time of Adam, the Messianic Messenger whose advent to the earth inaugurated the Dispensation prior to the Hebraic; that period of history in which Egypt passed through one of her exceptionally glorious cycles of dominion. Then the tide of inspiration flowed from the banks of the Nile to the Jordan; at the same time there arose in Asia, both Confucius,—the Chinese philosopher, whose mission was to the intellect of man more particularly,—and Sakya Muni Gautama, the Indian Prince, whose mission was to the spirit of mankind. These two great lights shone together, the influence of the philosopher blending with and merging into that tidal wave of thought, which gave to Greece its halcyon days of philosophic splendour, when Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, marked the full blossoming of the flowers of intellect, on the borders of the Hellenic seas.

Then came Jesus, not in the might and pride of intellect, but as Buddha came, with self-renunciation, humility, charity, the weapons of the Spirit only. His mission was to unfold the logos in every human breast, to glorify God's image in the human soul, not to maintain the rigour of Mosaism nor the intellectual speculations of philosophy, but to tell all mankind to worship the Father by deeds of loving-kindness to their brethren. In his Gospel, Love is the fulfilment of the Law. He asks not for your worship, he craves not your laudation, he asks only that you cultivate God's image in your heart. Thus controversy ends, and the practice of religion supplants all dogma; for he who loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, can never love the Eternal, who is invisible, and who asks nought at our hands but that we fulfil the royal law, and frame our lives after the pattern of the Golden Rule. Not Christ as a person, but Love as the ruling principle of life, must be accepted, or the world remains unsaved and unredeemed.

When standing armies are abolished, when vice and pauperism no longer abound, when the fallen are upraised by the hand of love, and the whole Race of Man is the object of your care, then, but not till then, will God's Kingdom have come on Earth; then, but not till then, will His Will be done on Earth as it is in Heaven!

IMPROMPTU POEM.

WHO AND WHAT IS CHRIST?

FAR off, in distant lands, in ages long gone by,
The Ancients thought they saw th' Eternal riding by
In solemn state, through heaven, whene'er the sun shone bright;
They worshipped at His shrine, and called it their delight
To build rich temples fair, in every Orient land,
Which might, through ceaseless years, in hoary grandeur stand,
To point the mystic road,
To Light's supreme abode.

On the banks of the mystic Nile, an ancient altar stands,
Built to the Solar God, with swift and dext'rous hands,
Pointing the way to heaven, when its apex, crowned with light,
Is twice a-year adorned, when there's equal day and night.

To the Angel of the Sun, Osiris, who doth hide
Half of his heavenly form in Isis, his veiled bride:
And to Horus, the Child Divine, the Egyptians honour paid,
While their costliest works of art, were on such altars laid.

'Twas in depth of winter time, when the days had shortest grown,
When the breath of summer flowers and singing birds had flown,
They appointed a solemn feast, on the birth of a glad New Year,
To celebrate deliverance from cold and death and fear.

It was then that the Ancients traced the Saviour of Man, who, laid
Three days in the cold, dark tomb, was then re-born, arrayed
In the resurrection robes of the lengthening light of day,
While the spirits who ruled the night, were conquered and fled away.

'Twas then that Virgo appeared with Bootes at her side,
Standing as though far off, watching his radiant bride;
While Capricornus, the Goat, was the Zodiacal Sign
'Neath which, in the stable of earth, must be laid the new Child Divine.

It was afterwards, far, far away from the haunts of the men of old,
There appeared on the earth the sign which the Ancients had long foretold:
The five-pointed Star, whose light led the Magi from Persia, to where Mary, the Jewish maid, must a child in virginity bear.

But the virgin need only be pure, free from guile, full of wisdom and love,
For motherhood may be divine, when sanctioned by light from above;
And the Teacher, who came to the West, was the Star which Confucius foretold,
When he spake of its bright Western beams, its radiance of heavenly gold.

But was one form on earth all God's Sons? Has the Father in Heaven one child—
But one only? who spoke to the earth, in Judea, with tones so mild
Yet so thrilling, that multitudes heard and acknowledged his spiritual sway,
Though the rulers and priests hound to death, he who revealeth the perfect way.

The Christ must be ever within, a Sun of Righteousness to shine,
God's image within the Soul, pronouncing man's life divine,
As the Logos, the breathing Word, the Will, and the Light, and the Way,
And the Truth, that must lead you to God at length, howe'er widely ye stray.

Whensoever the Spirit of Truth, Loving-kindness, or Charity sweet, Shall pervade all your hearts and your minds, then the Christ in your hearts will ye greet;
And it matters not where be the shrine, or what be the phrase ye employ,
In fellowship, loving mankind, ye find Christ, and God's Kingdom of joy.

BENEDICTION.

May the Light of God's Perfect Truth so illume your minds while here ye rove, that Heavenly Peace may fill your hearts, and give you some blessed foretaste of Eternal Joy.—AMEN.

VII.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RE-EMBODIMENT.

BY special request of a gentleman here present, and also in compliance with the urgent and often-expressed wishes of other friends, we have taken for our subject this afternoon, "THE PHILOSOPHY OF RE-INCARNATION," or, to speak more correctly, we must say RE-EMBODIMENT, as incarnation and re-incarnation are words scarcely fitted to express the thoughts we wish to convey concerning the human spirit and its manifestations through earthly organisms. Incarnation means to be made flesh, re-incarnation to be made flesh over again; but as the soul never becomes material, as the spirit is never converted into matter, there can be really no incarnations and no re-incarnations, though embodiments of spirit may be numerous and successive, so long as an earthly form is calculated to afford the spirit means for the unfoldment and exercise of its latent talents.

We know there are some persons who are so averse to the theory of a plurality of terrestrial existences for the same spirit, that they become angry and abusive if the question of re-embodiment is only mooted in their hearing. For all such we are sorry, but it is not our province to blame them nor to call them by the hard names they apply to others. Truth is its own apology for being, it cannot be obliterated in support of any theory whatsoever, it refuses to bend at the shrine of any idol, no matter how venerable. If it is unpalatable to certain minds, the minds must grow eventually to embrace it and glory in it; but truth can never change, because the laws of being are not in harmony with certain people's ideas of what they ought to be.

If there be one cry more earnest than all others in the world of thought to-day, it is the cry for justice. Nothing short of the strictest and most absolute justice will satisfy the irrepressible cravings of the human mind. Every cry for liberty, for freedom, for emancipation, is but the expression of some deep-seated yearning for equity. Even the dynamite explosions are evidence of the tremendous outcry of the human mind against tyranny, usurpation, and partiality. Whether Irishmen are right or wrong in the opinion of your Government, they feel themselves to be unfairly treated. Whether their grievances are as real as they say they are or not, still the protest against injustice is the inspiration of every struggle and outrage. Once let a people feel themselves unjustly treated, and you have aroused the implacable hatred of that people against you. Once let a child or a person in your employ feel that you have favourites, and that he is not one of them, that others, for no merit of their own, are preferred before him, to gratify your whim or arbitrary caprice, and over that child or adult you can gain no power, unless he fears you and renders you an unwilling obedience, perforce or through cowardice.

The entire religious world is agitated, nay, convulsed at this very hour, because of the failure of theologies to account for the government of the universe consistent with the justice of the Eternal. No doctrines have driven so many persons into Atheism as those of Calvin. Election and Reprobation are so horrifying to the lover of impartiality, that the very name of God is blasphemed wherever Calvinism has held sway. It is not against the idea of Supreme Goodness that men turn with disgust to Agnosticism or infidelity; wherever Atheism is most rampant, is where the name of Deity has been defiled by its association with measures reprehensible among men, wherever civilization has made any progress. Some there are, indeed, who so confound illimitable nature with their puny knowledge of a fragment of the universe, that they imagine everything to be absolutely irreconcilable that they cannot themselves reconcile, but surely it must be admitted that the supreme and sovereign hope of the world is directed toward the advent of an era of unsullied equity, when all the bewildering inconsistencies of the present shall be lost sight of for ever in the realization of humanity's most ardent dream, a dream which, whether embodied in Eden, Arcadia, Utopia or any other Oriental or classic form in the past, is the hope of the world of working men to-day, who, though less poetical in the clothing of their mental images, have still in view the realization of the self same dream which caused Plato to write his "Republic," and gave to all the Athenian Sages their divine gift of prophecy.

No one studying the classic authors can fail to discover, that the primal basis of life, according to all of them, is Spirit. No one penetrating even but a little way into the spirit of the Eleusinian and Bacchic mysteries, can fail to trace in the splendid and voluptuous ritual of the Greeks, an attempt to illustrate the career of the Soul through many stages of material existence, ultimating in the perfected bliss of angelhood. It is impossible to consult the pages of the celebrated Hermetic writings, without discovering ere long that the old Egyptians in their very dramatic representation of the movement of astral bodies, set forth in glowing imagery the transit of the Soul. Take whatever view you may of Greek and Asiatic Mythology; interpret the religions of India, Persia, China, and Assyria, as you please; consult the pages of the Jewish or any other Kabala, and the burden of every portrayal will be found to be none other than an attempt of the human mind to answer the stupendous questions of every age: Whence am I? What am I? Whither am I bound?

We are quite well aware that some Jews and some Christians are sufficiently conceited to make it their boast, that only through Moses or through Christ was the will of God revealed to man, while outside the pale of Judaism and Christianity there are to be found none who have enjoyed a clear and direct revelation from the Infinite. It is certainly not our purpose to enter upon a wordy war with any sectaries regarding the superior excellence of some particular theology or philosophy over all others; sectarian strife is sufficiently rife at present to excuse us from the charge of a neglect of duty if we decline to enter the ranks of controversialists, and match our strength with that of others in defence of some peculiar form in which truth has been or now is embodied. We claim that revelations are incessant, that the Soul is ever the discoverer, while Reason may be the analyst and exponent of truth; and that to no age more than to others, to no people more than to others, has God vouchsafed a special revelation.

But may it not be that as some material substances are diaphanous or transparent, while others are light-resisting, that in the realm of mind some mental states may correspond to windows of clear, white glass, while others may best be compared to flint or brickwork? It is not the fault of the sun, if the light streams in through open windows, but does not enter through the medium of solid masonry; it is not the fault of this same sun, if Jupiter afar off responds to its every radiation, and glories in space as a brilliant lighted world, while Mercury anear the Solar Orb is immured as yet in chaotic vapours, like unto those which doubtless once surrounded Jupiter. In the history of the progress of worlds we discover them slowly emerging, through vast cycles of time, from the gloomy darkness of their primeval state; so that while geologists may utterly discard the notion that the sun was created on the fourth day of this earth's development, it may still be admitted that prior to the close of the tertiary period, the earth was not responsive to solar light and heat as afterwards. Not the nearness of a world to the central orb of the system, nor its remoteness from that centre, determines the heat or luminosity of the planet. The planet's own growth regulates its own condition, and not until it has passed beyond chaotic and transition periods, can it rejoice as a reflector and assimilator of the light and heat which are ever flowing toward it from the central globe.

When in ancient times Solar-worship was instituted, the sun was the sacred emblem both of the Divine Soul and of the human soul. What the Eternal Spirit is to universal nature, that the human spirit must be to human nature. Every impulsion of life is from the Deity, and vibrates outward from the centre toward the circumference of being. Every form evolved upon an earth, is due to spiritual operations working from within, till at length these impulsions are embodied in the forms of matter you behold around you. First the inorganic, then the organic, must appear: first the mineral deposits are formed, then the vegetable and animal kingdoms appear, till nature's types cease with man, in whom is the culmination of nature's evolutionary line.

Charles Darwin, studying the origin of man, was one of the ablest and devoutest students of the ascent of forms of life, the world has ever seen. Neither bigoted nor sceptical, neither impetuous nor superstitious, neither iconoclastic nor foolishly conservative, he was indeed an epoch-making man. His greatness consisted largely in his sound judgment, cool deliberation, and steadfast adherence to proven facts. Hypotheses and theories were to him of minor value. He discovered first, and theorized afterwards. He endeavoured to subject all theories to nature's revelations, and never believed in the policy adopted by some, of paring down facts till they were small enough to enter the narrow grooves of antiquated theory. Better break every skin in Israel and have new wine, than deny a truth, because only old wine can be contained in venerable bottles. This was the teaching of the great Galilean teacher, and this was the policy of Darwin, and for this, though ostracised at first, his name, even before his passage from material life, became as a household word, to be mentioned with reverence instead of scorn; while from St. Paul's and Westminster, and many humbler temples in the land, arose eulogy, not execration, over his remains when these were committed to their resting place in earth.

For what Darwin has done, the scientific world owes him unfaltering loyalty. Eternal gratitude is due to such as he, for the discoveries they make regarding man's corporeal envelope, even though that envelope be but a thing of dust and clay, a school house, and a preparatory one at best, for its immortal occupant, the Soul. But if material researches may thus be valuable, if he who investigates the development of the outward is truly called a hero—What shall be the rightful honours paid to those who draw back the mystic curtain which screens the Spirit from your view, rend the obscuring vail in the midst of the temple, where humanity blindly worships while it dreads the Unknown, and let in such light concerning man's immortal origin and destiny as shall flood the page of human history with light derived from spheres of ageless and eternal Spirit?

Immortality is the faith and hope of the world; annihilation is alike inconceivable and intolerable to any sane or healthy person. Morbid sorrow, incurable disease, and a host of kindred afflictions may generate in the minds of men an apparent desire for absolute extinction of being, but where is the ordinarily happy or healthy woman, man or child, who does not shrink from death, and recoil with horror from the prospect of annihilation? But who can realize what it can be not to be? Think of yourselves as mouldering in the grave, or suffering torment in a world of future punishment! You may, but you cannot realize being nothing: no one, and nowhere. Instinctively the thought of man turns to immortality, and let the idea of extinction be broached ever so remotely—by Theosophists, Occultists, or others who pretend to find in the Buddhistic records a teaching of the ultimate loss of the soul's individuality,—and a perfect storm of angry indignation is aroused against the advocates of such a doctrine, even though the event of individual annihilation be postponed to a period so remote, that no human arithmetic can compute the æons which must elapse ere the fatal hour arrives. Instinctively the soul within you says—I AM! I always have been: I shall ever be. No changing forms of dust can e'er destroy my entity. I from eternity exist, and to eternity my pathway lies, hedged in though I may be with mortal sorrows, afflicted with many cares, weighted down with burdens grievous to be borne, I yet can see the future glory which awaits me, when after all my earthly trials are o'er, I reach the land of peace ineffable, where ample compensation will be assuredly afforded me for all the labours and the trials incident to time and sense.

We say, the Soul of man says this, because it has ever said it, in all the various theories which men have framed concerning the purpose and end of life. The soul spake thus upon the banks of the sacred, mystic Nile, whose waters, forever ebbing and flowing, suggested human experiences and change; while the lotus flowers, which bloomed always upon its banks, were symbols of the Soul's eternity. It spoke thus when Buddha, meditating upon eternal things, saw as in a crystal mirror every changing scene of life pass before him, while he himself remained unshaken by the lapse of ages. It spoke thus when Jesus, questioned by his critics on the Spirit's duration, pronounced those memorable words: "Before Abraham was, I am!" The Soul says—I AM! It lives in an eternal present. Abraham, the type of human change and sacrificial institutions, must be recent, when his brief span of influence is contrasted with the soul's eternity. Not only forward into the future but backward into the past, the Spirit's vision stretches, and the Soul can say—I am! I was! I shall be!—Past, Present, Future, all rolled into one consciousness of life. Simple being and the realization of being, this is all that can be predicated concerning spiritual life itself.

We know there are many who profess to believe in prospective, though not in past immortality. We fail, however, to discover by what processes of logical reasoning they can deduce the dogma of the endlessness of life one way if not the other. Whatsoever is born may die, all that begins may end. Worlds, if they began, may cease to be: only that which had no beginning can have no ending. This fact is clearly kept in view by scientists, who declare, and that most logically and consistently, that only atoms are eternal. Primaries, say they, have always existed, and will therefore never cease to be. But no scientist ever claims to have discovered primaries: they elude the grasp of every sense. They are strictly and obstinately invisible. No amount of toil or diligence has succeeded in wresting them from that invisible state in which eternally they dwell. All that the scientific world can know, by actual experiments concerning matter, is that it is destructible.* The indestructible has never been discovered, and yet its existence is a necessary inference of science. If spiritual teachers shall come to you with definitions of these essential primaries, is it not discreet that you should listen with all diligent attention to what they have to say? If every material research has failed, and they are still beyond you, then if they be described to you as souls, as conscious, self-existing entities, preserving their indentity intact for ever,—Why rebel because your relentless and barbaric divinities—Chance, Luck, Destiny, Fate, Law, Necessity—are dethroned, when by their displacement you behold in regal splendour, in robes of spotless beauty, one only God revealed, whose completeness forms the sphere of Justice, the hemispheres of which are Love and Wisdom, the outgoings, Power almighty.

Sooner or later you will all find yourselves obliged to vacate untenantable premises. If you endeavour to force a dogma on the human mind, unsanctioned by right or reason, your dogmatism may suffice (especially if you accompany it with sufficient arrogant intolerance of all other opinions than your own) for minds who are prepared to take your dictum instead of the findings of their own reason and moral sense. We emphatically declare that ordinary views of human immortality are little better than Atheistic negations, because they utterly fail at the crucial point, when asked to demonstrate the Justice of the Eternal. What says the materialistic thinker of to-day? I believe in no Eternal Justice;

* It is a dogma of the Materialists, that Matter is indestructible, eternal, but merely a dogma, which resolves itself into the logical conclusion that something must be eternal; and what is eternal must be absolute and primal, as no composition can be ultimate; thence the theory of atoms.

and this after nineteen centuries or thereabout of nominal Christianity, after centuries of preaching and the expenditure of millions of pounds annually in Home and Foreign Missions. Not the Archbishop of Canterbury but Charles Bradlaugh is the hero of the hour. The Pope's Encyclical against Free-masonry arouses contempt, scarcely indignation. Bishops are threatened with expulsion from Parliament, while the very name of religion is the synonym of hypocrisy or exploded fallacy with many. Why is this? Surely not because God and immortality are the fevered fancies of a disordered brain; surely not because all the hopes of the world for eternal life are built on sand, and will not bear the force of the surging billows of modern enquiry. The answer is in this and in this only: that popular and prevalent theological ideas have not demonstrated the problem of Eternal Justice.

Pythagoras, the sage of Samos, Plato, Aristotle, Socrates, Confucius, Buddha, Jesus, these taught no other gospel than that which in France, quite recently, the Spirit-world endeavoured to revive through the faithful labours of that devoted seeker after truth, who bore the nom de plume of Allan Kardec. His writings are not faultless, no human compositions are, even though dictated from the Realm of Spirit. The mediums with whom he sat were not perfectly transparent mirrors, in which every thought and sentiment from spirit life could be accurately or mistakelessly portrayed. Imperfections in style, incompleteness in statement, failure to grasp entirely the drift of thought,—these mistakes and such as these are common in the works which emanated from Kardec's facile and prolific pen; but these mistakes aside, and these imperfections discounted, The Spirit's Book, The Medium's Book, Heaven and Hell, Genesis, all of which are now easily accessible in the English tongue, besides other works not yet translated from the French, contain a fund of information and constitute a compendium of spiritual philosophy unrivalled in modern literature. We are not apologists for Kardec or his system, we are not prepared to endorse his every statement or to concur at all times in the views expressed by the revelating spirits; all we would say to the reading public concerning these remarkable volumes is, in them you will find food for years of thought, texts for thousands of discourses, while you will be confronted with the results of many years assiduous toil performed by a man who freely gave his time, his means, his strength, to collecting and diffusing information calculated to exonerate the laws of being from the charges brought against them, by those who know nothing of his inspired philosophy, and to vindicate the ways of God to man, as no other system than his has ever attempted to do, with anything like the same success.

The cardinal affirmations of Kardec's philosophy are these. God is absolutely just, strictly impartial in all his undertakings, no favourites has he, none whom he fancies, and elects to bliss while others are the objects of his unreasoning displeasure. No human soul is ever embodied on this or any other earth, except to learn a needed lesson or undergo a salutary discipline. Every soul begins at one point, and all progress towards one goal. The starting point is innocence disconnected from wisdom, the goal is innocence and wisdom fully joined. The experiences needful for some are needful for all. There are no short cuts to heaven; happiness must be earned, it can never be bestowed arbitrarily or vicariously. There are no hells in this or any other life, which are not schools and do not serve purposes of needful education. No crosses, cares, afflictions nor temptations are needlessly presented to or undergone by any, but every discipline of life, glorious or humiliating, pleasant or painful, is a needed part of the education of the spirit, and has for object the bringing forth of some latent power and excellence within. Surely such premises as these must be acceptable to all, whose boast it is that they acknowledge the universal Fatherhood of God, and Brotherhood of Man, while it must be clear to all thinkers, that there is but one alternative,—either there is a God or a Devil. If there be no law of perfect justice in the universe, which metes out to all their just deserts, then there is certainly a devil of injustice, even though it be, as the Materialists assert, unconscious and non-intelligent.

If there be any power in nature, which brings children into the world without consulting them and then loads them down with unmerited disease and sorrow, only to snuff them out of all conscious being, after they have suffered for a few years, with no reward; if some—born in affluence, fêted and caressed throughout their lives, knowing scarcely anything of pain, difficulty or temptation—shall be received into heavenly glory immediately upon the death of the body, while others, whose lot has been hard and who have fallen by reason of divers and mighty temptations they were not strong enough to resist, are doomed to long-continued if not everlasting punishment in the life to come,—then, we say, where such injustice prevails there is the devil. Teach every child and scholar to regard justice as synonymous with divinity, and injustice with devilry; hold up in all your homes and seminaries the idea of simple, absolute justice as the supreme good, and you need not feel any alarm concerning the future morality of the race. Say whatever you will against it, the doctrine of the successive embodiments of the human spirit in the material form, is illustrative of the Supreme Justice in the universe, to an extent unparalleled by any other philosophy.

Perhaps there may be carping critics still, who object to the phraseology of re-embodiment, and who pride themselves upon their ability to detect flaws in a system they utterly fail to comprehend. So far all objections to the theory of re-embodiment have been purely rhapsodic and extremely superficial, or they have been couched in such spiteful or flippant language as to render them utterly valueless as additions to genuine controversy; but as there may be persons here to-day who have hitherto failed to grasp the teaching on this subject, which has up to this time been given to the world, and as there are seeming discrepancies and discords in the teaching itself, we will endeavour to reply to a few of the more general and salient objections constantly brought forward by opponents, with such pride and vigour as though their arguments were unanswerable. Enthusiasm is not spite, nervousness is not vulgarity, and it is a pity when the one is mistaken for the other. We do not undertake to answer slander, but to the nervous and enthusiastic opponent of the re-embodiment idea, we will offer a few replies to his oft-reiterated statements, that re-embodiment implies retrogression, while, in truth, it implies always and only the perpetual advancement or progress of the spirit, accomplished by means of alternate existences in material and spiritual states of being.

Re-embodiment is not akin to the old idea of the transmigration of souls, with which it is often confounded by the ignorant. Transmigration, of course, implies a going back to a lower state than the one you leave, when you take on a fresh embodiment. Were one of you to become an animal, after having been a human being, you would have to descend the ladder of life, and place yourself on a lower round than that on which you now stand. It is a well-attested fact in physiology, that the human body includes all the elements required to form every structure comprising the three kingdoms of nature below man, mental science proving also that human intelligence embraces all the intelligence of the animal world, and superadded attainments. If transmigration have a foundation in fact, then transmigration must antedate human life. The soul not yet embodied in a structural organism, through which it can manifest its own individuality, may through the lapse of ages produce inferior forms, which manifest attributes of Spirit, but have no means of expressing the Soul itself, but only impulsions or vibrations from the soul.

The Theosophists, with their elementary spirits or fragmentary souls not yet human, have clumsily and imperfectly translated the spiritual significance of the occult science of the ancients. Gnomes, Sylphs, Undines, and Salamanders; Spirits of earth, air, fire, and water; Divinities of the four elements, and all the troops of Elves and Fairies mentioned in legendary lore, have not been simply fictions of the imagination. There are in spirit many types which have now no form on earth, but there can be no form on earth which has not a prototype in spirit. Some spiritual impulsions gain no outward expression, others are being embodied around you every moment.

The kingdoms of nature below man, visible and invisible, are preparatory expressions of that soul-life which is struggling to express itself through matter. Transmigration may be related to your past, but not to your future. Your soul having become sufficiently skilful to build the human, when it next assumes a body will assume a higher not a lower form than the one it now animates or occupies, and on passing into spirit-life will not descend into kingdoms of elementaries nor be borne aloft to supernal states of angelhood, for which it is not prepared. Spiritual spheres impinge upon the earth, they revolve with your planet, unseen through space, the seven spheres of which, you have been often told, mean seven distinct and appreciable gradations in spirit-life, surrounding and intimately connected with the earth; while beyond the earthly atmosphere, dissevered from all material bondage, are the homes of those who need not any longer to be associated with cruder forms of life.

Are all children equal from the moment of their birth? Can all learn with equal rapidity and ease? Have all equal genius or spiritual insight? Ask any parent, ask any tutor, and who is there among those who educate the young, who will not inform you of the aptitudes of one and the obtuseness of another? It is often stated by the opponents of re-embodiment, that spiritual influence or inspiration has everything to do with the presence of genius in one and the absence of it in others, but this view is erroneous at its foundation, though often true in its outward statements. The question naturally arises: Why is one inspired and not another? If God be impartial, this cannot be so. In the light of the philosophy we are endeavouring to make clear, this difficulty vanishes. Those who can most readily respond to spiritual influx, are the recipients of it and benefit by it. There is no calling one and passing of another by. The call is to all. The few only are chosen, because the few only are qualified. If, therefore, you can catch glimpses of those anterior existences which have prepared some minds for response to spiritual light, as some planets are responsive to solar heat and light through development of conditions to receive it, then the enigma is solved, discrepancies vanish. God's methods are justified to man, and the human spirit realizes equity not favouritism, strict justice not partiality, in all the economy of nature.

Have you never stood by the death-bed of a darling friend, and heard him whisper with faltering tongue: "Oh! that I could live my life over again." He goes out into eternity with that prayer upon his lips, and an answer to that petition is not denied him. After a period of rest, refreshment, and such experience as equips the soul for its new journey, he is again attracted toward an earthly form, again he plunges into the mystic river, and is again landed on the shores of time. This new experience endows him with new powers, and enables him to win new victories. If the old lessons have not been fully learned, then they must be freshly studied, and more completely mastered. If there be new lessons to be studied, then the infancy is but the period when the alphabet of a new language, the rudiments of a new science, have to be acquired. You do not call it retrogression, if having mastered French, and wishing to learn Italian, you have to begin with alphabet and grammar. If, having studied astronomy, you wish to learn music, even though you be a gray-haired professor of science, you must begin with scales and finger-exercises. The knowledge acquired at other times, on other subjects, is not lost; it is stored away in your inner being, and when you need it, it can be brought forth and utilized. But when engrossed in some especial work, your every energy bent in one direction, you are temporarily oblivious to all but what immediately engrosses you.

Earthly lives express the efforts of a spirit in certain specific directions. The child, who learns his letters with very great difficulty, has probably never seen them before, while he who picks them up readily, has only to be reminded of what he has previously known. Genius is due to past experiences uniting you with minds who can now easily assist you in the externalizing of what is within. No favourites has God, no child of earth will forever be denied the experience needed to unfold the spirit; and what sense is there in that reasoning which, professing to prize life highly, denies the necessity of earthly experience for some, while it admits it for others?

Children, according to the Church, who die in their baptismal innocence, are saved forever from earthly stain and conflict, are pure as driven snow in heaven, and yet are not so high as are the martyrs who have won their crowns. Why should these pure spirits never have the martyr's chance to win the martyr's crown? Why should your boys and girls who are kept at home safe from all pollution, be rewarded for their virtue, when they have never been tempted in the world? "Count it all joy," says James, in his epistle, "when ye fall into divers temptations," knowing that these temptations work your good. Every temptation of life must sooner or later be presented to every mind, and every mind must overcome it. How would you feel in heaven, among the saints in light, if you discovered either that you were occupying a place you had not merited, or that forever you must fill a lower place than others, because of a lack of equity in the divine distributions? To those who believe in spiritual temptation, apart from earthly embodiments, to those who believe in mediumship affording all the means necessary for the spiritual unfoldment of departed spirits, we have only to say: if you grasp and enforce the primal truth of justice in all the divine appointments, we can afford to differ on a question of ways and means whereby experience is gained; but if any shall hope to receive prizes they do not deserve, to wear laurels for which they have not fought, then they will be disappointed, for God has no favourites. Automatic or negative virtue does not pass current in heaven. If you have always told the truth and been honest and chaste, because temptations to intemperance, impurity, dishonour and falsehood, have never assailed you, then those temptations await you in future lives. When you have overcome them, but not till then, can you know the joy and rest of heaven.

But what of relationships in the spirit spheres. Not as sister, brother, cousin, niece, or aunt will you know each other there, and not by earthly names will you be called. Affection is eternal, love can never die, but merely earthly bonds are dissolved at death. During the sleep of your body, your soul is oft in sweet communion with the loved ones who are yours for ever. When the mysteries of sleep and double consciousness are solved, then will you realize, as you do not now, your relationships in eternity. The body is no more the individual, than the dress is the body, or the house its occupant. A glove conceals a hand: remove it, and the hand is there. The body is the raiment of the spirit; change it as you will, but the spirit's individuality remains intact. Every seven years your bodies may completely change, and if these gradual changes do not destroy the individuality of your real selves, neither will any number of embodiments. At length, when angelhood is reached, your memory will awaken from its lethargy, and you will fully perceive how through an unbroken series of existences, you have passed from primeval innocence to that angelic height, where, with purity restored, you have united wisdom hitherto ungained.

In another lecture, we shall hope to enter yet more fully into the question of memory. This Discourse has but touched the fringe of an infinite subject. What has been said, however, will prepare you for what is to follow.

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE HOME OF THE SOUL.

(CANTO 1.)

THE Poets have sung of the Home of the Soul,
In fair regions, forever at rest;
Have told of its glories, and sung in its praise,
With its beautiful mansions, so blest!

They have said, that man's spirit, before it came down
To labour and toil on the earth,
Was with God in His Paradise, perfectly pure,
And in heaven the Soul found its birth.

The legends of old time, all over the world,
Have stated this truth, in a dream
Of some far-famed Eden, where man was at rest,
By the side of life's clear, flowing stream.

In Eden, the Spirit had but to enjoy
Each fruit and sweet flower so fair,
While the mind every moment itself might employ,
Contemplating God's bounties so rare.

Man and Woman, together in Love's sweetest bond,
In affection celestial did prove
How the sweets of pure union forever were theirs,
If obedient to God they would move.

While, in midst of the garden, life's fair, blooming tree
Was their solace, and shelter, and food,
While all creatures obeyed them, and came at their call,
For God smiled, and pronounced them "all good."

But a Serpent came in at the wide-open gate,
Which led to that Paradise land,
And tempted the woman to eat of such fruit
As developed her self-will, and caused her to stand Abashed and affrighted, and conscious of ill,— God's law she had broken, was breaking it still.
With tears, lamentations, and bitterest cry,
She said to her husband, "Oh! where can we fly?
"God's voice is upbraiding, I cannot abide
"The anguish his anger brings close to my side!"

O poor, foolish Adam! to eat of the fruit
Which Eve, serpent-tempted, pressed close to thy mouth;
For this thou wast driven to cold Northern clime,
No longer to bask in the sweet, sunny South.

This legend is only a story, of how
The Spirit of Man doth descend
From the regions immortal, where spirits have birth,
To earth's wilderness, where they must spend
A time of probation, in sorrow and pain,
Until they a Paradise New shall attain.

The Serpent, beguiling, is Matter, whose sway
O'er the Spirit exerted must be,
Until it grows strong through sharp conflict and pain,
'Mong the blessed in heaven to be;
The Woman (Affection) whene'er led astray,
Leads the Reason (the Man) into night,
While God's frown is the sorrow and anguish ye feel,
When your consciences say you're not right.

The Spirit, through earth-life, sighs ever and aye
For a Paradise yet in store,
As Milton declared there was one to regain,
And a brighter we knew not before;
The Paradise future is innocent, too,
But in wisdom possession ye'll take
Of those bright realms immortal, when freed from all stain
Of the fruit of Life's tree ye'll partake.

(CANTO 2.)

In allegories strange and old, in mythologic guise,
The poets and philosophers have lifted up their eyes
Telling of fair Hesperides, or of Olympus' heights,
Or of Parnassus' sacred hill, or of the pure delight
Which over all Arcadia reigns, or of Utopia blest,
Or of the lyre of Orpheus, by which gods lull to rest
The pains and griefs of mortal man,
But heaven's full glories none may scan,
Until, from all earth's stains set free,
They rise as angels bright to be,
Among the hosts of shining light,
Who always love and choose the right.

If heaven is home, then surely there,
All ties of friendship will the closer bind,
Than when on earth ye scarcely knew your friends,
Because the veil of flesh did hide
Much of that radiant loveliness of soul,
Which once inspired your love and did your hearts control.

When Jesus said, "My mother and my brethren—who are they?
And answer gave, "My brethren are all of those who tread life's chequered way, Obedient to my Father's will," he spake a truth divine,
That true affection of the soul, if once it shall be thine,
Directed toward another soul, your union is for aye,
The bonds of flesh ne'er sunder ye, Death cannot take away
Or e'en obscure the Spirit's sight,
Or chill its sunbeams of delight.

(CANTO 3.)

Oh! where is the Home of the Soul? for which every spirit prays;
Oh! where are the Mansions of Love? of which the great teacher says:
I go to prepare a place for my friends,
That they may be with me, world without end!

The Home of the Soul is the Paradise state, your spirits of old did know,
Ere yet in the battle of life they fought, back to this beauteous state they'll go.
When life's battle is over, its conflict done,
Then bright as the noonday sun,
With innocence regained, wisdom attained,
Ye will forever walk in white,
For the knowledge of truth, and the love of good,
Make Heaven's celestial light!

BENEDICTION.

To the Infinite Love and Wisdom of the Eternal Father and Mother of all souls, we commit you with this prayer in our hearts for you all: That life's multiple experiences may land you when earthly life is o'er, where all is rest and joy forever! AMEN.

VIII.

REASON AND INTUITION.

WE frequently hear it remarked, that this is an Age of Reason; and those who make that claim for the present century, are often accustomed to despise Intuition, as though it were but a mere phantasy or figment of the imagination, forgetting that Reason is often blind while Intuition sees clearly; as true Intuition is, after all, the reception of knowledge by the mind from other sources than those of outward observation.

Our subject to-day brings us directly to that point where we shall be obliged to discuss the theory of Inspiration, and endeavour to account for the facts of Mediumship. Hitherto, in this Course of Lectures, we have been principally occupied in demonstrating spiritual propositions and solving spiritual problems, without entering directly into the subject of individual mediumship, except in the case of those exceptional personages, who have been quoted as the representative lights of the world, the special saviours and benefactors of humanity. However interesting and instructive dissertations on ancient history and general principles of spiritual government may be, a peculiar interest is always attached to that which is neither ancient nor foreign, but forms part of the private as well as the public life of humanity to-day. It is interesting to study the progress of the human family through ages of development, and everyone likes to know something of his ancestors, their habits and conditions, but the live questions of the hour must ever occupy the most prominent place in all practical instructions; the past being referred to only by way of illustration, and as a means of explaining, as far as may be, the mysteries of the present.

The Age of Reason is upon you, as Thomas Paine declared in the last century, when he gave to the world his justly celebrated work bearing that title. But the Age of Reason is an incomplete age; it is of the intellect only: it makes no provision for the Intuitions of woman, while it deifies the reasoning powers of man. Therefore in France it was ushered in with strife and bloodshed. Its work was purely iconoclastic; its weapons were carnal; it provoked strivings innumerable, and desolated many homes in the endeavour to promote liberty.

No one reading the History of the French Revolution, can fail to perceive that the goddesses Reason and Liberty utterly failed to usher in an age of genuine freedom or solid advancement. The Republic of the last century only gave way, after a very short reign, to another monarchy, to the establishment of what has been commonly called the Second Empire. Voltaire, Volney, Paine, Robespierre, and all the great intellects of the 18th century, simply paved the way for Buonaparte and his matchless conquests, a few years later; while the first Napoleon, himself an exile in the closing years of his earthly life, handed down to his successors no other legacy than that of thirst for material conquest, resulting in the overthrow of the Buonapartist dynasty by means of a teriffic war between France and Germany. It is true, that the influence of Paine, and indeed of almost all who took part in the French Revolution intellectually, was great in America; and so highly is Paine esteemed by many of your transatlantic brethren, that he has been placed on a pedestal nearly if not quite as high as that on which a devoted country has placed George Washington; "The Author Hero of the American Revolution" being a title often applied by his friends to Paine; while the strictly orthodox in the Christian fold join in pronouncing eulogies upon the soldier, Washington, but consign the author, Paine, to everlasting condemnation in the world to come, while on earth his name is cast out as evil, and his books proscribed as full of blasphemy and pestilential heresy. However, the feeling against Paine is now rapidly diminishing, and while everyone must regard him as an iconoclast, and something less than a direct revealer of spiritual truth, it is manifestly unjust to pronounce him either an Atheist or an infidel. He was in all his writings a firm supporter of Deism, and allowed himself to be elected president of a society of Theo-philanthropists, in Paris, who were not only believers in a Supreme Spirit, but also in human immortality; though Paine himself seems to have doubted whether all men were immortal.)

Proceeding upon lines of intellectual argument only, he admitted the existence of a God, and it is but justice to admit that Paine's idea of Deity was vastly superior to prevailing orthodox notions. He believed in a revelation from God, through the medium of Nature, but rejected the inspiration as well as the infallibility of scripture records. He really stood far nearer to the Theists than to the Atheists of to-day, though the latter often seem to claim him, because he was at war with the churches, criticised the character of Jesus, and overthrew dogmatic theology completely in his essays. Thomas Paine came to inevitable conclusions, relying upon such means for solving the problem of the universe as were at his disposal, and all credit be to him for so valiantly risking all things in a worldly sense, in the interests of what he believed to be the truth. Such a man merits honour, not execration, and it is truly lamentable to witness the spiteful and unreasoning hostility, which avowed advocates of the religion of Jesus manifest towards one who had doubtless many shortcomings, but to off-set these many sterling good qualities.

The tales told of his death-bed agony and recantation at the last, are wholly unreliable, and are about on a par with many of the sensational tales told by fanatical religionists. to frighten those who are on the verge of free-thought, back again into the orthodox fold.

Some years ago the story was freely circulated, that here in London, in the neighbourhood of Regent Street, great consternation had prevailed in a Unitarian chapel, because a member of the congregation had suddenly got up during the service, and proclaimed himself a believer in the absolute deity of Jesus Christ, at the same time urging upon the congregation the necessity of instant conversion to the true faith (his own). The same paper which published that account, went on further to state, that a great many persons recognised the hand of God in the frenzied ejaculations of this suddenly-converted and heaven-inspired disturber of the sinful peace, in which a congregation of heretics were wrapped on the borders of the lake of eternal fire, and that many from that moment withdrew from the congregation and severed their connection with Unitarianism, indentifying themselves at once with orthodoxy, while only the minister and a few others remained obdurate. As there is only one Unitarian chapel in the neighbourhood of Regent Street, that in Little Portland Street, where Dr. Martineau ministered for many years previous to the pastorate of the Rev. Philip Wicksteed, the present minister, and no such scene has ever occurred to the knowledge of anyone in that chapel, it was soon decided that the story was a "pious fraud." It is just possible that the person who wrote it believed it to be true, having gathered it from hearsay. It is also possible that some insane person, or someone under the influence of violent excitement, once behaved in an unseemly manner in a Unitarian chapel somewhere, causing a disturbance and a panic, but invariably such tales as these are pure fabrications, so far as their import and local application are concerned, and it is impossible to be too cautious ere we lend credence to any story circulated to the detriment of any person or body of persons holding generally unpopular views.

Enthusiasts are so numerous in the orthodox camp, and sensational preaching works such havoc among the intellects of sensitive and emotional people who listen to it, while partisan journalists and biographers are so anxious to bend history to support orthodoxy, that you will do well to regard, as simply beneath contempt, all the excited and scandalous stories which have been and still are in circulation concerning the awful effects of heresy upon heretics, and especially are death-bed scenes concocted to render more thrilling and ghastly than they otherwise could be made, the consequences of departing even in the slightest degree from the accepted orthodox standards.

In the face of such facts as these, it is not to be wondered at that immense capital has been made out of the dying agonies and awful despair of heretics in their last moments upon earth, while nothing whatever is said of the hopelessness of some Christian believers in the hour of their last extremity. Many of those who thus die seemingly in despair, however, are only suffering from the effects of some distressing malady, like that which caused the celebrated and saintly incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, the Reverend Frederick Robertson, to declare that when very ill he often saw everything through a thick, black crape veil. (Frames and feelings, even at the hour of earthly dissolution, are no criterion of wickedness or virtue, but are very frequently the result of despondency occasioned by physical ailments solely.) Let this physiological truth be once accepted by the multitude, and it will be, and that shortly, if education continues to advance during the next half century as it has done during the past fifty years, and one of the very strongest and cruelest weapons ever employed by the believers in an angry God and everlasting damnation, against those who differed from them in opinion, will be dashed from their grasp, or rendered powerless in their hands.

(It has always been accounted a sin, in orthodox circles, for persons to think for themselves. According to Orthodoxy, God has evidently given brains to a very few, coupled with permission to employ them on religious matters, while to the great mass of mankind, reason must be employed on secular matters only, and then only within a circumscribed area, defined by the ruling powers; as kingcraft has ever been allied with priestcraft, and freedom of thought and speech on matters political, has, till very recently, been considered blasphemy, meriting imprisonment, and in extreme cases even death itself.)

One of the most prominent signs of the present times, is the practical, if not the actual, disestablishment of Church and State alike, in all civilized lands. This disestablishment is, unfortunately, too often brought about by violent, aggressive, and altogether reprehensible means, as tyranny in a new form often usurps the place of the old tyrant, who has been compelled by the masses to abdicate the throne. There are laws on England's statute book to-day, which, if enforced, would imprison or fine every religious freethinker and every political dissenter throughout the land; and it is only because of the powerful vox populi, which cannot be silenced, that heresy in any form is permitted. (But while we sympathize heartily with all who having wrongs seek redress; while we can side with the friends of Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, in their agitation for the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws; while we have hearts to feel with the oppressed sons and daughters of Erin, who for centuries have been downtrodden, and afflicted with an unjust yoke; while we pity, from the bottom of our hearts, the poor Russians, who have been exiled to Siberia on the merest pretext, and can behold in the foundations of Nihilism itself a rude, savage clamour for simple justice, and the recognition of the rights of mankind universally, we cannot but deprecate and utterly disown the aggressive policy of those who seek by the assassin's hand, secretly or openly, to do evil that good may come.

War itself is an evil, and there is some justification for dynamite, on the plea that it is the poor man's substitute for gunpowder. But the secret foe, lurking in street corners, ready to stab one in the dark, must ever be held in greater detestation than he who openly declares himself your enemy, and challenges you to mortal combat in the daylight. But are the manœuvres of armies all upright, and can any one reading the history of ancient warfare, and then studying the annals of these days, fail to regard with contempt, if he has any honour in him, the detestable intrigue always resorted to, when war is undertaken for ambition more than to vindicate the oppressed.

Warfare is justified by Reason, but never by the Spirit. Intuition has ever discountenanced it, and when John Bright severed his connection with the English Cabinet, because of England's aggressive foreign policy, especially in relation to Egypt, he proved himself to be upon a spiritual eminence, vastly higher than that on which Gladstone, or any other of England's greatest statesmen, stand. We do not wish to be misunderstood, as implying that warfare has never been justifiable, from the standpoint of those who engaged in it: therefore, your martial heroes, Nelson, Washington, and others deserve the tribute you pay to their bravery, and the monuments you rear to their honour, and yet it is Buddha in Asia and Christ in Europe and America, at whose shrine the civilized world instinctively bows, not because of the intellectual greatness, but by reason of the spiritual superiority of these ideal characters.

Intuition or Spiritual Insight is the Higher Reason. It is Angelic Wisdom, it is the knowledge of the Soul; and knowledge gained in celestial spheres communicated intuitively to man on earth, constitutes human intuition in its purest and highest forms. Instinct is the attribute of the animal creation. Throughout the animal kingdom instinct reigns supreme, and this voice of instinct is unerring and unfaltering in its tone: it never leads astray. It is instinct which leads the animal to search for such roots, herbs and grasses as will heal it of its wounds, and restore it to health when in sickness. Instinct leads the animal, the bird, the insect to make provision for every material want; but millions of living creatures appear to have no higher instincts than those which guide them to make adequate provision for material wants. Many there are who appear completely destitute of any higher love than clannish or the lowest type of family devotion. Cruelty is rampant in the lower world, as animality governs, and the instinct of self-preservation is the dominant and inspiring sentiment of being.

Reason in man is higher than instinct in animals, but Reason is far inferior to Intuition, and often even to Instinct, as a guide in the present stage of man's development, though in angelic life Reason, or the power of intellect, will be so completely blended with intuitive perception, or the clear and direct apprehensions of Spirit, that in the perfect dual life of angelhood, yet to be expressed in perfected human forms on earth, Reason, as analyst, and Intuition, as discoverer, will walk hand in hand: Reason explaining the why and wherefore of whatever Intuition realizes or perceives.

Reason can never discover the primal cause or fount of life: it knows simply nothing of the origin of being, and is therefore utterly agnostic on all spiritual matters. The idea of God is not irrational, but it is more than rational; so is the idea of spirit-life and that of human immortality. Thomas Paine, though avowedly a rationalist of the extremest type, was not devoid of intuition or spiritual perception, and thus his recognition of Deity is not in accordance with the views of Rationalists at large. All spiritual questions must be referred to the spiritual side of human nature, as reason unaided can only deal with the outermost covering or envelope of life.

Why should it be preposterous to declare in the teeth of modern scepticism and open denial of all spiritual realities, that man has spiritual faculties in addition to his intellectual powers and means of sensuous observation? Science, though silent on the question of the spirit world, cannot and does not attempt to deny its existence. Huxley is an agnostic, so are Spencer and Tyndall, and other luminaries in the world of scientific research, who rely solely on the power of intellect. A spiritual revelation is granted to man through the avenues of spiritual perception, even as the eye is needed to distinguish colour, the ear to detect sound, while each one of the senses has its own peculiar work to do. If every bodily sense has its own place and function, and the avocations of one faculty are not those of others, surely to the rationalistic mind it need not appear absurd to state that man has other faculties than the intellectual, other perceptions than the sensuous, and that these other and higher perceptions, viz, the spiritual or intuitive faculties, are the primal source whence man derives all his absolute knowledge concerning spiritual existence.

It has usually been observed that woman is more intuitive than man, while man is more intellectual than woman, and for this reason, woman has been denied admission into Parliament, and has not been permitted to take equal part with man in the various trades, industries and professions, many of which are equally adapted to both sexes. It is just because intuition, in the person of woman, has been kept outside the Council and the Senate, that war has raged so terrifically in all parts of the civilized world, as well as among barbaric peoples. It is on this account that the history of Christianity has often been written in blood, and tyranny has reigned instead of meekness and gentleness of spirit which is commended in the Gospel, and is usually called Christian, no matter how harsh and vengeful the action of professing Christendom may be. Intuition in the human race is as unerring as instinct is unerring in the animal, but intuition in man far transcends animal instinct, for while instinct only makes provision for material wants, intuition discovers a moral code, realizes the existence of a spiritual world and a spiritual life, and, in a word, reveals God to the Soul, which can alone behold him.

It is not with the intellect or outer mind that spiritual truths are grasped. All that reason can do is to admit their probability, after Intuition has presented them to Reason. that reason may decide whether to accept them or reject them. Intuition does not contradict reason, but it always transcends it; and surely the transcendent and the contradictory are widely different the one from the other. You are all acquainted with the facts of the multiplication table: you have learnt it in your childhood, and are convinced that the propositions it lays down are axiomatic or self-evident. Should anyone, therefore, come to you and say: "It has been revealed to me by intuition, or by inspiration, that the multiplication table is incorrect," you would give no credence to such a statement, for the simple reason that you know of the truth of that which your opponent assails.

No religious truth can ever be opposed to any fact in science, and it cannot possibly be any part of true religion to believe that the world was formed in six periods of twenty-four hours each; neither can religion be affected by the credibility or incredibility of such stories as Jonah and the whale, Balaam and the ass, and other fables or allegories introduced into the Hebrew Scriptures, to set forth spiritual truths, but no more miraculously inspired than were Æsop's fables or Bunyan's allegories.

Thomas Paine, in his "Age of Reason," confines himself almost entirely to a criticism of the letter of the Bible; into the spiritual meanings of ancient fables he does not and cannot enter. So when Swedenborg appears, with the key of Correspondences to unlock the mysteries of the ancient records, he does not attempt to underrate any scientific discovery, nor to persuade anyone to believe in a pretended revelation from heaven, which falsifies the discoverable facts of nature, constantly being revealed with ever-increasing distinctness to the delvers for wisdom in the mines of the external universe.

Whatever may be the fallacy of some of Swedenborg's conclusions, his idea of Correspondence is in the main undoubtedly correct, as it simply implies that there is an inner as well as an outer world, and that that inner realm has its own language, its own signs, and makes its own appeal, in its own way, to the spiritual senses of humanity, employing all outward things as coverings simply for the esoteric truth concealed below the surface, and under the guise of literal external history.

When Swedenborg said, there are three senses in which the Divine Word or truth itself may be understood, he certainly need not have confined himself to the Old and New Testaments, for there are many other sacred books in the world which contain truth as well as the books pronounced divine by Swedenborg. It is very easy, however, to perceive the individual limitations of the great Swedish seer, when he personally accepted as divine only such books of the Bible as appeared to him to contain the inward or spiritual sense. Not finding the spiritual sense in the Chronicles, for instance, he refuses to include them in the sacred canon. He also rejects all the Epistles, reducing the New Testament to five books only: the four Gospels and the Apocalypse, which latter work seems to have been his peculiar study.

Now, it is evident to all observing minds, that all teachers claiming inspiration have accepted such manuscripts as divinely inspired as appealed to their own sense of right, and awoke answering echoes within their own consciences. Luther rejected the Epistle of James, because it did not harmonize with his peculiar views of justification by faith alone; he also ignored the Revelation, because of its extremely mystic character, and the extreme value which in his opinion the author put upon his work. It seems evident, that every individual reformer or teacher finds it his own especial province to discover the precious ore which, though mixed with alloy, is undoubtedly buried beneath the letter of all the world has ever held sacred, and in so far as the reformer is a revelator, adding something to the stock of human knowledge, his work is a valuable addition to human literature; as the world depends entirely upon well-proven affirmatives for its progression.

No error can be greater than to limit nature by our knowledge of it, to the rejection of all facts which we individually have not perceived. How is it in all departments of scientific research? Are there not intuitive or prophetic minds, who declare that there are more planets than have yet been discovered? Then, at length, when Reason has acted upon the suggestion of Intuition, the telescope reveals that which hitherto was only supposed to exist. Do not all discoveries simply fulfil the dream of some poet, the prophecy of some seer, while the romancist, or writer of what is often called the wildest fiction, is simply the anticipator of coming facts in outward life? Jules Verne, Cervantes, Lord Lytton, and other writers of a highly romantic or visionary type, have stated nothing impossible in perspective. Even "20,000 leagues under the Sea" has been pronounced by the French Academy, which body has recognised intuition as a sixth sense, as a prediction of the future attainments of mankind; while the Vril-Ya of Lytton are not more wonderful people than the progress of society from barbarism to the present day leads us to expect as the future inhabitants of earth.

What is Intuition? Reason, cold, calculating, dealing only with what reaches the senses, may evolve a system of religion which deals with abstractions, but the abstract is never lovable, and never awakens the sentiment of affection in its worshippers. An abstract Deity may be inferred by reason, a vast reservoir of intelligence, governing all things by immutable, inexorable laws. But such a God is king simply, there is nothing of the fatherhood or motherhood of the Infinite Spirit in such a conception. Such a being may inspire you with awe but not with love. The worshippers of such a being are usually fatalists or stoics, and it is to be noted that whenever the thought of God is of a masculine entity only, and wherever the priesthood is composed exclusively of men, that there vengeance is mistaken for justice, and human anger is considered to have its counterpart in the wrath of the Eternal.

Universalism and Unitarianism have instinctively worked for the emancipation and elevation of woman. These denominations have opened their pulpits to women as well as men, and there is no law governing the churches of these denominations, forbidding such inspiration as may flow through human minds and lips to-day, even though it should not accord with the prevailing sentiments of Christendom. Truly the masculine element of reason is not as yet sufficiently blended with intuition in the Unitarian body, and therefore there is a complaint, that Unitarian services are too cold and simply intellectual, to satisfy the emotional side of human nature, and emotion has always played a prominent part in the history of the spiritual experiences of the race.

Emotion is as natural as intellect. The heart which feels is quite as important as the brain which thinks or the mind that reasons; and when the wise man of old penned the salutary injunction, "Keep thy heart, for out of it are the issues of life," he invented a precept which the world can never afford to despise or forget. The heart physically is as important as the brain. Rupture of the heart will produce instant dissolution. Heart affections frequently carry persons off in a moment, who are outwardly robust and likely to live for many years, judging by external indications; but outward indications are frequently deceitful, as we cannot judge of a person's bodily health, at all times, by superficial appearances, so we often err most wofully when we rely entirely upon the observations of the senses and the calculations of the reason, in forming estimates of character.

A new era is dawning in the science of medicine. The old, clumsy, imperfect methods of diagnosis are being superceded by clairvoyant or psychometric delineations. In America, to a much larger extent than in England, Clairvoyantes and Psychometrists are employed to assist physicians. These sensitive persons are always mediumistic, and though they may have powers of discernment of their own, peculiar to their extremely sensitive condition of mind and body, no one, sensitive enough to be clairvoyant in his normal state, is other than highly mediumistic, for mediumship is after all due to sensitiveness of brain and body, more than to all other causes combined.

Spirits are not called up by mediums "from the vasty deep"; the medium is not an evoker of spirits, by means of charms or spells, but when the clairvoyant describes a friend of yours, beside you in spirit, that friend is not brought thither by the medium, for he does not follow the medium about. You perhaps are not so organized as to be able to see the spirit form or hear the spirit voice, while the medium's peculiarly susceptible condition enables him to see and hear sights and sounds produced by vibrations on the atmosphere, impossible for you to detect.

Science declares that as man has progressed, he has come into a condition enabling him to see many colours and hear many sounds, of whose existence previously he had never even dreamed. Perhaps there are new colours, perhaps there are new sounds, some one suggests. There may be sounds and colours new to earth and its inhabitants, but wherever the faculties of man are at their lowest, he realizes the least, while wherever they are at their highest, he realizes most.

The spiritual world is not far distant, as some suppose; it is the very life and soul of the material earth. Just as spirit must pervade the material organism of man, or vitality would cease, so the spirit-world must penetrate the outer world, or there could be no animation or objective life on earth.

Intuition does not argue or reflect, does not calculate or measure, it simply realizes. Is it wonderful that the spiritual nature of man should possess such realistic powers, when man's outward frame has similar susceptibilities? If you have open eyes, and are not colour-blind, when light streams in upon you, you discover of what colours it is composed. You need no one to teach you that light is warm, if, touching your cheek, it makes your face burn. No one needs to asseverate that ice is cold, if once you have handled it. All knowledge is gained experimentally, and without experimental knowledge there can be but supposition or blind belief. But how much there is accepted in the material world daily, merely on hearsay, and how many there are who have had no opportunities to personally verify what they have been told! It is optional with these, whether they accept or reject the testimony of others, but witness of an impartial character is universally accepted as authoritative throughout the world, in all departments of life.

Intuition is the action of the soul, independently of mind and body, and therefore it is often far more reliable than any information gained in outward ways can possibly be. We have known not only one but numberless instances of intuitive knowledge putting to flight the most feasible and well-considered conclusions of eminent scholars, which were nevertheless erroneous, because they had built upon false data, therefore their hypotheses, no matter how logical, were foundationless. You often hear it said of a fallacious system,—grant the premises upon which the theory is built, and the theory itself is incontrovertible. The reformers of the world deny the premises of old theology, they deny many of what are falsely called the cardinal verities of religion, as the light of the Spirit reveals the error of those pessimistic views of life upon which all such doctrines as the total depravity of man, God's unabating wrath, and everlasting torment, find support.

Intuition does not confine itself to general and great questions; it enters into every detail of material life; it often speaks through dreams, warnings, and presentiments, but quite as frequently through the vision of the spirit directly, during the waking hours of the body's life.

Recently a lady of our acquaintance hired a servant, who had no one to say a kind word for her. She had no character, no reputation, no references to produce, and she generally bore a very bad name. The lady to whom she applied for a situation, after having met with constant rebuffs in other places, said, "I know you have no testimonials with you, I know you have few friends and many enemies, I know I shall be thought foolish for engaging you, and perhaps even my husband may scold me for my imprudence in taking a servant into the house without a character; but I know you are an injured woman, I know you are honest, and have been cruelly maligned, and I feel it only an act of justice to do what I can to give you a comfortable home, and make such amends to you as are in my power, for the injuries you have sustained through the false reports maliciously circulated against you." The lady's husband did upbraid her, acquaintances did comment upon what they called her insane folly, her unaccountable madness; but the servant proved a treasure, and was the means of doing her employers a most important service. Reason would have said, Have nothing whatever to do with her; but reason could not see through the falsehood, it could only argue from it as though it were a truth.

When Jesus said to his disciples, "Whosoever's sins ye remit they are remitted, and whosoever's sins ye retain they are retained," he spoke concerning the intuitive heart-reading, soul-discerning power, which the truly spiritual ever possess. He endowed them with no sacerdotal authority, such as Romanists and Ritualists lay claim to; he never placed the destiny of human souls for eternity in the hands of frail and feeble man, but he declared that those who are truly developed in their interior being, have powers of spiritual discernment the rest of the world do not possess.

When the age of Intuition shall have fully come, then deception will be impossible, as it is in the brighter spheres of spirit-life. Imposture cannot bear the searching scrutiny of spiritual investigation. Words may be false, actions treacherous, reputations forged, but if coming into living contact with another mind, you can analyse it, then brass can no longer pass for gold, hypocrisy will be unmasked, wrongs righted, and deceitfulness abandoned, when the earth produces a race of men and women, who can see beneath the surface, and judge with the unerring judgment of the Spirit.

See that ye despise not these interior Voices, which, to supplement, not to supplant, human reason, are God's revelation to Man through the medium of the Soul within.)

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE IDOL-BREAKER.

THE world has many idols, false deities, who stand
Before the Lord Almighty, e'en in this Christian land!
But the grossest of the idols, of all 'fore which ye bow,
Is the false god, named Mammon, with gold upon its brow!

Gold is the powerful idol, for which ye all forsake;
Ambition, the besetting sin, whose thirst ye strive to slake,
Even with blood outpoured upon the battle field,
Thirst for some new possession, for this your lives ye yield.

Who shall go out to battle—invincible in might,—
And, by the power of Spirit, put ancient wrongs to flight?
Who shall express in Council, that human love, whose might Shall overrule the Senate, till all obey the right?

Who will be the Crusader, engaged in holy war,
To carry Heaven's own banner, to lands both near and far;
And, through the force of kindness, subdue the ancient frown
Of haughty, grasping nobles, and elevate the clown?

Ye build your massive temples, and rear them to the sky,—
Your steeple-houses lofty, that all who're passing by,
May hear your choirs sing anthems: "God is a man of war, Mighty is he in battle," while, o'er in Egypt far,
Your troops subdue th' Egyptians, not by the power of love,
But by cold steel, gunpowder,—these come not from above!

Ye claim as teacher, Jesus, that saviour of mankind,
Who strove by cords of mercy, his sheep to him to bind;
Ye call his name more sacred than any name that's heard,— Then why not pay obedience to his most loving word?

'Tis true, he said his spirit, with wings of peace o'erspread,
The dove of loving-kindness would not rest on every head,
Until the sword had gone forth to scatter death, dismay,
But they who used the sword, he said, must perish in the fray.

"It must be that offences come:
But, woe to him by whom they come!"

Are there offences here, against the law of right;
Are there not discords now, warring against the light?
Baal, as God, still enthroned will be,
Till all obey the law of Charity.

Elijah, in the ancient time, with visage stern and bold,
Calls Baal's worshippers to meet their God: on him to call, they're told.

With knives and lancets they afflict their bodies, for his ire Demands such brutal sacrifice, while Elijah says, "By fire
Shall the true God answer ye this day;
So to your rites of worship speed ye on your way."

For hours and hours the people cry:
"O Baal! answer." But no reply
In answer comes to their earnest prayer;
Their cries and sobs may rend the air,
But Baal sleeps or hunts that day,
And hears not when his people pray.

Ah! in your hours of need, false deities will ye forsake:
Trust, then, alone in the living God, and for your portion take,
That Light which inly he reveals,
The Love which every sorrow heals!

'Tis told of an Idol-Breaker, that, journeying forth one day
On a holy expedition, he found upon his way
One idol, than all more beauteous, and he would stay his hand,
And save that precious relic, which did so lovely stand.
But the Spirit urged him on to strike, and, with one fatal blow,
The idol fell low at his feet, while in his sight did glow,
Gems, rubies, sapphires, diamonds rare,
With countless treasures beyond compare!

The idol, which was broken, yielded up this goodly store;
The idol kept the treasures from the people, as of yore.
So, at this moment, idols,—the Love of Place and Power,
Selfishness, Vain Ambition,—defraud ye, at this hour,
Of universal treasures. When freemen strike the blow,
And level the fairest idol, till on earth it lieth low,
Then, in surpassing beauty, will the treasures it conceals,
Lie open to your vision, for your use, your woes to heal!

Break! break! the massive Idol: the thirst for rank and power!
Remember, all are brethren; look forward to the hour,
When Love's triumphant conquest shall bid all wars to cease,
And labour, as ye may, to bring the Age of Universal Peace!

BENEDICTION.

May the Light of Love and Wisdom, blended into one perfect ray of Heavenly Light, so guide you in all your undertakings, that in your hearts and homes the Demon of Strife shall perish, and the Angel of Peace sit enthroned triumphant. Then from your happy homes, and peaceful lives, may influences go forth to banish Strife among the Nations, till dawns the Reign of Universal Peace, by Prophets long foretold. AMEN.

IX.

TRUE PRAYER: ITS NATURE AND EFFICACY.

"Prayer is the Soul's sincere desire."

SO sang that truly inspired and sweetly devotional poet, MONTGOMERY, whose charming sacred lays form a very choice and important part of Christian hymnology. Montgomery has, perhaps, contributed no finer gem to the diadem of the world's religious fervour than the poem or hymn which contains the text or motto of our Discourse this morning. (Here in a single sentence the entire significance of Prayer is stated; here we have a compendium of the choicest theology, a definition capable of eternal unfoldment, at once logical, terse, brief, spiritual, and while sufficiently simple to be intelligible to the youngest child, at the same time deep, profound, scientific and didactic enough for the most erudite scholar, and the most sceptical philosopher.)

We are quite well enough aware, however, of the agnostic tendencies of to-day, not to expect that Materialism will concede anything to Spiritualism without a hard struggle; and far from blaming or deriding the scepticism of the hour, we regard it as a healthy indication of the world's progress, because wherever there is doubt there must be thought to engender that doubt. Belief is very easy to some minds, if you can justly call gullibility or superstition belief. Unbelief is also easy to many, as nothing can well be easier than to deny, or, at least, ignore everything with which you are personally unacquainted. The fool, in the time of David, said positively in his heart, "There is no God." The fool says the same thing to-day: "There is no God, because I have not seen God; no future life for man, because it has not been satisfactorily demonstrated to me personally." While the sceptic—who is not a fool but often a very earnest and truth-loving man, seeking for the highest wisdom—may often be found to exclaim : "I cannot feel sure that thereis a Supreme Spirit governing all things. I cannot feel sure that man is immortal; there may or there may not be a God, a heaven, a resurrection." And in this attitude of hazy doubt many of your great minds are at this moment.

This doubt is, however, not the gloaming which heralds the approach of night, it is the twilight which precedes the dawn of a new day. The stars may have become invisible, the moon may have set, the sun may not yet have arisen for these minds, and they are groping their way amid the shadows; the darkling mists encircle them, the cold wet dews are falling, but out in the cold, out in the shadow, they are but awaiting the sunrise, even though they know not that there be a sun. The attitude of the thoughtful world to-day is that of eager expectancy. Every one seems on the qui vive, on the tiptoe of expectancy, awaiting nobody knows what, but certainly a tangible something whose approach is felt mysteriously in the darkness, but whose form is yet concealed from the eyes of the waiting throng. Imagine a man, born blind, just receiving sight, and can you not picture to yourselves a vision before his opening eyelids, of a confused mass of moving substance, in which no form is clearly outlined, where men and trees seem fused together as though they were one incongruous existence? Can you not picture to yourselves one of Lord Lytton's heroes or heroines coming up from the nether world, and standing one morning upon an Alp, awaiting the sunrise and marvelling as to what possible thing the sun can be like in appearance, never having seen it. It is as though the world's thinkers, who are just redeemed from the slavery of ecclesiastical bondage, were for the first time admitted into the open field, and allowed to await the sunrise. The stars have retired, the moon has set, powers temporal and ecclesiastical no longer act for them as luminaries, and they are left in the chill, bleak dawn of a new oncoming day, to await the sunrise.

The world has just completed its passage through one astronomical cycle, and you are now in a period of expectancy, awaiting the culmination of the spiritual era which ensues later. The premonitory knockings have been heard, the initial steps to welcome the new angel have been taken, but yet the Lord delays his coming, and the virgins with lighted lamps must awhile yet stand outside the door of the palace, awaiting its opening from within, that they may be admitted to take their seats around the King's table, at the marriage supper of the Lamb. Purely astronomical interpretations of spiritual truth are in a strictly literal sense, perhaps, correct, but when the true inner wisdom of the Ancients shall be brought to light, then shall every symbol glow with radiant spiritual light, and the pathway of the Soul, from the dust to the celestial heavens, shall be seen clearly outlined in the symbols which record the passage of the sun in the heavens, and the journeyings of Sol with his companions around the more distant Alcyone.

(Supposing the purely physical science of astronomy explains to you the letter of the Greek Mythos acceptably: supposing you become converts to the learned though erratic Frenchman, Dupuis, whose "Christianity and Solar Worship" has created quite a sensation in some circles; supposing Gerald Massey's "Natural Genesis" shall so revolutionize the thought of Christendom, that to the eyes of many Jesus becomes a type of the sun of this system, and his disciples are the twelve signs of the Zodiac; supposing the development theory of the great German sceptical author, Strauss, be accepted alike by the Church and the world;—Will spiritual aspiration directed to Christ and his apostles avail nothing? Will it be proved that all the prayers of Christendom are vain, mere idle breath, because they have been addressed to imaginary instead of real personages? Our answer is—Let our quotation from Montgomery supply you with an emphatic denial to your fears: "Prayer is the soul's sincere desire, uttered or unexpressed; the motion of a hidden fire, that trembles in the breast."

Thus prayer owes its efficacy to the nature and efforts of your own spirit. True prayer is the work of the soul, and by it you can reap spiritual harvests, just as by manual labour you can avail yourselves of the resources of the ground. We are all dependent upon at least two classes of influences in the accomplishment of all we undertake. No one can live either to or by himself alone. Crusoe on his lonely island, before Friday visited him, was not alone, and his consciousness of unseen companionship led him to suspect the presence of the devil on the island, when a mysterious footstep on the sand could be traced by him to no human agency. The sensitive child who dreads the darkness, who cannot go upstairs alone, because of an overwhelming timidity which paralyzes every sense, is a medium who as yet has not had the laws of spirit communion explained to him. The reason why spirits so often seem to be devils, is because of false early training partly, and partly by reason of the inner consciousness of mankind, that human life, as it now is, is not sufficiently pure to always attract the angels. However much we may differ from Madame Blavatsky, Colonel Olcott, and the Theosophists generally, on some points, we gladly refer you to the pages of the "Theosophist" for learned and spiritual expositions of prayer. Nothing can be finer than the Editor's ideas of invocation: nothing truer than his mode of distinguishing between the attractive potencies of thought, and the reality or unreality of personages addressed by name, or otherwise, in verbal or even inaudible petitions.

The spirit aspires after some plane of spiritual being, and allies itself with existence on that plane, by fervent spiritual effort, which is desire, and desire is supplication, therefore, according to our desires are our prayers effectual or non-efficacious.) The Roman Catholic will invoke Vincent-de-Paul, Francis Xavier, Philip Neri, and a host of other personages who cannot be omnipresent nor even ubiquitous. Now, do Catholics imagine that these saints, who on earth were only men, and many of whom were canonized because of the service they rendered to the Church while on earth, can hear every litany which mentions their names, and can respond to every petition addressed to them? It seems incredible that such views can been entertained by an educated priesthood, though the Irish peasantry cannot be expected to reflect very deeply on such matters. Moreover, different people form very different ideas of the beings whom they address, and thus it is spiritually impossible that all can be praying to the same individual, even though all are using the same name to personify the spiritual state, into league with which they desire to come.

(Shallow iconoclasts, who can tear down easily enough, but have few abilities or propensities for building up, ridicule Prayer because its form is often grotesque and its methods ignorant, but any child can destroy what has taken years to fashion; but can the child give you a better substitute for the thing he has destroyed? That is the vital question. Prayer is an unspeakable comfort to millions of tired, weary and desponding hearts. Relief found in prayer has prevented death by suicide, in many instances. Prayer has lifted many a burdened heart from under the heavy burden of woe, which would otherwise have crushed it; has rescued many a broken-hearted one from the grave: has restored many a shattered mind and body to health and reason; and has done more for the real salvation of the world from disease, crime, and manifold distresses than all other agencies put together. It behoves us, therefore, to consider its nature and methods of operation most carefully, before we dare to discountenance so powerful an aid to human well-being.

Prayers for rain and fine weather are amongst those most frequently ridiculed. These we will consider first, passing on ere we close to a consideration of those prayers which heal the sick and work so-called miracles.

Now we need not remind this audience that we are as earnest sticklers for the immutability of the laws of nature as any Materialist can possibly be. He differs from us, or we differ from him, not concerning the impossibility of setting aside the laws of nature—upon this point we are fully agreed—but upon the nature of the laws themselves. It is one thing to agree to the proposition, that nature's laws are immutable, and quite another to be satisfied with a definition given by a man, or party, of those laws. To us, we may as well say plainly—first as last—to our positive knowledge, law is the result of spirit action. There is no blind force in nature, no such thing as a destiny which is not planned by Intelligence. If people prefer to think that they are swayed by blind laws, if it consoles them to be resigned to the inevitable feeling that the inevitable is traceable neither to love, wisdom, nor justice, but to inexorable fate or unconscious being, they are at liberty to enjoy their frozen philosophy, so long as they do not endeavour to wrest from us our spiritual certainties. Let these certainties be attacked, so highly do we prize them, that we will leave no stone unturned in their defence, their exposition and their reconciliation with the facts of material science, as far as possible.

With the barbarous anthropomorphism of many Jews and Gentiles we have no sympathy whatever, and thus we shall offer no attempt at reconciliation with such conceptions of God as make him man's slave and puppet. Some people worship a god who might be one of the "elementaries" of the Occultists, so obedient do they expect him to be to all their requests. A great deal of so-called prayer is insolent dictation to the Supreme Being. Prayers are often offered at prayer meetings which tell God exactly what he ought to do and what to leave undone. Many changes are suggested by his creatures, who cannot understand why he does not profit by them. Now we do not wonder that persons who read the Bible indiscriminatingly and believe every word of it to be literal truth, should act as they do, because we are informed that Moses often persuaded the Lord to change his mind, and that whatsoever is asked of God in the name of Christ, believingly, shall be received.

Now, it becomes the duty of every rational student of Scripture, to throw such light as modern revelation enables him to throw upon obscure and misleading statements. Setting aside, this morning, all views of correspondences, we will deal critically with the texts in dispute. In a previous Discourse delivered in this hall, upon the "God and the Lords of the Bible," we stated, as you will remember, that the Ancients universally believed in planetary angels, in the tutelary or guardian spirits of nations, tribes, families and individuals, and thus the tribal dieties of the Hittites, Amalakites and others may have been at variance with the tribal or tutelary ruler of the Jewish clan. We are told in the Psalms that all Gods must bow to the one true God. Adonai, the Jewish name for God Jehovah, signifies the Eternal One, he who always was, i.e., he who is self-existent, and thus can have had no beginning. But it is not the Eternal One (Adonai) with whom the patriarchs interceded, but only his angel or representative. We are told that Abraham, on the plains of Mamre, encountered three angels or men, i.e., spirits in human form, who prophesied concerning the destruction of the wicked city, Sodom, whither two of them went at eventide to accomplish its overthrow. The one to whom Abraham paid the greatest deference is styled the Lord. It was quite common for the Ancients to address spiritual visitors as "my lord," and quite common for them to say, "thus saith the lord," when they spoke of the commands or instructions they had received from the spirit directors of human affairs, with whom they may have conversed by means of clairaudient and clairvoyant powers, or through the very ancient phenomenon of materialization or form manifestation, which was once far more common and triumphant in Oriental climes than it is now in England and America.

Now, is it not eminently rational to believe, that the Ancients used the word "lord" just as we use it to-day? A member of the Upper House of Parliament is a lord. Is he, therefore, the Almighty (Shadai)? Is he, therefore, a celestial being, one whose thoughts and intents are always pure? Is it not conceivable that lords may be cruel, capricious, tyrannical, unjust, while other lords are humane, charitable, wise, and sticklers for equity? No one who knows anything of ancient history can be unaware of the fact, that earthly rulers were frequently styled lords and gods, even while on earth, and that after their entrance into spirit life, many who had not been particularly virtuous while on earth were worshipped with divine honours.) Read the story of the deification of Romulus, in Roman history, for example. Read words attributed to Jesus by the Evangelist, who declares that he reminds those who criticize his authority, that those were called gods upon whom the spirit came. Turn to the account given in the Acts of the Apostles, of the desire of the multitude to worship Paul and Barnabas, as Mars and Jupiter respectively, because of the wondrous healing powers these mediums for the Spirit had exercised, and you will see in a moment that between the Eternal One, the Infinite God, whom no man hath seen at any time, and these innumerable lords, the Jewish law itself forbade any comparison to be drawn. Does not the Decalogue forbid you to liken God to any thing in heaven above or in the earth beneath? Is it, then, just to infer, that crude anthropomorphism or a degraded creature or hero worship is that original and pure Monotheism, which is and always has been Israel's pride and glory? God is a spirit, invisible, incomprehensible, without parts and passions, unchanging, ever just and kind and wise, according to the best rational commentators upon the Law and the Prophets. (The lords were only human spirits, many of them near the earth, not yet having outgrown earthly pride and prejudice. They were fallible and changeable, and were in many instances only the familiars of a priesthood, which was not always above sacrificing spirituality for worldly considerations.

Now, that you can invoke such spirits as these, that you can really order about spirits, who, if not your inferiors, are certainly not more than your equals, is very reasonable to infer. Without resorting to the "elementaries" of the Theosophists, we may find many dwellers upon the threshold of earth, who are quite ready to do all in their power to further the worldly interests of those who summon them. Very earth-bound spirits, when left to themselvers, are poor, forlorn, miserable beings, blind, deaf, and altogether impotent in the world of spirits. Devoid of spiritual perception, they are miserable out of the flesh, having lost every means of enjoyment. As their pleasures are purely sensuous, if they can control any of you, if they can borrow your organisms to work through, if you will supply them with animal magnetism which they can manipulate, they will often gladly follow you about, and look after your temporal interests as best they can. But they are very fallible, because wisdom belongs only to exalted states of spiritual being.

At the expense of this digression, which we have found necessary to amplify our subject and make plain to you our philosophy, we will return to the topic, prayers for rain, &c., and request you to discriminate closely between an effective and a useless petition, independent of the form of speech in which the desire of the mind is clothed. It is of course impossible even for the Almighty to answer all prayers addressed to him in the letter, as one person who is a devout believer in the efficiency of prayer may be praying for rain at the instant when some one equally devout is praying for fair weather; and it is incredible that God should favour one petition and reject the other, and yet remain no respecter of persons. But when prayer for rain is steady, continuous, and united, when large congregations of earnest people, all over the land, are uniting their wills and desires at a given time for a given result, we are not bold enough to say that no result follows upon this concentration of mind and united direction of will. Not that there can, in any case, be any possible change in the laws of nature, but these laws of nature are found to be, by spiritual students, only the exercise of will, and then it must be borne in mind that the weather is, after all, to a great extent, under man's control. Man has the power to plant trees and also to uproot them. Where trees have been planted rain has been brought to districts where no rain has been known to fall within the memory of man; and where trees have been uprooted, there rain has ceased falling and the land has become barren. Thus the command of rain is not physically or scientifically anything like an impossibility, and who shall say to what extent united mind may influence the material world?

But the spiritual aspects of the question leave these physical points to be decided by human experience. The spiritual nature of Prayer is altogether independent of any physical result. You may, perhaps, have prayed for rain thousands of times, and never have succeeded in getting a single drop; but if you prayed for rain because you saw the flocks dying and the harvest shrivelling, and your heart was touched at the thought of the multitudes who would suffer starvation unless rain came, and thinking in that plight rain was the only saviour, you prayed for it, meaning all the while that you longed to succeed in inducing the higher powers to bless the sufferers of earth, the spirit of your prayer ascended to celestial abodes. your own spirit was enlarged and refreshed; you received spiritual rain upon your own heart, and while the higher wisdom you invoked may have given only a spiritual answer to your prayers, the response came spiritually to the spiritual craving and effort of your mind. Prayer, then, is mental effort. It is nothing physical. It can afford to do without words, or it may externalize itself through them. But its efficacy is due to its nature, and in any case it places you in communion with spirits whom you summon by encouraging and expressing thoughts which are, to them, attractive and agreeable. Pray unselfishly for another's benefit, and you can never pray in vain. Pray for self only, and you form no alliances with pure and unselfish spirits.

It is not claimed by us, as we have before stated, that the laws of being are changed to suit our needs, or in obedience to our requests. If the Author of all being be infinitely good, and if the laws of being are the regular and orderly manifestations of his nature and will, then if we could change them or their Author in the slightest degree, we should be cursing and not blessing the universe. It is utterly incompatible with reason to suppose that an angel more far-seeing than yourself would humour you to your injury, because you asked for something ignorantly which it would be your destruction to receive. In human ignorance man prays for many things which would destroy him if he received them. A child may look upon a beautiful bottle, filled with clear, transparent, sparkling liquid, and cry for it, urge the parent to let him just taste of it if no more, because it looks so bright and delicious. The parent, knowing it is poison, steadily refuses it. The child cries bitterly, thinks his mother very cruel, because she has denied his request. It grieved her to refuse her little one, and make him cry, but could she poison him to gratify his whim? and, had she granted his request, would she not have been taking a dastardly advantage of his ignorance? The letter of the child's cry was for poison, but the spirit of it was for some cooling, delicious beverage. Angels cannot heed the letter of your cries. You are so blind you often ask for poisons; they, knowing what you really need, give you a bitter draught of purging medicine when you petition them for unwholesome sweetmeats. But in the depths of your hearts, when you are not quite bereft of reason, you must feel thankful if you can only realize the blessing of a withholding as well as of a conferring Providence.

On earth you often hate to suffer. You cannot see any use in sorrow and pain, and so long as you look upon suffering as the arbitrary result of the wrath of God, we do not wonder at your resistance. If you cannot see beyond the grave, we are not surprised that you bemoan earthly inequalities. But when you shall have attained to angelic states, and shall have become endowed with the angel's wonderful power of retrospection as well as prophecy, for nothing will you be more thankful than for life's cares and crosses, for without them all the beauty and sweetness of celestial life would be lost upon you. No heart is strong in loving, that has not suffered. No soul can sympathize, who has felt no grief, and thus in place of the cherubic and seraphic throng of pure and happy souls, who in their unfallen splendour have never known earthly trial and sorrow, Spiritualism reveals to you angels who are of your own race, who have suffered on this or some other earth, as you are suffering, and who now enjoy what you will never enjoy, unless you bear the cross, and thereby earn the crown.

If Spiritualism demonstrates anything it is the law of equity; if it destroys anything it is the idea of substitutionary suffering, earning for you unmerited bliss; if it declares any truth more vividly than another it is that pain is disciplinary, educational, remedial, but never punitive in the vindictive sense in which the word "punishment" is too often employed; and because of its close alliance with the teachings of that Christ, who condemned retaliative measures in no measured accents, it is the target at which abuse is ever levelled by those divines and their followers who boast of the Christian name; who make profession of discipleship to Jesus, and yet not only countenance but positively advocate capital punishment, the vilest forms of human pollution, and a thousand-and-one kindred abuses utterly at variance with the sublime spirituality of that "Sermon on the Mount," which they verbally acknowledge as infallible truth, the direct word of the incarnate Deity, but which they resolutely set aside in every law court in the land. So long as capital punishment is allowed to stain the British escutcheon, the Gospel of Jesus will be a dead letter in England, and Christianity a spurious imitation of gospel teachings. So long as spiritual methods of healing are not only tabooed but even legislated against in Christian lands, the acknowledgment of the Bible as a divine book will make the Church and Nation a laughing-stock. So long as cures by faith and prayer are repudiated, and the plain teachings of Jesus are laughed to scorn in the popular magazine and newspaper. and even in the pulpit, infidelity will have its own way, and the latest theological hobby, "conditional immortality," will be ere long exchanged for no immortality at all. If the spiritual medium, who heals by laying on of hands, is a quack or an impostor because he does not use drugs and minerals, or exhibit a diploma or carry surgical instruments and bandages about with him, then Jesus is the founder of a school of quackery and imposture, because he declared concerning his followers—"They shall lay their hands on the sick and they shall recover." Then were all the apostles quacks and impostors; then were all the early Christians either poor, deluded fanatics, or in league with quackery and imposture, because they applied magnetized handkerchiefs and aprons to the bodies of those suffering from physical ailments, and cured mental disorders by spiritual power, not by the incarceration of victims of medical tyranny in lunatic asylums, where the poor, crazy sufferers are made ten times worse by the harsh treatment they often receive, and the cruel isolation from all their friends consequent upon their captivity.

Spiritualists are accused of not building hospitals, not doing practical work by employing organized agencies, to remove crime, disease and insanity. Perhaps it will be found on closer inspection, that institutionalism does far more to aggravate crime and misery than to relieve these evils. The Roman Catholic Church is far more entitled to respect than are the Protestant organizations, because this Church has never repudiated spiritual gifts, though it has oftentimes greatly erred and abused its power, by attributing to satanic agency every manifestation which resisted the control of the Church. The manifestations at Lourdes, at Knock, Ireland, in various parts of France and elsewhere, are genuine beyond doubt. Chronic cases of palsy, epilepsy, &c., &c., have been permanently cured through spirit agency, with the assistance of priests who are strong magnetizers and spirit mediums. But this power of healing is not locked up in the bosom of the Romish Church. The Virgin Mary and the many saints canonized by Rome, have not the exclusive power and right to heal men's minds and bodies. The unlettered country girl, who is sent for to see her dying mother, and who reaches home just when her mother's life is despaired of by the physician, throwing herself down in a paroxysm of grief, tears and supplication at her mother's bedside, brings back to life the beloved parent whom no medical skill can save. She is praying frantically to God to save her mother, and all the while she is answering her own prayers. Every pore in her skin is open; she is violently agitated, and parting with her life-force copiously—her love, her sympathy, her intense desires for her mother's recovery ally her with kind, gentle, and powerful healing spirits. She who knows nothing of magnetism, psychology, or Spiritualism; she who has not the faintest idea of the power of will, and knows not the first thing about directing her magnetism to the healing of disease, is having it directed for her by unseen hosts, and her prayer is answered in harmony with these wonderful psychological laws which are to-day being studied alike by scientist and peasant.

Ask and ye shall receive, seek and ye shall find, Nature says to all her children. Open your windows, and the light and air are yours. Close them, and you may suffocate in darkness. Fathom the laws of being, and understand prayer as spiritual effort simply, and you will know that when the soul works, it may accomplish the end it seeks, while, if it be idle, the field wherein the treasure lies is all uncultivated.

Prayer is not to supplant, but to supplement and crown exertion. Muller, of Bristol, who relied on prayer for many years to support his orphanages, was a most industrious man, an indefatigable worker. Dr. Cullis, of Boston, U. S. A., who keeps open his Consumptives' Home by prayer, is very energetic. Do not, we beg of you, run away with the idea that you may pray instead of working. Prayer is work in itself, and no one who wishes to shirk labour and pray in idleness will receive any blessing therefrom.

Prayer is the desire of the Soul, and according to the nature of your aspirations will be the character of the respondents to your petitions, and the likelihood of your blessing humanity through their agency.)

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE WAY TO GOD.

A CHILD kneels at his mother's knee, and lisps his little prayer:
"O God! O Father! high in heaven, o'er me exert Thy care;
Send down some blest angelic guard, to watch me while I sleep,
And bless my father, far away, sailing across the deep!
Bless mother, bless my sisters dear, my little brothers, too,
And help me in my daily life, to be to duty true!"

A sailor, wandering o'er the main, sees the pale moon at night,
Shine softly, as in bygone years it shed its mellow light
Over his old, beloved home, in country lanes so far;
He gazes toward the silent heavens, and sees the evening star,
And straightway all his heart goes back, across the briny sea,
And he remembers, when a child beside his mother's knee,
He prayed that God would make him good, and make his life sublime,
And now, in manhood's riper way, he prays the same old rhyme,
But slightly altered, e'er he sleeps: "Our Father!" he repeats,
Then hears no more until the storm against his cabin beats,
And he, old seaman though he be, crouches in fear and dread,—
A storm has risen o'er all the main, by it the ship is led
Over the rocks, where quicksands lie, and e'er he draws a breath,
A fearful cry goes up from those who dread an awful death!

"Oh, save me!" screams, in accents wild, a mother; at her breast
A little infant sleeping lies, as bird in soft, warm nest.
The child hears not the awful storm, knows not of danger nigh,
But suddenly awakes to hear his mother's startled cry;
And then, with tiny arms outspread and eyes distent with fear,
He looks into his mother's eyes, and sees her bitter tear.

"Oh, save my child!" the mother shrieks, in accents piercing, wild.
"If you have known a mother's love, Oh, save my darling child
And save me, also, lest so lone and desolate he be,
That even should I pass to heaven, and know his misery,
My crown, and harp, and palm would be a weight I could not bear:
I only ask to live for him—O Father! hear my prayer!"

Straightway the gallant seaman flies to rescue, swift to save;
A lifeboat speedily he brings, and from their watery grave,
Parent and child are rescued both, and safely reach the land,
While the brave seaman struggles on, to save the rest who stand,
Timid and faltering, on the wreck, till, lo! his strength gives way,
And quickly he falls overboard, swept by the waves away!

"Our Father!" is his dying prayer: "Father! I come to Thee!
Oh, gather me among Thy sheep, unworthy though I be!"
Scarcely the words have left his lips, when, lo! his eyes grow dim,
They see not the retreating earth, he hears a heavenly hymn,
A tender voice sings in his ear: "My son! I wait for thee;
Now earthly storms no more can tear my darling child from me!"

Oh! say, what mortal tongue can speak the glories of that state,
Where angel spirits, full of love, for all earth's shipwrecked wait?
Was that instruction lost on him, when at his mother's knee,
He learned to lisp his infant prayer: "Father! take me to Thee!"

All through his life, a brooding love could ne'er forgotten be;
That love was his bright, polar star, on land or on the sea.
The memory of that little prayer, in childhood he did say,
Kept bright, within his heart, a spark of love's eternal ray.

The mother and the child he saved, can ne'er forget to pray
For him, their rescuer from death; they cry to God each day,
For him who saved them from the storm. They do not know he stands
In spirit, close beside them both, with outstretched, loving hands.

No prayer is lost! The way to God is open unto all;
No soul can cry in its distress, and vainly voice its call;
God's angels are around, and they His messengers are made;
They come as they in ancient time came, where the patriarch laid.

Prayer is the ladder Jacob saw: your prayers are angels mounting up, Answers are angels coming down, to place life's waters in your cup.
Be brave! the way to God is wide, and all may pass that way;
Desire to bless your brethren, then through pure desire you truly pray!

BENEDICTION.

May the prayer of your every heart, be an aspiration of perpetual work for man; and, striving to bless your brethren, may you realize the fulness of God's Benediction, and possess His Peace within your hearts for ever!

X.

THE TRUE GIFT OF HEALING, AND THE TRUE SPIRITUAL PHYSICIAN.

(Delivered on Hospital Sunday.)

ACCORDING to long-established custom in the Metropolis, one Sunday in every year is set apart for special consideration of the claims of certain very deserving charitable institutions, Hospitals, Dispensaries, and Convalescent Homes in particular, when collections are made at almost all the churches and synagogues in the city and suburbs, in aid of these philanthropic institutions, and philanthropic they truly are.

From this remark, you will see at once that our Discourse on this occasion will be in no sense condemnatory or oppositional. We have no fault whatever to find with the machinery already in motion for relieving pain and healing sickness, but the cry on every hand is, that the provision made is lamentably insufficient. Though the population of London, including all the adjacent towns included in the Postal District, is probably at the present moment nearer five millions than four, the number of beds, in all the hospitals put together, is very considerably under 10,000, and when we take into consideration the fact that at least half of this immense population is made up of persons whose circumstances will not permit of their having the best medical assistance the country affords, comfortable accommodation, and good, nourishing diet, anywhere out of a public institution, in case of accident or illness depriving them of their ordinary means of earning a livelihood; when we also remember the further fact that these institutions are frequently most painfully crippled in their means of usefulness by the inadequacy of the pecuniary support they receive, and when we remember also, that a very large number of persons dread going to a hospital more than words can express, it is surely high time that public attention was called to other methods of healing than those adopted by regular medical practitioners, especially to those methods which are so simple and yet so wonderfully efficacious that they can be employed in every home without danger or risk of failure.

(The present medical knowledge of the world is a boon for which all should be thankful, and never against knowledge, but always against monopoly solely, should the voice of the reformer be raised. Undoubtedly there are cases at the present day which require the surgeon's knife and the learned physician's skill; at the same time we have no hesitation in declaring that the time is fast approaching when mineral medicines, at least, will be employed no more, while surgery will die a natural death as accidents become scarcer, and the Gift of Healing is so far developed and employed as to do away with amputations and excisions almost entirely.)

As many of you are, no doubt, Bible students, and as some of you have only very recently severed your connection with orthodox Christian churches, while others again may still be members of one or other of the orthodox bodies, it will, no doubt, be interesting to most of you, at least, if we endeavour to explain the miracles of healing recorded in the New Testament, by the aid of such light as we can bring to bear upon them, through our experiences with healing by spirit-power and magnetic influence in the present day; while Jews and Christians, alike giving credence to the Old Testament, may be ready to hear what may be said from a spiritual point of view concerning those wonderful phenomena which are said to have transpired through the agency of the divine, working through the earthly organisms of specially inspired prophets among the Hebrews.

Perhaps the most marvellous of all the stories in the Law with reference to this subject, is that of Elijah healing the widow's son at Zarephath. The account of this stupendous miracle will be found in the first book of Kings, chapter xvii., truly a chapter of miracles from beginning to end, and one which we do not wonder has puzzled many commentators and drawn out many diverse opinions, as its interpretation has been diversely attempted. The story at its commencement, of Elijah and the ravens, is now largely discredited, but among scholars its meaning has been rendered clearer by the change recently made in the reading. Instead of "ravens" we are now told by scholars to read "Arabs," or the wandering, almost savages tribes, who infested the desert, and were far more notorious for their depradations than their acts of hospitality and kindness. No doubt they were originally rendered savage by the attacks made upon them by their neighbours, and other more powerful and better armed peoples, and like all animals and men when subject to attack from others, they had become warlike and deceitful. (It is absurd to blame the dweller in tents in the desert for his ferocity or his treachery, and then applaud the manœuvres of disciplined armies, and justify a man for springing upon a burglar in the dark and shooting him, while the death penalty is not yet repealed either in England or America.)

It is fear and constant exposure to hostile influences that make men and animals dangerous and savage. Even a domestic cat or dog will become very dangerous if it has been perpetually teazed and irritated from kittenhood or puppyhood while children who are unnecessarily thwarted by their parents or guardians, and who have to fight for everything they obtain, are not very likely to grow up docile men and women.

The story of Elijah and these wild Arabs is intensely instructive and suggestive, and while Dr. Talmage and other sensationalists and mountebanks in the pulpit, endeavour to persuade their unthinking followers that modern revisions of ancient texts do away with the spirituality and beauty of them altogether, these poor literalists have no eyes for the larger, while they gullibly endorse the lesser, miracle. Elijah was safe among the Arab hordes or Bedouins of the desert: not only was he safe among them, but he, a true servant and prophet of the Most High, was kindly, generously, and hospitably treated by them. They brought him bread and meat both morning and evening.

Our opinion is that this charming story forms part of the instructive history considered sacred by the wise old Hebrew fathers, because they saw in it a standing reproach to aggression and cruelty as means of subduing the hearts and wills of savages, and incorporated with the sacred canon many beautiful and thrilling tales, of how good and noble men found themselves safe everywhere, always conscious of God's protection, ever secure from danger, because they aroused not the hostility, but the love and respect for virtue, which ever lies latent in the breast of every savage, and even of every animal.

How much more helpful and inspiring is the new progressive view of miracles than that old literalism it is fast displacing; and may we not venture to predict, that, when the present wave of reactionary iconoclasm has spent itself in demolishing the rapidly decaying superstructure of superstition, which ignorance and priestcraft have built upon the rock of truth, the grand old Hebrew prophets will be revealed to the world, not as special favourites of Jehovah —in the old sense, for the new religion will despise favouritism and acknowledge one universal Spirit of impartial Love and Wisdom, as the Sovereign Ruler and Sustainer of all—but as men who were able to conquer difficulties others found insurmountable, by reason of the power within them, which gave them an authority and dignity none could withstand.

When we are told, farther on in the same chapter, that a hospitable widow at Zarephath entertained Elijah, and as a reward for so doing, found her barrel of meal and cruse of oil did not waste, we need not see in this anything more miraculous than the fact of kindness never going unrewarded; and if our eyes are not limited by purely earthly horizons, though we find sometimes that virtue goes in rags and wickedness in purple on the earth, and therefore cannot apply the story of that particular widow's immunity from loss in a literal sense to all outward benefactions, we may surely in the light of immortality take comfort with the blest assurance, that no one who ever takes compassion upon the sorrows and sufferings of a fellow child of God (and all are God's children), shall ever fail to be richly compensated in one way or another, either materially or spiritually on earth or in the hereafter: though it must never be forgotten that benevolence must be distinct from selfishness, or it is not, to use theological language, of the nature of grace. Should you give a large contribution to-day to some charitable institution, with a view to improving your worldly circumstances—remembering that the Bible says somewhere, that those who give to the poor and needy lend to God, and that whatever they lend to the Almighty will be paid back to them with liberal interest, good measure pressed down and running over—your actions are not benevolent except in seeming. Those who make merely a business transaction of giving, are like those in the 16th century all over Europe, who were accustomed to buy indulgences, and expected by sacrificing a little money, which the priests were always glad to receive, to be absolved from the consequences of sin in this world and the next. It was against this perfidious practice and atrociously immoral idea that Luther so vigorously protested, and though he was by no means a model man with a perfect theology, he was needed just when he lived, to bring into prominence the doctrine of justification by faith and not by works, which properly interpreted means neither more nor less than this, (that it is the spirit within, the motive which prompts to action, and not the act itself, which is precious in the sight of heaven, and entitles the doer of the deed to a place among the angels.)

But we must not linger upon this special topic to-day, except in connection with the work of HEALING, with which we have more directly to deal, and Faith as a necessary requisite in the modus operandi of Healing, has always excited considerable comment and controversy.

Throughout the New Testament we are told how inseparable are faith and the power to heal, or the ability to be healed. In some instances the Evangelists tell us that Jesus said to those whom he had cured of painful maladies and long-standing infirmities: "Thy sins are forgiven thee," and at other times his words were: "Thy faith hath made thee whole." Then we are informed that under somewhat different circumstances, Jesus could do no mighty works because of the unbelief of the people among whom he went. Again it is recorded that he marvelled, or was filled with astonishment, at their incredulity, and in those places he could work no miracle; and then at times his disciples came to him complaining that they could not heal, and he attributed their want of success to their own lack of faith, saying unto them: "O faithless and perverse generation! If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove: and nothing shall be impossible to you." All things are possible with God, and all things are possible to him that believeth unwaveringly in God, because the power of God through him can be perfectly expressed. In this hurried mention of many texts and circumstances scattered throughout the gospel narratives, we have given you a brief epitome of the general teaching of Jesus concerning healing, and that peculiar phase of it, the casting out of devils (unclean demons), allusions to which occupy a large part of the canonical New Testament.

We do not, of course, expect to be able to do anything more than give you the vaguest outline of the philosophy of this teaching in a single lecture, however, we shall not be so far discouraged by the shortness of our time and the magnitude of our subject, as to refrain from attempting to send you away from here with a few thoughts to turn over in your mind at your leisure, coupled with a few suggestions for the relief of suffering and cure of disease, which, we hope, you may all find of some use to you whenever called upon to minister to those whose minds or bodies are impaired.

We never read that Jesus, or his immediate followers or successors, carried cases of surgical instruments about with them, or that they prescribed or dispensed medicines of any kind. They relied entirely upon the word of power, faith, prayer, and similar spiritual and mental agencies. It is stated in one place, that Jesus told his disciples when they had not succeeded in performing cures and casting out impure spirits, that they must pray and fast, as the power to perform such wonders came forth only by prayer and fasting, and there is no reason why we should throw the slightest discredit upon this passage, though many advanced critics cast it out as an interpolation, for it agrees perfectly with the general tenour of the life and teaching of the great Galilean seer, as the Evangelists unitedly represent him.

He was a man of abstinence and prayer. He fasted forty days and nights prior to entering upon his public ministry, and constantly during his three years' active work he was accustomed to spend whole nights in prayer, and to withdraw himself to solitary places, feeding upon bread which fed the soul more than it affected the body. But whatever affects the mind reacts upon the body, while all physical ailments and conditions have a reactionary effect upon the spirit, so long as it remains embodied; therefore, food reform is not morally unimportant, while improved methods of sanitation are as effectual in helping to reform the morals, as they are in aiding the physical improvement of mankind.

It is fashionable to-day to ignore miracles, to laugh at the supra-material, to sneer at all the marvellous records of the past, classing them together as old wives' fables and nonsensical traditions, which the sooner we discard the better it will be for us. This is the Agnostic or purely negative and materialistic view of the subject, but among advanced thinkers of a higher and more intuitive type, the miracles afford a most fascinating basis for study and experiment. and while many eminently spiritually-minded persons discard the purely marvellous or magical, and lay no stress upon anything except what is purely moral, miracles lose nothing but gain a great deal by being lifted out of the letter into the spirit, for when spiritualized they are setters-forth of many of the sublimest truths the world has ever dreamed of, or longed to see made manifest on earth.

Theodore Parker was called an infidel by many, because he took an entirely spiritual view of the wonders said to have been performed by Jesus during his sojourn on earth. Had any one asked Mr. Parker during his ministry in Boston, thirty years ago, whether he believed in the literal raising of Lazarus, the literal opening of the eyes of men born blind, he would probably have answered No! but he would never have left the one, who addressed him seeking light, in the arid wilderness of blank denial; he would have at once begun to give you his views of how Jesus, as a great moral healer and emancipator, opened the mental eyes of those who were mentally and morally blind, and would have told you, in his gentle, persuasive, yet powerful and most emphatic manner, how much more important it was to improve morals and unfold mental capacity, to heal spiritual wounds and bind up broken hearts, than cure any number of purely physical ailments.

William Ellery Channing, another noted Unitarian, though of another school of thought, would, no doubt. have said he believed in the letter as well as the spirit; but Parker was so deeply imbued with a conviction of the eternal superiority of moral over physical changes, that he was, perhaps, too little accustomed to pay attention to the outward workings of the great spiritual law he so truly recognised, and fervently believed in, which renders possible, yea, probable, and, we may say, certain, those outward results, which though less valuable, perhaps, than the invisible and interior, are nevertheless the outward results and natural expressions in material life of the carrying out of those supernal principles of spiritual being, which have ever a material effect to produce in the upraising of man's material nature, when they are called into exercise in the mundane sphere.

It has often been appositely remarked, that extremes meet, and it is indeed strange to find that Roman Catholics have many ideas in common with the heresiarch Parker: though when he was in Rome, shortly before his passage to spiritual life, he so shocked some of the priests with whom he argued, that they pronounced his views favourable to idolatry. Only a short time ago we heard a Catholic priest declare, that the seven devils cast out of Mary Magdalene were the seven deadly sins, and this view is by no means uncommon among educated Catholics. Such interpretations as these go to the very root of the matter, and explain many very difficult and problematic questions which are constantly cropping up concerning sin and its connection with disease and suffering.

We are told in Genesis, that suffering entered the world by sin, that if man had never sinned, never rebelled against his Maker, never broken God's commands, that he would never have forfeited Paradise, but have enjoyed during his entire sojourn on earth, perfect immunity from distress of every kind; and this doctrine, usually considered the very quintessence of orthodoxy, is in perfect keeping with the views entertained by many Secularists, who declare that if the laws of nature are perfectly known and obeyed, that no one needs to suffer, and that when they are fully understood and implicitly followed, a Secular golden age will dawn upon the earth. On the other hand, Geology and all the natural sciences lead us inevitably to conclude, that animals died before man could appear on earth, while the New Testament rebukes the prevailing idea that all sufferers are sinners, and attributes to Jesus the following words concerning a man who was born blind, whom he afterwards healed: "Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him."

(No delusion is more painful, no doctrine more reprehensible, than that which teaches you to regard all sufferers as culprits undergoing chastisement for sins committed, while you, who are enjoying good health, pride yourselves upon your goodness. Such views are calculated to develop anything but charitable dispositions. The very best view we can take of suffering is, that it is an educator; it is a sign of imperfection surely, as we cannot expect suffering to be eternal, to have any part in the nature of God. No one wishes to suffer, and suffering is by no means capable of relieving monotony, and forming a pleasing change in the ordinary routine of life. Sin is the transgression of the law, says an Epistle, and if sin be merely a breach of law, either ignorantly or wilfully, then suffering, disconnected from pangs of conscience and remorse, may be due entirely to ignorance, while that suffering which is accompanied by the stings of an upbraiding conscience, can only proceed from wilful transgression of the moral law.

But it is no one's business to wait to know what has been the cause of suffering, before he sets to work to relieve it. Persons may have been ever so wilful, ever so profligate, their own evil acts may have brought upon them their present pitiable condition, but who shall dare to say that the present imperfect state of society is not largely responsible for the crimes and misdemeanours of the bulk of the people? Are we not all, in a sense, our brother's keepers, are any of us quite free from the imputation of having set temptations in the way of others, or failed to remove stumbling-blocks we might have taken out of our brother's way? It should ever be ours to treat the sinner, as well as the sufferer, as one wrestling with a painful and dangerous malady, and as you erect hospitals, not dungeons, for the physically sick and those afflicted with mental aberration, so you should abolish all loathsome prison-houses throughout the land, and see what constructive and reformatory measures will do towards ridding the world of the incubus of pauperism and crime which now oppresses it.)

The True Healer must be something more than a skilful medical practitioner, and he need not always be that. Healers must be born, not made. It is professionalism which produces bad doctors, bad clergymen, bad lawyers, and bad representatives of all trades and callings. Until very recently, only five occupations were considered fit for the sons of the gentry. A young gentleman, unless he could afford to live in idleness, which is often considered most genteel in the "upper circles" of society, must either enter the Church, or the legal or medical professions, unless he joined the Army or the Navy. Quite recently commercial life has been tolerated for the younger sons of the upper ten thousand, but even twenty years ago business in all its forms, as distinct from profession, was looked down upon with contempt. And with what result? The greatest injury to Church and State alike.

Many and many a young man has managed to take a degree at Oxford or Cambridge, and has entered the Church professionally. To him, conducting the public worship of God and exhorting the congregation was simply a means of obtaining a livelihood. Prayers were gabbled through as though ministers were parrots, sacraments were administered in so slovenly a manner that persons began to look upon all church ordinances as empty forms, meaningless ceremonies, while sermons, purchased wholesale for a few shillings the barrel, were read in so unedifying a manner in many churches, that it became customary in many places to sleep through them. Ministers of religion have been guilty of causing more than half the prevalent indifference to religion, and we can attribute the low ebb at which the life of the Church of England was found by the Tractarians at Oxford, when Dr. Pusey first became notorious, to nothing other than the making of the performance of what were called religious duties, a merely business act. The Dissenting Bodies in England have never become quite so formal as the Established Church, because it always needed some backbone, some pluck, some courage to be a Dissenter till very lately. In America, orthodoxy originally took the Congregational instead of the Episcopalian form of church government, therefore, across the Atlantic the Episcopal Church has rarely degenerated as much as in England, while all over the continent of Europe the Established Church has been the Roman, and there that church is losing, as rapidly as it is gaining in countries where it looks to the future to make progress, instead of to the past, as the time of its greatest triumphs.

Professionalism is always dangerous when it creeps into Religion, Science, or Art, though it is only just and right that workers should receive a proper remuneration for the time and energy they expend in any pursuit, but something more than professional activity is needed in the Church and out of it, if this country is to experience a genuine renaissance of religion or art. Does not the genuine Artist love his art, and does not the lover of art love it for its own sweet sake alone, or for the good he sees he can do through its agency? Ministers of religion, Physicians, Lawyers, Singers, Teachers, Painters, must all be voluntary and enthusiastic workers in their special fields of industry. or they are not really in their right places. A person who loves public life only because of the èclat, excitement, and emolument connected with it, may be a brilliant professionalist, but can never interpret truly the beauties and the mysteries of his art.

Do you think Milton composed verse only for fame and money? Do you think Beethoven wrote music without feeling it in the very depths of his own soul? Could Angelo or Raphael have painted as they did, unless their souls were in their work? Did Massillon or Fenelon preach as hirelings, and have your truest physicians ever gone about among the poor and suffering, thinking only of their fees? Do not imagine we are denying the oft-quoted truism: "The labourer is worthy of his hire." If you reap spiritual advantages sown for you by others, as the apostle says, it is a small matter if the spiritual workers come in for a share, even a large share of your temporal wealth. But should any feel that were they wealthy they would work no longer, they have experienced within them their own unfitness for the work in which they are now engaged. We wish to especially emphasize this thought to-day, as it bears directly upon what we have to say of true Spiritual Healers.

We hear a great deal of Magnetic Healers and Healing Mediums, but do we sufficiently take into consideration the importance of those purely spiritual qualifications which, in their vast importance, far outweigh all the minor considerations of temperament and physique, which weigh so much with many. The true Healer is a sympathizer. No truly sympathetic person is destitute of healing power, or fails to exercise it, though often he employs it unconsciously to himself. The very food you prepare becomes charged with your life-emanations, and persons should beware of a discontented or ill-natured cook, for many are the evils consequent upon eating food prepared for you by persons who are not kindly disposed to you. Have you not often remarked that the very simplest food tastes better at home than most expensive fare in large and fashionable restaurants? There is an indescribable something about home cooking which renders all food pleasant and nutritious; if your home be a true one, and links of affection bind its inmates together.

Some persons laugh at the idea of personal magnetism being conveyed from one article to another, or from human bodies to whatsoever comes in contact with them, while they are quite ready to believe in infectious disorders, contagious diseases, &c., &c. In a word, they believe in the power of disease over health, but not in the power of health over disease. Such theories form part of devil-worship. They are a practical avowal of belief in the devil and disbelief in God, and it should be the special endeavour of every Theist to combat them as resolutely as he combats their counterparts in the realm of morals. "Evil communications corrupt good manners." "One black sheep makes many." These, and similar proverbs, are only half truths. Is not the other side of the question true also? Why not have a proverb: One white sheep makes many; good communications are antidotes to evil manners. These and similar aphorisms becoming common sayings, would do an immense deal to leaven the thought of the age with a purer philosophy than that which takes its rise in the odious and blasphemous doctrine of the total depravity of human nature.

How any one can deny total depravity, see its fallacy and not fight down the prevalent fallacy of the infectious character of disease, while good health is said not to be communicable, would be a paradox unless we knew how very slowly reforms make their way, and how relentless is medical bigotry, and how unwilling people are to think for themselves on questions of health, instead of employing doctors to think for them. A gentleman said to us one day, speaking of auricular confession, bringing forward an argument in its favour: "Do you not think it a good thing, perhaps, to entrust your soul to the keeping of a priest, as you would entrust your body to a physician?" Our reply evidently startled him. It was substantially as follows: "We think it so bad a thing to entrust your body to the keeping of a physician, that we scarcely think your illustration does anything more than afford another argument against the practice you are inclined to uphold." The gentleman said further: "But have not doctors special training, and are they not specially qualified for the work they take in hand?" We merely replied: "We hope so, and we hope the same of ministers of religion, but no more fatal error can be fallen into than resigning yourselves unthinkingly into the hands of anybody. You have reason and conscience of your own, and while you may profit by advice, you must ever turn for highest counsel and guidance to those inner voices, which have been in every age the special directors of man, from the times of the earliest history to the present moment."

God has specially revealed himself to his children, through the inner voice of the Spirit, and this inner voice, as we said in our lecture on "Reason and Intuition," is the final and authoritative court of appeal, to which each human being can turn in his extremity.

We hear so much to-day about animal magnetism, galvanism, and electricity as healing forces, that one is often apt to imagine that, as the terms magnetism and electricity are often employed by spirits as well as by Spiritualists when they speak of the means whereby cures have been affected, these purely physical agents constitute the total resources of the spirit-world and its instruments, and constitute together a universal nostrum efficacious at all times, under all circumstances. We certainly do not and cannot deny that great good has often been accomplished by material agents, when under spirit direction, but these material agents have no power to heal you unless intelligently directed. Now, it very often happens, that persons who have no idea that they possess any healing power, are the greatest healers, but these are usually persons of kind and sympathetic nature. They wish to relieve pain, and would gladly do so voluntarily if they only knew how, and it is a source of unceasing regret to many such, that they can do so little to relieve those around them. Belonging to this class are many true physicians, some are indeed in the medical profession, and these are the kind, good doctors you are always so glad to see. You never start nor shrink away when one of these approaches. No matter how ill or nervous you may be, the physician is your friend, your confidant. The very sight of his kindly face does you good, and you send for him whenever anything ails you, not so much because you have faith in the power of medicine to heal you, as that you instinctively feel you will get good if he only comes near you.

Men and women, who possess naturally this healing power, are the only ones who have really a right to offer themselves to the public, either as doctors or nurses; and as many of these sympathetic souls know nothing of materia medica, have had no hospital experience and no special training of any kind qualifying them for attendance in the sick chamber, it frequently happens that those from whom sufferers derive the most good, are persons who have no diplomas and no certificates. The world may call them "quacks," but they are invariably appealed to when ordinary methods have been relinquished as unavailing, and often by their means persons are raised to health and strength, even from the very jaws of death.

Of course, if accidents are simply local and physical, and persons are in no mental trouble and simply require the surgeon's assistance or the services of the herbalist, ordinary surgical and medical treatment does well enough, except in cases where physicians persist in employing mineral remedies, and these for the most part instead of being remedies are destructive to the constitution which they seem temporarily to purge, and to the use of such poisonous substances a large per-centage of unnecessary ailments, brought on no one knows how, may be traced.

Mineral electricity is now extensively employed as a therapeutic agent by many illustrious members of the medical profession, and when skilfully handled and judiciously administered it is a valuable acquisition, but in numberless instances, electricity pulls down but cannot build up. For dissipated and overfed persons, for all who are bloated, whose blood is impure and whose circulation is impeded by the presence of foreign matter in the blood and general sluggishness of the system, mineral electricity may be of service, but for sensitive, debilitated, nervous, overworked persons, of naturally delicate frames, with no great stock of vitality to draw upon at the best of times, electrical apparatus is often dangerous and destructive. Animal magnetism is far safer and far surer in its effects, as animal magnetism is in reality the concentrated essence of human life, vapourized and transmitted in the form of an invisible fluid from one organism to another.

Foods and medicines need to be digested and assimilated. Many systems are too weak to be able to do either. They cannot swallow food, they cannot digest or assimilate it, even if they succeed in forcing it down. In cases of utter exhaustion, and even seeming death, the body may be revivified by the infusion of magnetic life through the pores. And to return to the story of Elijah—Has it never struck you forcibly, how thoroughly the prophet magnetized the apparently dead child, while he called upon God to return the soul to the body it had just vacated, or about which it was hovering ere it took its final departure? Here we find prayer, earnest aspiration, intensely strong desire, fervent calling upon God, accompanied by earnest endeavour to restore life by physical manipulation. Elijah combined the use of animal magnetism, will-power, and spiritual fervour, and thus became a conduit or channel through which healing power from the spirit-world and the surrounding atmosphere could flow into the inanimate form, upon which he stretched himself three times, respiring heavily, by that means breathing out his bodily vigour into the boy's physical frame. The warmth and vitality penetrating every pore, mingling with the departing life force within, and enabling the returning spirit, assisted by Elijah's fervent will and prayer, to upbuild the earthly tenement, and restore her son whole to his mother's loving arms.

When Jesus healed a woman who had suffered twelve years from a painful malady, while she only touched the hem of his garment, it is said that as soon as she had touched him, he perceived that virtue had gone out of him. This virtue is the elixir of life, without which the body could not be sustained a single moment, and which, in forms invisible to ordinary sight, passes through the pores of the healer, saturating his dress, impregnating the air about him, and then reaching the negative, susceptible frame of the patient, finds an inlet and effects a cure. Health and disease are communicated in precisely similar ways. You know how timid people are about sending their clothes to a laundry, if they have the faintest suspicion of clothes being sent there which have been worn or used by persons suffering from certain diseases generally considered infectious. You know how alarmed some people are lest they should take the breath of a sick person, fearing it should contaminate them. All we ask you to accept is the demonstrable fact, that God was neither cruel nor insane when he ordained the laws of nature, and therefore in his universe it is not possible that while disease can be caught good health cannot be communicated from one to another. In the Acts of the Apostles, we are told that handkerchiefs and aprons were laid upon the apostles, and then transferred to the sick, and that these magnetized articles healed them, while so great was the faith of some in the power of one apostle, that they were satisfied if but the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow them. The only physical means of cure of the ordinary kind mentioned in the New Testament, are clay and oil. The oil is recommended by James, and it must be applied accompanied by fervent prayer; while the clay, which Jesus used to anoint the eyes of a blind man, was made from his own spittle; and those who have studied the matter know that the saliva of a healthy person, or even animal, is extremely efficacious as a healing agent, as even the tongue of a dog has been known to heal wounds which resisted all other modes of treatment.

You will, however, be careful to observe, that purely physical remedies can only be adequate to effect a cure when the injury sustained is of the body only. But how many of the poor invalids you meet in your daily walks are suffering from bodily ailments only? If the distress is mental, then the angel of healing in the person of some ready sympathizer and tender friend, is alone able to do the needed work. If illness proceed from financial embarrassment, or the lack of sufficient food or raiment, then, of course, it is useless to say, Be ye clothed and warmed and fed! unless you provide things necessary for the body. But how many are there who are suffering from ailments, brought on almost entirely by unhappiness and discontent! How many homes are wretched, how many have skeletons in their cupboards, who strive to appear gay! How many have secret griefs preying upon their mind, robbing them of rest and taking from them all appetite, utterly deranging all the functions of the body! Such cases as these baffle the physician's skill at every turn. They are ordered to Brighton or to Hastings, to Scarborough, to Wales, to Devonshire, to the Isle of Wight. A sea voyage is prescribed, but they may go to the antipodes, and return no better. Neither the sea air, nor the mineral springs, nor the fairest country scenes, nor the gayest Continental life, has cheered them.

They are unhappy, and it is to these the Spiritual Healer can turn and say, "Come unto me, ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Only sympathy, aided by direct spiritual ministration, can afford aid in such instances as these; and these are the most painful, chronic and important cases of all. To help these you need no great educational advantages or personal attractions. You need no copious supply of animal magnetic force, but you must have love for your neighbour; you must, at any rate, be willing to be an instrument under heaven for blessing and relieving your less fortunate and happy brethren; and if your soul goes out to others, and it is your prayer to help and heal them, you will inspire them with new faith, new courage, and the faith you have inspired will make them whole.)

Time forbids us to enter more deeply into this engrossing theme to-day. The little we have said will, we hope, induce you to inquire further into this beautiful truth.

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE POWER OF SYMPATHY.

THERE is a charmed, potent spell, which bindeth souls in love's embrace:
No mortal tongues the bliss can tell, which to this sacred fount we trace.
It is a balm for every wound, for every sorrow, every grief,
And none can fly to it in vain, for speedy succour and relief.

This grace divine is known on earth but feebly, for the chains of clay, Imprisoning your spirits here, full oft shut out its healing ray;
The laws and customs man has made, the barriers of land and sea,
Shut you away full oft from those, who are your own through sympathy.

But, wheresoe'er a kindred soul meets yours, in ways unknown to sense, Striking a sweet, responsive chord within your breast, you go not thence Without a rapture more divine than any earthly joy can bring;
It is as though an angel's voice did in your inmost being sing.

Throughout the realms of earth and mind, this subtle principle is traced, Affinity together binds the atoms, so that they are placed Nearest to those with whom they dwell in peace, attracted by some power,
Which, hidden deep in Nature's heart, compels them all to yield their dower.

As Goethe beautifully taught, there are affinitizing souls,
And heaven would scarcely heaven be unless this law of love controls.
Though, in a wide and boundless sense, angelic love flows free to all,
Still, e'en in heaven, there are some souls, whom yours, in special sense, you call.

Not through the ties of flesh and blood, are spirits bound through endless day;
Not by an earth-relationship, tread they the same celestial way;
But by a deeper bond than this, are they united on that shore,
Where only pure affection lives, when all the dreams of earth are o'er.

Sometimes a stranger crosses o'er your threshold, and you know him not
By any earthly bond, and still your spirit says, you've ne'er forgot
How, in some lifetime long ago, perhaps not on this earthly plane,
You've met and parted; now you meet again, and trace your kinship plain.

Sometimes when reading stories—old Iliads, and tales of long ago—
The author of some wond'rous prose or poetry awakes a glow, Responsive to his thought, within the inmost circle of your mind,
In spirit, you for him enquire, and you will him hereafter find.

No link of love can severed be, which bindeth souls in love's great chain,
No tender throb of sympathy can fail some day response to gain;
And if not here at all on earth, assuredly, for aye in heaven,
Will sympathy make known to you her perfect power, when earth is riven.

Is there a heart within this room—is there a soul in any place—
Who strives some other life to bless, and knows not by what means of grace
The heart forlorn may reached be? Then, seeing not an open door,
You need not sigh, in vain lament, for him ye think so lone and poor!

Your sympathy can traverse seas! No continents can bar its course;
It flies as on the wings of light, impelled by love's resistless force.
And oftentimes, when ye have felt a thrill of gladness through your pain,
It has but been a loving heart returning to your side again,
In sleep, or reverie, or trance, or some bright angel from above,
One who has loved you many an age, consoling you with heavenly love!

BENEDICTION.

May Love's celestial power,
  And Sympathy's sweet might,
Protect your every Life
  From Sorrow's chilling blight;
And may ye Angels be,
  To ease the world's dull pain,
And, through a Life of gentle Love,
  Heaven's highest Homes attain!

AMEN.

XI.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE AND USE OF FIRE.

OUR subject to-day is one of extreme interest and great importance from a spiritual point of view, and even from a material standpoint it is not an unprofitable or unattractive theme for consideration.

Fire was accounted one of the "four elements" by the Ancients, and was said to be inhabited by a class of beings called salamanders, the highest and purest of elementary spirits, whose work in connection with the earth was to purify and redeem it.

Many modern theorists, speaking of the past of this planet, state that once the earth was enveloped in a fire-mist, and that as this gradually cleared away the atmosphere was rendered pure and wholesome, and the earth slowly became fit for human habitation.

In the Kabala Fire always means the purifying or redeeming element.

Among the Rosicrucians Fire was considered necessary to accomplish the marvellous feat of transmutation, by means of which all metals were said to be at length convertible into gold.

Fire, in the Old Testament, is always introduced as a test of divine power, as in the story of Elijah and the prophets of Baal. We are told that Elijah and Baal's worshippers agreed, that the true God was the one who should make known his presence by fire. Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego were thrust into Nebuchadnezzar's burning fiery furnace, heated seven times beyond its usual heat, and because the fire consumed neither them nor their apparel, they were known to have been on the side of right, and genuine servants of the Most High.

In the New Testament, Jesus takes up the symbol, and employs Fire to signify corrective chastisment, and all processes of purification, both in this and other realms of being; while Paul, following in this respect closely in the footsteps of his master, says, the fire shall try every man and the work of every man, and those who can abide the test by fire, without suffering the loss of their possessions or the destruction of their work, shall receive a reward, but those whose work is burned shall themselves be saved, yet so as by fire.

The Roman Church, the Greek Church, and the high Anglican Church all endorse certain views of purgation after death, and admit the existence of the fires of purgatory for those whose sins are only venial. But unhappily for the interests of true religion, all these churches couple the infamous doctrine of everlasting torment for those who die in mortal sin, with the reasonable and scriptural fact of purification through suffering of those whose crimes are of a milder hue.

At the time of the Protestant Reformation, Luther and others found the doctrine of purgatory overlain with rubbish and overgrown with weeds. The reformers of the 16th century, like Cromwell and his followers in the 17th, honestly endeavoured to put an end to abuses, to root up tares, and save the precious wheat in all instances from destruction. But, unfortunately, in the one case nearly all the poetry of religion and much that contained spiritual truth was removed, while in the other and later development of Protestantism, everything beautiful in art was assailed, and sweet sounds were considered a profanation of the temples if they were supplied by instruments assisting the human voice.

In periods of reformation the sword always goes before the Prince of Peace, and has a part to play in making the way ready for those who are to sow germs full of spiritual vitality, in gardens long occupied by noxious weeds, which it seems in many instances impossible to uproot without plucking up some of the flowers of religion also. The task of an iconoclast is an extremely hard and unpoetical one, and in order to be an iconoclast or idol-breaker, one must have a stern, rugged disposition, a great deal of self-assurance, and very little respect for antiquities; yet the iconoclast need not be, and often is not, an unkind or heartless man.

Ingersoll, in America, who is one of the most determined opponents of the prevailing creeds, and whose lectures are often extremely denunciatory, bears a charming reputation among those who know him, as an excellent husband, father, neighbour and citizen. People say he is extremely kind-hearted, and we can quite understand how a very humane and tender-hearted man or even woman, can take just Ingersoll's position, without intentionally causing any real pain to any who seek to derive genuine consolation from what is beautiful in religious conceptions.

Surely annihilation would be a milder doom than everlasting torment; surely a universe that governs itself would be a better universe to contemplate than one governed by such a God as the one depicted by Calvin. All protest against what we feel to be religious truths, has been merely an inundation caused by a vigorous downpour of honest and needful assault upon doctrines so atrocious and so conspicuous, that to get rid of them, even at the expense of some poetry and even truth, was a desideratum, and when we feel certain, as we must if we have any confidence in the immortality of truth itself, that no truth can be destroyed, that though apparently dead it rises into new and more glorious life, seeming the stronger and lovelier for its every apparent defeat, we can but welcome the storm and tempest which lay it low, knowing that when seemingly crushed, it is only gathering strength for fresh encounters with error, and that its own intrinsic utility and self-evident rectitude, if nothing else, will render it at length acceptable to progressed and enlightened man.

Let us, for an instant, look at the effect produced by literal fire in the material world. There is nothing nervous people dread so much as being burnt. Drowning is said to be comparatively an easy death. It is not the sinking of a ship but the burning of a ship at sea, with water all around it, that seems so terrible. You can scarcely bear to hear the description of a burning wreck, on which are human beings or even animals. It is the sound of the fire-engine which alarms you more than any other sound, until you get thoroughly accustomed to it, by hearing it so often and learning to place deserved confidence in the noble army of firemen, whose bravery and efficiency can scarcely be over-appreciated. But still the dread of fire in all large cities, and in large hotels especially, makes the lives of many people a burden to them, while the electric flash inspires terror in the breast of millions.

It is certainly true, that fire is in a physical sense a very dreadful and a very deadly thing. No one can witness a volcano in eruption, without being pretty thoroughly convinced of the real existence of the old traditional lake of fire in the bowels of the earth. No one can be out in a raging storm, without feeling deeply awed by the tremendous power of the lightning, which with its livid flame can in an instant fell the stoutest forest tree, and lay low a building whose foundations are in the granite rocks, and which has successfully withstood the action of all other elements. It is not hard to account for that old-world dread of evil deities, and of the anger of the Supreme, which was and is so fearfully manifest to superstitious minds in the action of the raging element.

But is not Fire the saviour as well as the consumer of the earth? Is it not through fire that earth and air are purified, being rid by the activity of this fell destroyer of what would inevitably produce its ruin, were it not for the interposition of this awful deliverer? It is the lightning which destroys blight. After a thunderstorm the air is purer, the earth fresher, and all conditions of life healthier. The maximum result of the work of lightning is good, only the minimum is evil; and is it not so with those fearful city fires, which have brought desolation in their train to thousands? If thousands have been made to suffer, millions have been made to rejoice, and if either the many or the few must suffer, then humanity and wisdom alike dictate that it is better to sacrifice the few and save the many, than to save the few and let the many perish. If fires are evils, then they are among lesser evils, not among the greater ones. They are impossible in a perfect state of civilization, and only occur where dirt, danger, and instability must sooner or later be removed, to make way for cleanliness, safety, permanence, and all the other necessary appurtenances and results of a perfect state of society.

Historically speaking, the praise of Fire is written in undying letters of flame, in the records of all great peoples. The fire of London in 1666 burned a great deal of property, very valuable to the holders of it, and caused much distress all over the city; but the fire burnt the plague also. Fire is in a certain good sense very often a most intelligent and discriminating respecter of persons and property. Electricity, its wild state in the atmosphere, seems to strike haphazard, but fires which break out in cities almost invariably burn down narrow streets of ill-built tenement houses. Wherever filth and disease are most represented, there the fire does its destructive work most quickly; wherever miserable shanties abound, and streets are so narrow that persons can almost shake hands with their opposite neighbours from the upper story windows, fires destroy most rapidly and effectually.

In America, the fires of Boston and Chicago have made both those cities much healthier, safer and more beautiful. The distress the fires occasioned awoke great sympathy with the sufferers, and did positive good, in awakening feelings of compassion for others in the breasts of those who were not grievous sufferers themselves; while, had those fires not broken out when they did, it is difficult to decide as to how far inferior in all respects those two great cities would have been to what they now are. Modern buildings, models of comfort, elegance and safety, almost perfect in their sanitary arrangements, now occupy sites formerly disfigured by wooden structures, which, had they lasted much longer, would have occasioned much disease and distress, and been great hindrances to the increase of commerce, unless they had been pulled down.

Some people will think, very naturally, that it would have been much better to have pulled them down, and built others before the fire broke out. Perhaps it would, but the fire had other work than merely to remove impediments to business, by destroying rickety buildings. Fire is a great purifier and transmuter, and has manifold uses to serve in the chemical changes produced in the vicinity of its activity. It is a well-attested fact among agriculturists, that fire so far changes the condition of soil, that plants and vegetables will grow on land where the soil has been burnt, which never could be made to grow there till after the fire had changed the soil, while other kinds of vegetation died out and could not be reproduced after the outbreak. Fire destroys many kinds of animalculæ, which are the floating germs of disease in the air, and which would attack many hundreds of persons, causing a fearful increase in the rate of mortality, did not fire consume them; while in addition to these purely sanitary facts, we must not overlook some curious instances, which have come under our notice, of the effects of fire upon disembodied spirits, who are yet dwellers upon the earth or in its atmosphere, owing to the materiality of their states of mind, and the earth-bound character of their affections.)

Of course, purely physical fire cannot affect disembodied spirits, therefore, one of the arguments against a literal hell has been, that it would destroy a physical structure almost instantly, and then the spirit would no longer feel pain. But there are fire-resisting substances, and chemical substances may be applied to the human body, causing it to resist fire, but with these we have not now immediately to do, and it surely cannot be supposed that God has ordained the resurrection of all who die in sin, in fire-proof bodies at the last great day, for the express purpose of securing to them an eternity of torment. Such an act can hardly be considered possible, if God be an infinite tyrant. If he be a God of Love, Wisdom, Justice, or anything men unitedly pronounce divine, such an action must be impossible to him.

There is a most remarkable passage in the New Testament which logically teaches that there are, and in the very nature of things there must be, limits to Deity, and limits so arbitrary that they are eternal fixities involved in the very nature of the Divine Being. The Infinite is necessarily limited by its own infinitude. The passage to which we refer is to be found in the account given by Paul of his view of the immutability of God's covenant, and the fixity of the divine decrees (see Heb., vi., 18). After enumerating many of the consolations naturally springing from a participation in the covenanted blessings, which are secured to all who obey the prescribed conditions for obtaining them, he speaks of immutable things in which it was impossible for God to lie. Can a God of Infinite Truth ever tell a falsehood? Can he ever wish to tell one? Can a God of Infinite Wisdom ever be guilty of folly or know a foolish wish? Can a God of Infinite Love ever think an unkind thought, or a God of Justice ever will to do other than justly to the meanest as well as to the greatest and noblest of his creatures?

(It is impossible for God to be unkind, unjust, foolish or untruthful. He who is essential rectitude must do right. His Will is infinite in power, but that will can never be other than wise and clement, and it is just here that Theists throw overboard the infamous doctrine of everlasting torment, without even thinking it necessary to consider any fancied claims its apologists may think it has on the thought of the religious world. Orthodox Christians beg us to remember that Jesus advocated it, and therefore it must be true. To this plea, in its defence, we give the following shockingly heterodox answer: Even if Jesus did teach it, we still refuse to admit its claims, as there is that in the nature of the doctrine itself, which awakens a thrill of hatred and disgust for it in the hearts of all really humane people, who think about it, even while they are themselves assured that they will never suffer its agonies. But Jesus did not teach it! At all events, the Gospels do not say he did, though we admit there are passages in the New Testament which appear to favour it, and it is our province in this Discourse to consider the most notable of them, as they bear directly upon our present topic: the Value and Use of Fire considered Spiritually.

Only a few days ago, we heard a lecturer say Jesus invented the frightful dogma of everlasting torments. He did not. He preached against it, if the Evangelists speak truly, and it would be far too great a concession to the prevailing idolatry to allow that such a hideous dogma was ever conceived in the brain of any good and pure-minded man. It sprang from human barbarity and terror, in a savage age, and wherever it has prevailed it has been a destructive parasite, blasting religions and civilizations alike, justifying the sword of Mohammed and the horrors of the Inquisition equally. It is at the root of the upholding of unnecessary wars, and the death penalty in so-called Christian lands. Eliminate it utterly from the creeds of Christendom, and you have slain a viper which Christianity has nurtured for centuries in its bosom to its own undoing, so that the very term "Christian" is to-day held in contempt by many devout Theists, who have a strong admiration for the character of its alleged founder, as represented by the Evangelists.

Any student of Jewish history will see, in the reference made by Jesus to fire and worms as constituting elements of future punishment, direct references to the pit of Gehenna, a pit in which the fires were never allowed to go out. To a Jew, living in or near Jerusalem, the metaphor was singularly apposite as an illustration of the nature of future punishment. Gehenna was just outside Jerusalem, a pit where refuse of every kind was deposited. The fires, of course, were always kept burning as a sanitary precaution; they were everlasting fires, while the image of worms was drawn from the fact that worms were constantly found feeding on the rubbish which accumulated at the mouth of the pit. If the expression "everlasting fire" is used with reference to Gehenna, the allusion is very plain, the significance very clear. The fires are ever kept burning, not as a means of punishing the guilty with unending torment, but exclusively as means of consuming filth and keeping the city wholesome.

(Crematories have been established just outside the gates of ancient cities, as cremation was practised by many nations of antiquity, and in hot countries especially cremation is very far preferable to burial, and with an ever-increasing population, will soon be found necessary in England and the United States, as well as all over Europe, and in the thickly populated districts of the Orient, where cremation is a sanitary necessity. Cremation was practised by many of the most illustrious Orientals, and Lord Lytton in his descriptions of the "Coming Race," declares that they join in a very beautiful and impressive, but by no means melancholy, burial service during which the body is almost instantly destroyed by means of "vril," and that the ashes of the departed are preserved by the family. This is a distinct allusion to very ancient customs, and to the best of these the world is now turning in its almost frantic endeavours to improve upon existing imperfect modes of burial.)

In all allusions to cremation we find everything suggestive of purification, but nothing whatever of fire as a means of inflicting unending suffering. In the book of Psalms, you read the following words: "Thou hast tried us, O God, even as silver is tried; thou madest us to pass through the fire." Evidently the allusions are intended exclusively to refer to such corrective chastisement as purified the mind, and made the spirit of the warrior strong to encounter the difficulties and dangers of life, to which he would otherwise weakly succumb.

(The Trial by Fire was one of the greatest tests ever applied to the initiate into the Ancient Mysteries. If the candidate for honours could successfully pass the trial by fire, he was considered worthy of the highest office, and was revered as one under the special protection of the gods; while many legends, traditions and superstitions are rife in many countries, not excepting England, testifying to a feeling or belief, prevalent in greater or less degree in all countries, that the specially inspired are impervious to the effects of fire. Thus fire-eating and fire-resisting are among the tricks of modern conjurors, intended to simulate the wonderful performances of the magicians of the East.

Since the advent of Modern Spiritualism, the fire test has been applied to several mediums, and well-authenticated cases, in which mediums have resisted this element, are now published, and are accessible to all who wish to read the record of such truly marvellous phenomena. A lady in Chicago, some years ago, had her hands washed and closely examined by eminent chemists, to make sure that no fire-proof chemicals were upon them, before she submitted to the fire test. Then in the presence of many competent witnesses, who bear willing testimony to the genuiness of the occurrence, she bared the flesh of her arm, thrust it into a mass of live coal, and her arm was not even singed or seared, ever so slightly. Her invisible protectors, being questioned through her entranced lips concerning the modus operandi of this startling miracle, declared that powerful spirits, acquainted with many facts in occult chemistry, unknown to the world at large, collected from the atmosphere and from the bodies of the medium and sitters, such material as when prepared by the spirits, in the form of an invisible preparation which they applied to the flesh of the lady, rendered her arm impervious to the flame. Spirits have declared on several occasions and through various mediums, whenever fabric has been protected against fire, that a similar process has been devised; and while the world is not expected to believe anything extraordinary without sufficient proof of its reality, it is surely unscientific, unphilosophic and, indeed, irrational to deny the possibility of that to which others bear testimony, merely because you yourselves have not personally witnessed the phenomena.

Fire-worship played an important part in the beliefs and ceremonies of the Ancients, and indeed the religion of the Parsees was so largely made up of the adoration of Fire, that they have quite commonly borne the name of Fire-worshippers. As it is now the custom to study rather than deride the worship of the Ancients, doubtless many of you are to some extent familiar with the peculiar tenets of the Parsees and others, who believed implicitly in Light as the expression of Deity, in the Sun as the home of the god of the solar system, and in Fire as the vivifying and purifying flame, without which nothing could exist, be born or renewed. Doubtless among some nations fire, heat or warmth was regarded as the manifestation of the divine emanation, or the Holy Spirit, and it is a noteworthy fact that fire and flame are the chosen emblems of the Holy Ghost in Christian records. The baptism of the Spirit is called the baptism of fire. John predicted that Jesus would baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire, signifying both inward illumination and the purification of the affections from all dross. Fire is the regenerator and renewer as well as the destroyer, and we venture to say there was never a more sublime conception of the work of preservation and destruction, proceeding from one and the same spirit, than that grand old Brahmanical idea of Siva, the third person of the Brahmanical trinity, who is called both Destroyer and Reproducer.

To apply these ancient beliefs to the doctrine of purgation after death, as taught in the New Testament, is not difficult, and when we remember that Jesus was speaking to Orientals, and that Paul preached and wrote to Orientals also, it is by no means unlikely that all the incomprehensible and seemingly far-fetched allusions in the Gospels and Epistles, really referred, at the time the words were originally spoken or written, to beliefs and practices so common and universally known, as to render the peculiar form of illustration adopted, that most eminently calculated to impress the minds of those for whose immediate benefit the teaching was given under that guise.

If, instead of denouncing, modern teachers would explain the dark sayings of old, the cause of spiritual liberation and true religious progress would make twenty times the headway it now does against blind and slavish idolatry of the letter on the one hand, and equally blind forgetfulness of all things spiritual on the other.

The simple explanation now given by almost all intelligent exponents of the Gospel, of the illustration of a camel going through the eye of a needle, is a sample of how very easily most absurd and misleading dogmas have been built upon a misunderstanding of some local reference. One requires to know something of the city of Jerusalem and its precincts, to understand how the eye of a camel can have anything to do, even figuratively, with a rich man entering the kingdom of heaven, but when the camel's eye is explained, as a little gate leading into the city, through which belated travellers entered after the larger gates were closed, and when it is further stated that a laden camel had to be unladen ere he could enter through that narrow aperture, the illustration is peculiarly significant and apt. (Riches cannot be carried into the heavenly state. The ideal state of human society is communistic. Jesus taught equal rights and united interests. His early followers were practical communists: they did not allow ancestral privileges. They taught as did Paul: If a man will not work neither let him eat. They regarded it as a crying shame that some should possess vast acres of the country which they had not cultivated, and therefore not lawfully obtained except through the sanction of a partial, unjust and tyrannous law, favouring monopoly and crushing down the common people under the iron heel of the tyrannical aggressor. Jesus said these artificial distinctions must be dispensed with. Men must all be brothers, and so it is said, that when an early Christian church was formed, almost immediately after pentecost, the disciples had all things in common, and gave to every man as he had need. Henry George to-day might be a lineal descendant of the apostle Paul, and indeed of most of the early Christians, so closely do his views on "Progress and Poverty" agree with those of the great Apostle to the Gentiles, and the primitive Christians generally.)

There is perhaps no one passage of Scripture, certainly no parable, which has afforded a text for more frightful sermons than the story of the rich man and Lazarus, and yet no parable can possibly set forth the doctrine of future punishment, as a means of purification, more clearly than does that much misinterpreted and belied narrative of the only way by which an obdurate spirit can be brought to repentance in the life beyond. The Church of Rome has never endeavoured to teach the dogma of everlasting torment from this parable, but has always used it to justify the doctrine of purgatory. In the same way, the celebrated passages concerning fire, in Paul's epistle to the Corinthians, have been, and still are, brought forward by the Roman Church, to support the doctrine of purgatorial cleansing for all who do not die in mortal sin. Unfortunately, the Roman Church employs other texts of Scripture, as we think quite unwarrantably, to support the heinous dogma of unending torment for all who die in what the Church calls mortal sin; and as it is a mortal sin to neglect mass on a Sunday, or holiday of obligation, you may easily perceive on what a slender thread immortal life hangs, for those who accept all the dogmas of the Vatican.

The parable of the rich man and Lazarus, illustrates perfectly the lesson we intend to convey in our present Discourse upon Fire, viz., that as material fire is a purifier in the material world, so spiritual fire is a redeemer in the world of spirits; and in enforcing this lesson we feel we are not taking up your time in empty quibbling or vain disputation. (We are setting forth a principle of nature, which it would be well for every legislator, employer, guardian and parent to remember, viz., that punishment should never be other than corrective. Whenever vengeance or the retaliative spirit is made manifest, means of correction are forgotten, and methods of cruel and foolish torture usurp their place.)

We are told in the Gospel of a certain rich man (Dives), and of a certain beggar (Lazarus), who lay at his gate covered with sores, to whom the Eastern dogs, a very low branch of the canine family, were kinder than the opulent man, at whose gates the dying beggar lay. It will well repay us to prolong our meditation a few minutes, by endeavouring to fully take in the situation depicted, and analyze the characters presented to our notice.

Some interpreters have understood the rich man to represent the wealthy Jews, who in the time of Jesus neglected the poor; Lazarus, their poorer brethren; and the dogs, the Gentiles, who were called dogs by the arrogant Hebrews, just as Christians are still called dogs by Mohammedans, dog being an Oriental term of reproach, signifying an unworthy person, the dog in Asia and Southern Europe being a very different animal from the sleek, pampered and well-fed creature who feeds upon the best of the land in London or New York, and is his mistress's favourite companion in her carriage at the most fashionable squares, parks, boulevards or avenues. To live a dog's life in England to-day, or to be compared to a dog, would often mean that you were preferred before all others, and were entitled to a very great amount of consideration; but go to Constantinople or Damascus, for instance. and make the acquaintance of the dogs there, and they will fill you, for the most part, with mingled feelings of pity and disgust. They are mostly fierce, famishing, filthy creatures, almost utterly repulsive in their appearance and demeanour, but they are not destitute of fine feeling, however. Despite their degradation. they will be faithful to those who feed and succour them, and to the sick poor they are often extremely kind, and being possessed, as all dogs are in greater or lesser degree, of healing power in the tongue, they do to-day to the lazaroni of the South, what they did to the poor beggar, of whom Jesus spoke. (They give relief to the suffering by licking their wounds, and you will find in your own experience, that a dog's tongue will often heal a troublesome sore that no ointment will relieve.)

The dog of the East was a symbol of the poor, degraded and outcast, and also of the heathens, who were pariahs, or outcast from fellowship with the orthodox. Jesus took occasion to rebuke the pharisaism of the self-righteous Jews, and told them how their own poor were often ministered unto by the Gentiles, whom they called dogs or outcasts, while their own people neglected them. The consequences to the Hebrew race, of this inequality and injustice, he likened to the wealthy finding themselves in a lake of burning fire, tormented in a flame which nothing could put out. Not even a single drop of water could they get to cool their parched lips. They would, in the day of their dire humiliation, see Abraham, afar off, with the despised poor whom they had forsaken, in his bosom; Abraham's bosom being a Jewish figure of speech, a name for Paradise. To be with Abraham, the father of the faithful, was the goal of the Jew's most ardent expectations. The punishment of those who had had the wherewithal to relieve distress, and had not even relieved it among their own people, whom the law commanded them to treat as their own flesh, was that they should find the tables completely turned upon them in the future life. They would be filled with chagrin, remorse and anguish, realizing how utterly they were shut out from the covenanted blessings: not covenanted to the rebellious and the selfish, however, but to those who fulfilled the conditions of the covenant, i.e., obeyed the spirit as well as the letter of the Law. (When the spirit is neglected, then even Sabbath observance and attendance at the Synagogue on solemn feast days become abominable in the sight of heaven, as it is a vain pretext and endeavour certainly to deceive men, and to deceive God also, if it were possible to conceal the heart from the All-seeing.)

The rich man, who is a representative of the opulent classes who shut up their bowels of compassion from their needy brethren, is at first only conscious of his own misery and loss. He cries out in his pain for water, and requests that Lazarus may bring it to him. He is told that is impossible, between them there is a great gulf fixed, and yet locally they are so near together they can see each other; at all events the denizen of hell can see the happy souls in paradise, and that sight adds to his misery, as it taunts him with what he might have become, and where he might then have been, if, with his many advantages, he had led as pure a life as that of the beggar he despised. He asks that court may be shown him still. Though he has fallen thus low, it seems to him but natural that Lazarus, on earth only a beggar, should be sent with water for his refreshment. (But he had to learn that there are no class distinctions in the Unseen World, that there promotion is only according to merit, and that one, who on earth was a lowly beggar, may be far too high to be commissioned even to take his station by the side of one of the greatest lords of the earth, who has feasted sumptuously and apparelled himself gorgeously every day, while he cared nothing, and perhaps knew nothing, except by hearsay, of the starving mendicant dying at his gate.) It is said that the beggar desired the crumbs from the rich man's table, but it is not said that he got them.

In London, and all large modern cities, Dives lives in a palace and Lazarus starves at his gate. Aristocratic Belgravia ignores the very existence of the slums at the East end of the city. Harrowing accounts appear in the papers daily, of deaths through starvation, in the cold winter months, of poor seamstresses who make the shirts which many of the fashionable gentlemen wear, and never pay for, at their elegant fêtes and parties. Many and many a tradesman is ruined, compelled to go into bankruptcy, because of the unwillingness or inability of the rich, or seemingly rich, to settle their accounts, and many are the poor laundresses and seamstresses, who are sent away day after day without their hard-earned pittance, because the opulent, or at the least, the make-believe wealthy consider them miserable inferiors, who should esteem it an honour to be allowed to work for the gentry and nobility, whether they get paid for their toil or not.

There are indeed many honourable exceptions: lords and ladies, earls and marquises, duchesses and counts, who not only pay all their just debts, but are positively benevolent, sympathetic and helpful to the poor, to the very farthest limit of their power. (And these, who are born to the purple, need not cast it off but wear it honourably; they do their duty in the exalted station to which they have been called, usually by circumstances beyond their own control. Were they to step off their pedestals, they might do less good than they are now accomplishing, and even Buddha, who left his father's house at midnight, and threw in his lot with the mendicant friars of India, might possibly have chosen the yet better way, and attained Nirvana earlier had he remained at home, faithful to his home, and fulfilled honourably and justly all the duties of exalted station.

There is an old parable in the Old Testament, about the trees choosing a bramble for their king, but they did not elect him to office until they offered the highest station to the olive and the cedar, and other beautiful and stately trees, more fit to represent them. The stately trees declined to serve, and therefore the bramble got in. There is a lesson for election times, and all whom the people want to serve as candidates for office. Somebody must serve; if a suitable person is not chosen an unsuitable one will be, so it is really hazardous and wrong for persons to cloak themselves with false humility, and refuse honours pressed upon them, by accident of birth, passing away of relations, or other similar causes.

They who trust in riches, and love them inordinately, are the only ones necessarily outside the Kingdom of Heaven. Not the possession of money, but the miser's love of it, is the root of evil, and only the miser or the egotist, who cares not who starves as long as he has his turtle soup and the best of wines, who cares not who goes naked so long as he is dressed in the latest style, in garments of the costliest material: only he who sneeringly asks the question of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" refusing to take any interest in the welfare of others, ignoring the poor and the unfortunate completely; only he and such as he have a hell awaiting them in spirit-life. When death shall close their eyes upon all earthly scenes, death will be to them the thief, that steals from them all upon which they have placed their love, the moth which corrodes, the rust which eats away their fairest treasures. Then despoiled of all their boasted rank and powers, their spiritual eyes sealed against the light of heaven, their ears deaf to all celestial melodies, a burning fire of fury, remorse and impotent despair consuming their very vitals, will lead them in their pain to cry out for one whom they despised on earth, to be sent unto them to relieve their pain.

Had the rich man asked to see Lazarus face to face, that he might crave his pardon for the wrong he had done him on earth, perhaps he would have been sent to him, with water in his hand to cool the rich man's tongue. But the rich man still thought only of himself; the love of self was still supreme within him, dominating the love of neighbour and the love of God, and no reformation would have been worked within him if the torment he was enduring had been lessened, before the cleansing fires had burned away the dross of selfishness, which was his deadly sin, and the occasion of his doom. The fires must longer burn, his request must be denied, simple though it be, in seeming cruelty, though really in love.

God works in all the hells; the flames are lighted by his love, and they at length remove the rust of that most crying sin of all, the sin of selfishness; so when the rich man had endured his pain a little longer, he begins to think of his brethren and forgets himself. He had never troubled to set them a good example when he was with them on earth, and now it must add fuel to the flame that torments him, to remember that had he acted differently toward them, they would not be in the danger they are now in, of sharing this place of torment when they leave the earth. Though the parable closes indefinitely as regards the future of the rich man, it leaves him on the upward track, for surely no theologian or religionist of any school, can possibly deny that when, through bitter suffering, a nature is aroused from the sinful slumber of consummate selfishness, to express a concern for others' welfare, indeed for their eternal salvation, that that soul can be beyond the pale of redemption, hopelessly lost to goodness and to God.

If there were no such a thing as hell fire, it would be indeed a sorry look out for those who die in their sins. If people could be eternally satisfied with evil, or if God could be eternally satisfied with it, then all our confidence in the absolute nature and eternity of goodness would be destroyed, and not even God could be pronounced perfect. But all the traditions of the world point to one, and but to one, and that an inevitable conclusion, viz., that all souls have deep within them something purer and better than the paltry self-love, which is often all that a spirit manifests during an earthly lifetime, and during a period of abasement in spirit-life, consequent upon misdoing.

Thank God for the fires of hell! Let us hope they are everlasting, if races of men are to be constantly born like unto ourselves upon this planet or any other. If there be an eternal succession of worlds, then everlasting fires are needed, not to make the everlasting punishment of any spirit in the universe a fact, but to render the everlasting evil, with which orthodoxy threatens the universe, an impossibility.

It is wisely said, that angels who kept not their first estate are the only devils there are. Innocence is forfeited during the battle of life, ignorance and wilfulness make unhappy combinations of things all good in themselves. Fire, the destroyer, reduces the state of evil to a pile of ashes, liberates materials from disorderly connections, breaks up the hells of strife and discord, fashioned by ignorance, and causes the Phœnix ever to arise from the pile of ashes, symbol of the Soul's perfect conquest over all that enshrouds and enslaves it.

Do not try to explain away the Eternal Fire which purifies the universe, for in doing so you may be trying to get rid of man's best friend and benefactor, the searching flame of Divine Love, which will utterly consume the tares of ignorance and vice, which grow now in the gardens of many lives, until at length, every spirit now in suffering will be able to say to the Eternal: Thank God for the discipline of pain! "Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now do I keep Thy Word."

IMPROMPTU POEM.

CLEANSING FIRES.

LET thy gold be tried in the furnace; let thy silver and gems be tried;
Let thy heart and thy mind be afflicted, that they may be purified.
If the stains of sin and error are all around them now,
Let the fire of correction cleanse them, and they shall be white as snow.

In the crucible of sorrow, God places many a heart
To cleanse it, and to purify, by the fire that makes it smart;
But men have vainly fancied, God places it in ire,
In an endless hell of torment, where his wrath lights the fire.

But 'tis not so, my brethren; ye who are suffering now,
'Tis not in anger that God sets His seal upon your brow;
But as on Cain, in old time, the brand was in mercy set,
So the brand of God's indignation, we pray you, ne'er forget,
Is a brand of loving-kindness, when seen in the spheres beyond,
A mark of God's pure endeavour to save you, a sacred bond
Which will draw your spirits unto him, however widely they strayed,
The cord, or the chain of sorrow, on your hearts in love is laid.

Sometimes on the one foundation, silver and gold ye lay,
Then, in the day of judgment, God recompense will pay
For the silver and gold ye have given, to ease another's smart,
Will bring you sweet consolation, and satisfy your heart.

The silver and gold, ye'll remember, are not from an earthly mine;
They are thoughts of pure loving-kindness, which clearer than diamonds shine
The gems, which shall sparkle brightly in heaven's illustrious crown,
Are born of your efforts for others, when ye've laid all selfishness down.

Sometimes, but hay and stubble ye place in God's temple seat,
Ye bring to him naught but rubbish—chaff for the burning meet;
Ye bring cowardice, hypocrisy, self-seeking, thirst for gain,
Falsehood, and many an error that cannot in heaven obtain.

Sometimes on the earth ye suffer the loss of all you love,
Sometimes in the fire of sorrow, which descendeth from above,
You lose, in an earthly trial, your love of the base and vile,
And then, ere ye leave the mortal, heaven's sunshine once more doth smile.

But many there be, who go outward to the Land of Souls, unblest
With any desire for heaven, without the sweet secret of rest;
Without love of God in their bosoms, without any care for his poor:
For these, when this earth-life is over, there remaineth God's threshing-floor.
He will purge his floor most thoroughly, will gather his wheat into barns,
Will burn up the chaff, as the fuel which keeps that Gehenna alive,
Which, ever outside of earth's cities, is burning, for spirits who need
To be cleansed, ere they enter those portals, which nothing but pleasure can breed.

Not in anger doth God send affliction, but Dives, in anguish most dire,
Is suffering only by reason of God's love, which lighteth the fire
Which parches his throat, and consumes him with sorrow and grief for his sin;
His selfishness dies in the bright flame, he cries: "Let my brethren begin
To lead a new life, lest they, also, to this place of torment are brought:
Send an angel, or send me, I pray you, that these sinners in time may be sought!"

"They will hear not the law nor the prophets," said Abraham unto him then:
"If one rose from the dead, they'd believe not," heaven's doctrines are far 'bove their ken;
But their brother himself, he must seek them, undoing the wrong he has done,
Must return to the earth as a preacher, and preach till they've new life begun.

Are any of you clothed in purple? Do you sumptuously fare every day?
Do ye think naught of brethren in danger? Do ye drive the poor beggar away?
Then, surely, when earth-life is over, the fire in your bosom will burn,
And ye'll ask, when too late, how to succour the homeless, the sad, the forlorn.

Too late! yes, to you it will seem so, until all your selfishness dies.
And, then, when pure love of your neighbour lights up with sweet mercy your eyes,
A way will be opened, your spirits will see how to rescue the sad,
And, employed by some glorious immortals, through your work will others grow glad.

The fire must burn on till all error is expunged from your inmost desire;
Bless God for the hottest furnace, for the fiercest, torturing fire,
For surely hell fires are reserved for all, who impenitent die,
But in mercy, not anger, they're lighted: not to doom, but to raise you on high!

BENEDICTION.

May the Light of God's Love burn brightly,
And enter your spirits below,
While yet upon earth you must labour,
Then, whenever from earth you go,
Your transit may be to regions
Where you need not the cleansing flame,
But where, numbered among the angels,
Heaven's radiance your souls may claim.

AMEN.

XII.

THE ASCENSION OF JESUS INTO HEAVEN, AND THE DESCENT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

IN our Lecture upon "The Resurrection," you will remember, we started a train of thought which we were not able to elaborate to any great extent on Easter Sunday. Now that we have been requested to give our views upon the Ascension, and also upon the Descent of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples after the ascension of Jesus into heaven, we shall endeavour to be yet more explicit in the expression of our opinions concerning the method of the Resurrection; as we believe the appearances of Jesus to his disciples after his physical death, to have been nothing other than ancient spiritual manifestations, recorded for the benefit of mankind by those chosen disciples and holy brethren, who were specially privileged to hold communion with the triumphant spirit of the great teacher and loving friend, from whose material form they had so recently been called to part.

There is a growing tendency among all really advanced thinkers, to spiritualize rather than to explain away Scripture narratives; and while recent Oriental discoveries have led many to abandon the name of Christian, and withhold their allegiance from a restrictive Christianity, which exalts one teacher at the expense of all others; while some have gone so far as to deny the personality of Jesus altogether, no one who is really a student of Oriental and classic history, can fail to be struck with the surprising fact that all the religious systems and sacred books of the world extant, have similar traditions and similar accounts of ancient spiritual marvels. The astronomical theory, and many other modern theories account for some things, but they do not cover the entire ground which must be covered before we can offer to the world anything like an adequate solution of the difficulties presented to students, and indeed to almost everybody, who reads anything now-a-days concerning the mysteries of past ages.

Spiritualism can and does offer the only really intelligible and satisfactory explanation of the spiritual phenomena of past times, and it is a great pity when professing Spiritualists, instead of calling public attention to spiritual truths, imitate materialists who have no knowledge of spiritual things, according to their own declaration, and therefore cannot be expected to give it forth to the world—as to give what one does not possess is an impossibility—and indulge in scoffing assertions with regard to ancient marvels, which by reason of their purely negative character, add nothing whatever to a controversy, except fresh fuel for the inflammation of party feeling and sectarian strife.

We have no blind or superstitious veneration for the Bible, as you very well know, neither have we any foolish and unreasoning dislike to it. We wish to treat it fairly, but then we endeavour to treat every book fairly. Thus, the Bible, in our hands, receives no better and no worse treatment than any other literary compilation, and we shall rejoice to see the day when sacred anthologies are so common, that go where you will, you will have placed in your hands compendiums of the choicest literary and moral extracts, which wise and far-reaching minds shall have gathered from all available sources, ancient and modern. Moncure D. Conway in England, and Giles Stebbins in America, have done something in this direction, in the publication of two very valuable works adapted especially for reading in schools, and at public religious meetings, but much more remains to be done in this direction, and we only hope lovers of truly great sayings of truly great men, will ere long make some decided effort to place such works as those to which we have alluded, in the hands of all readers, and not at a prohibitory price, as expensive works of that character are scarcely needed, as only the rich can purchase them, and the wealthy owners of good libraries would find little or nothing unfamiliar to them in such a treatise. Still a portable volume of moderate size, filled with choice selections from the best ancient and modern authors, is always valuable, as large, cumbersome works can with difficulty be carried from place to place, and are often practically useless, except to the very few, on account of their bulk and costliness.

(We are often asked why we so constantly allude to the Bible narratives, rather than to others, in our Discourses, and also, why we usually preach from a Scripture text? Our answer is: It is the province, both of the pulpit and the platform, to teach morality and to unfold spiritual truths, and as we can just as well do this work as we are able, by taking up narratives with which the public are familiar, and expounding them in the light of universal laws and principles, as by alluding to incidents unknown to the greater portion of our audiences, we take the popular Bible, and preach from it, not to the exclusion of other works, but merely because by so doing we the sooner gain the public ear and arrive at desired results, viz., the unfoldment of those spiritual truths which the Bible narratives certainly do set forth as well as any others. and better than many; while we add to this reason another, and that is this: the Bible is used as a weapon for the advocacy of the most pernicious doctrines. Once convince the public that the Bible itself does not teach what orthodox people say it teaches, and you have broken asunder the last link which binds many sincere though timid and rather superstitious people, to the now rapidly dying errors of the past.

Oh, but the Bible says so! is a phrase often used to silence any one and every one who dares to put forward an unorthodox doctrine. The user of the phrase means, of course, that the Bible says exactly what he says, and, therefore, the setter-forth of the strange doctrine is deluded, or an emissary of Satan. This foolish habit of endeavouring to silence every objector to one's own ideas of what the Bible enforces or substantiates, will be dismissed when the prevalent superstitions concerning the Bible are at an end; but they never will be vanquished until some one enlightens the public mind on the subject of inspiration and spiritual matters generally, to put to flight the old infallibility dogma, and all notions of plenary inspiration, in the old orthodox meaning of that term.

That the Bible is a record of the spiritual experiences of an important section of mankind, is indisputable. The Bible, indeed, is not the record of the spiritual experiences of the whole human race, but it does embody the most startling revelations made to Jews and the Gentile peoples also, from whom the Anglo-Saxon race has gradually developed. Orientals have their own records, somewhat similar and somewhat different, but these records are not, as some suppose, superior to the Bible; they are, if anything, inferior to it, probably because they are older, for one thing, and during the past several thousands of years the Eastern and Western parts of the world, north of the equator, have been slowly but surely advancing, every new race attaining to a higher stage of civilization than its predecessor.

Ancestral influences are acknowledged by all students of heredity, as playing a very important part in the development of races and individuals. Truly the modern student is very apt to ignore spiritual communion with ancestors altogether, but the very doctrine of ancestral influences, as taught by externalists who believe in heredity, is the outside shell of a great spiritual truth; yea, their conclusions are quite correct, only they go no further than effects and secondary causes. The first cause, in such instances, is always spirit influence, and when this is clearly demonstrated to all people, no scientific facts will be set aside, but the theorizings of scientists will be vastly improved and grandly supplemented.

The story of the Resurrection of Jesus is incomplete without the Ascension, and the Ascension is again incomplete without the Descent of the Holy Spirit, and it will be well for us to spend a short time this morning, in endeavouring to account for the marvellous events recorded by the Evangelist, on the basis of such spiritual laws as render them explicable, without the setting aside of any known law of nature. A law may be overpowered by a mightier law, as a strong man may be overcome by a stronger, but then it is the law that this should be so, and whatever takes place under the operation of law, must be, correctly speaking, a legal or natural event, though it be a supermaterial occurrence.

Supermaterial, superhuman, and superterrestrial are words that still convey some meaning to our minds. Supernatural we have outgrown, not because our views of spiritual action over matter have become narrowed, but because our conceptions of nature have so far enlarged, that we confess our inability to see beyond it.

Every miracle ever recorded may have taken place in obedience to some immutable law of nature, which rendered possible that which to most minds was strictly impossible. The mere plea that something is incomprehensible, is no argument against its reality, and they are poor philosophers who cannot make room in their system for accepting the genuineness of many things, which to them are truly miraculous. (Marvellous, inexplicable, even though perfectly natural.)

The disintegration of the body of Jesus seems to us the only rational interpretation of the story of the Resurrection, when we consider it literally. If the record of his life be true, then for three years, at least, and for how much longer the New Testament does not tell us, he had been practising the most rigid self-denial, and had acquired the power of stilling tempests, multiplying loaves and fishes, healing all manner of diseases, delivering those suffering from demoniacal possession, and what seems even more startling still to some readers, there were times when he transported himself to a distant place, or changed his appearance, so that his enemies were powerless to lay hands upon him.

On one occasion it is said that because he offended the rulers by the plainness of his speech, they took up stones to hurl at him, and would have thrust him over the brow of the hill, but he eluded them and thus saved himself from his persecutors. It must be remembered, however, that this story, or a similar one, is not told of Jesus only, and therefore the application becomes more powerful and universal, as it cannot be said that only one man, and he the special son of God, was endowed with this extraordinary ability, or was subject to so signal an instance of spiritual power exerted over him on his behalf.

We are told that after Elijah was taken from Elisha, the spirit carried Elisha to a place far distant, and there was enacted the scene with the bears, which has excited such heated controversy in many quarters. The Acts of the Apostles informs us that Philip was carried a long distance by invisible agency, so without calling to our aid any of the records of the Orient and tales of the magicians, which would probably be regarded as spurious by a majority of professing Christians, we find in the Bible itself many accounts of such phenomena as are in rare instances duplicated at the present time, and which in connection with Modern Spiritualism have been vouched for by Lord Lindsay, and other notable persons, whose witness on any other subject would be accepted anywhere, and that without cavil.

That is a natural and very reasonable disposition of the human mind, which refuses to accept as true anything peculiarly uncommon, until the unusual phenomenon has been observed so often and under such circumstances as to render delusion and imposition alike impossible; but when the testimony of the ages and the records of all peoples agree, surely such testimony as this is worthy of the profoundest consideration of all thoughtful people. But had we no lessons to teach, no moral truths to gather and illustrate by a recital of the marvels, either of the past or present, we would let magic, mystery and miracle rest for ever; but as the supreme triumph of the Spirit over Matter is the object of material embodiment, and all initiatory discipline on earth and in probationary realms of spiritual being, we feel our subjects to-day are neither fanciful nor unimportant. They are of vital interest to all seekers after truth, and can be made the means of setting forth the object and results of many of those toilsome earth experiences, which many persons are inclined to think are as objectless as they are hard to bear.

It has been suggested by some that Jesus never died and came to life again, and indeed that no one ever rose from the dead. This doctrine has found favour with Essenes or Essenians, both ancient and modern, who account for the seeming resurrection in this wise: Jesus, say they, was an adept, a member of a mystic fraternity, the members of which had power to apparently lay down their lives and take them up again. Many of these brothers are said to have been buried in swoons and trances from which they afterwards revived. The Essenians would account for the resurrection of Lazarus, the widow's son at Nain, the daughter of Jairus, and others, all by reference to the powers of this mystic fraternity over seeming death; and so far as the explanation goes, it is adequate in some cases (though not in all), as it illustrates the powers of human will or psychological influence, and opens a very broad field of investigation into the mysterious power which highly developed and mediumistic people can exert, or be compelled or enabled by spirit power to exert over the minds and bodies of the afflicted and the dying.

Perhaps it has struck some of you that the early Christians built upon a false foundation, when they made all their system to hang upon the resurrection of the man Jesus. Suppose he never did rise in any literal sense, are all hopes of immortality delusive, and is all preaching and prophesying on the subject of immortality vain? These are very great and awful questions for the orthodox, who repose their every hope of life immortal, on the testimony of those who declare Jesus had risen from the dead and reappeared to them, conversing and eating with them. The resurrection of a physical body, however, would be no proof of immortality, unless the immortalization of the body were a demonstrated fact. and when we read the account given in the first chapter of Acts, of the ascension of the body of Jesus, we are struck with the awful incompleteness of the testimony to the ascension there furnished; for we are only told that, as the disciples were gazing steadfastly up into heaven, Jesus vanished: "A cloud received him out of their sight, are the exact words used in the authorized version.

True, it is stated that angels said unto them, that Jesus had gone to heaven, and would come to earth again, but they (the disciples) did not witness the entrance of Jesus in a physical body into the spiritual world. The material body vanished; it became invisible, it was disintegrated, in our opinion, as physical bodies according to universal testimony do not enter the spirit world, and could not exist there, certain physical conditions being required for the sustentation of a human body, composed of matter, which are not present except within the atmosphere of the earth.

Jesus may have had the power to take up his body and lay it down at will, without having carried a single physical atom into the spiritual universe, and that he had this power is abundantly proved, if the records of his post mortem appearances are to be relied upon. It is not to the physical body and its immortalization, that the world looks for consolation in the hour of bereavement and the loss of all earthly things, and it was not to this the disciples were taught to look by Christ. The appearance of Jesus to Saul of Tarsus, as he journeyed between Jerusalem and Damascus, is one of the proofs of immortality which seems to have the greatest weight with that celebrated teacher and controversialist, who from a persecutor of the Christians became their warmest friend and foremost advocate, through the conviction brought to his mind by that singular apparition.

Renan, in his life of St. Paul, suggests that Saul was attacked with ophthalmia, a disease of the eyes common in Asia, and frequently occasioned by exposure to a severe storm in districts where storms are both frequent and terrible, and that when struck by lightning he saw his past life pass before him, much as drowning people often are enabled to review their past. In that condition of helplessness, he no doubt experienced a change of heart and mind, and as suffering and fright often produce reflection, and bring one into a state of spiritual receptivity, this explanation is extremely feasible; while Paul's thorn in the flesh has been considered by many commentators to have meant his weak eyes and very defective sight, which made it necessary for him to employ amanuenses to write epistles at his dictation, as, when he writes a short epistle with his own hand, he calls it a long letter under the circumstances, suggesting the idea that it was written with great difficulty, and probably much pain to the writer.

Stephen, we are told, saw heaven opened, and beheld Jesus, but there is not a shred of evidence that in the cases cited either Saul or Stephen saw Jesus physically or objectively, for no one else is said to have seen anything except the changes produced by the visions upon the countenances of the seers. If you have had any experience, no matter how limited, with clairvoyants and clairaudients, you must have observed the peculiarly beautiful expression which the face of the somnambule wears when in the condition of trance, rapture, or ecstacy. For this reason it has been the custom for celebrated painters to study the psychologic art, and entrance their "models" in order that an expression of almost superhuman loveliness might be transferred to the canvas. But when faces are all aglow with heavenly rapture, and you know the expression of ecstacy cannot be feigned, you see and hear nothing which causes you to understand why the sensitive or medium should appear so wonderfully happy, while if visions of a distressing character are presented to the seer, you see nothing which enables you to account for the horror and fright, which will sometimes render the features of a medium positively livid. There are so many avenues of perception open to exceptionally-endowed persons, that are not open to the majority, that it is the height of folly for any one, no matter how gifted or widely experienced, to taboo as spurious or even unlikely, that which has formed no part of his individual experience. The world progresses through the accumulation of facts and their application to religion, art and industry, and it is a safe position for everybody to hold to, that he will deny nothing but what is in direct opposition to some demonstrable reality.

We are often told that it is the part of every one, who makes an affirmation, to prove it, and that no one is logically called upon to prove a negative. Reasoning from such a premise, it has often been remarked that neither Materialists nor Christadelphians are under any necessity of proving that man is not immortal. That is a very one-sided way of looking at the matter. Such people do not satisfy themselves with anything short of dogmatic assertion, that man is mortal only; now in the face of almost universal testimony to the fact of human immortality, it is quite as reasonable to demand proof of man's mortality as of his immortality; and it is just here where all materialistic evidence breaks down. No one has ever been able to prove that the real essential life of man has ever become extinct. Bodies of flesh and blood we know have dissolved and corrupted, but it is impossible to deny the great probability of an ethereal and invisible condition of human embodiment, over which death has no power. If material substances can become invisible, and if the atoms of life are all invisible, then the statement that the essential body of man is invisible, does not appear fallacious to any true scientist.

The testimony of the New Testament is not really, as many have supposed, to the material resurrection and ascension of Jesus, but to the fact of many persons having been quite satisfied that they had communion with him after his material death. The concurrent testimony of many clairvoyants constitutes the bulk of evidence furnished by the New Testament, while a spiritual certainty possessed the minds of many, who do not claim to have had any such such vision of Jesus, that he was really alive and present with them; this spiritual certainty being so powerful a conviction of their minds, that they were ready to suffer martyrdom in support of their faith in the true resurrection.

Paul was far too great a scholar, had a far too philosophic mind, and was far too mediumistic a man to have hinged all his preaching upon the reanimation of an earthly body, which had once become a corpse. It is he who speaks of the witness of the spirit, of knowing Christ after the spirit and not after the flesh, of a spiritual body as totally distinct from the material form, and of the impossibility of flesh and blood inheriting the Kingdom of Heaven. Doubtless Jesus did materialize for the satisfaction of honest doubters, as many spirits are materializing to-day as an accommodation to the gross materialism and arrant scepticism of the present time, but no matter how valuable and even necessary physical manifestations may be for the enlightenment of sceptics, there will surely come a time when they will no more be needed: they will have done their work, and will cease when the spiritualization of humanity renders them superfluous, as staircases and ladders may be dispensed with when people can fly or transport themselves through the air.

We have constantly observed that those Spiritualists who attach most importance to physical manifestations, with which they are never satisfied unless they can observe them under "crucial test conditions," are always seeking to impose new and yet more crucial tests, often cruelly afflicting and disgracefully villifying and insulting the sensitives with whom they experiment; and still they appear to derive less and less satisfaction from their experiments, the longer they continue them. Why is this, but because many of these medium testers are persons almost wholly destitute of spiritual perception. Phrenologically they are Materialists: they must handle the spirits as they would handle material merchandise. They would make mediumship a mere matter of buying and selling; they would look to nothing higher than the accumulation of worldly wealth; they would want the spirits to tell them who would be the winner of the Derby, how they could amass a fortune by gambling in stocks, and as for the mediums who are brought under such accursed influences, they soon become so morally corrupted that they do not care whether manifestations are genuine or otherwise, so long as they receive a handsome remuneration for legal or illicit transactions, as the case may be.

Now, were the disciples of Jesus and the early Christians a set of impecunious showmen, who went from place to place vending their wares,—was it their object to make money by exhibiting marvels before an open-mouthed public, ready to swallow the latest fiction got up for their pastime? The temptation to make merchandise of spiritual gifts may have constituted the third and last temptation the devil offered to Jesus, called the temptation to worship the devil in order to acquire material wealth and power; but it was ever held in execration by the primitive Christians, who were an honest, self-denying company of spiritualized men and women, who communed with each other and with the spirit-world for the purpose of enlightening humanity on matters of the utmost importance to one and all of the human race. Therefore. Simon Magus, and the man who employed a damsel as a soothsayer to bring him wealth, were severely denounced by the apostles, for the strife was then as now between the conscientious and the avaricious workers in the Spiritual Movement.

We are told that Jesus promised his friends, that whereso-ever two or three were gathered together in his name, there he would be in the midst of them, but only when they were assembled in his name did he promise to bestow his presence. Ere he took his departure from the sight of men, he promised a Comforter, even the Spirit of Truth, which the world of orthodoxy and self-seeking would not receive. It could not embrace the Spirit of Truth, because that spirit would not sanction its intrigues or gloss over its hypocrisies, which are made to do duty for virtue. When he promises this spirit, he does not only say he will send a Comforter, he says he will come himself, and be their teacher and consoler, declaring it is expedient for his disciples that he should depart, because if he remain in material form among them, they will not be called upon to exert their spiritual faculties in clasping hands with a soul in immortality, across the borders of material life.

Truly the spirit-world stoops to earth: it stoops to conquer pride and prejudice, and man's benighted state of spiritual darkness; but the highest attitude of the receptive mind is that of desire to rise to a spiritual level over material doubt and strife, rather than to drag the spirit down to the plane of material things once more. Spiritual revelation is truly a Jacob's ladder, but the descending angels only stoop to earth that they may lift earth's children into communion with them on their high rounds nearer the summit. All communications alleged to be spiritual may be so, but if they are, then those which come in response to man's greed or lust, are only revelations from those hells and purgatories within the atmosphere of earth, where spirits, destitute as yet of spiritual perception, are dwelling amid the murky shadows of the outer earth. The Hindoos were not wrong when they declared that one of the spiritual spheres was upon or within the earth itself, for peopling the earth's atmosphere are countless millions of disembodied men and women, who are ever ready to enter into converse with those upon earth, who seek communion with them.

The great question at all seances is: In what name are you assembled, or in other words, what motives and desires have brought you together? Are you, or are you not, with one accord in one place, as you are told those were who received the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost? If evil thoughts and vain desires possess your minds, if uncharitableness or selfishness are dominant within your breasts, then it is in vain that you sing sweet hymns and utter wordy prayers. Spiritual beings are attracted or repelled by your thoughts, and neither hymn nor prayer can be of any use in invoking the Spirit of Truth, unless such effusions are the honest expression of your inmost desires, or unless they promote charitable and loyal dispositions in the hearts of others.

When the Spirit of Truth came, how did it manifest itself? According to the second chapter of Acts, almost every conceivable type of manifestation was produced. The physical came first, to arrest attention and prepare the minds of those assembled for what was to follow. The rushing mighty wind, which shook the house where they assembled, the visible cloven tongues of flame, came before the speaking with many tongues; and when those many tongues were employed, they were not brought into play to merely startle or astonish the multitude, but because all could not understand one language, and the message of truth would be no message at all to the people to whom it was addressed, unless it were delivered to them in a language they could understand. A jargon of unknown tongues in an English-speaking audience, would be no evidence of the coming of the Holy Spirit; but if different minds must be approached in different ways, and different understandings require different versions of the one Gospel of Immortality, then the self same spirit, even the Spirit of Truth, makes use of divers instrumentalities, and as Paul says, in 1 Cor., xii.: "There are diversities of administrations, but one Lord."

The Spirit of God is ever present when divine results are accomplished, and there is no other way of testing spirits or teachings, but by watching the effect produced upon those who embrace or give heed to them. In coveting earnestly the best gifts, one only needs to have pure motives, and be wishful to be made use of by the higher powers, for the benefit of the race; and then whether his gift be healing, prophesying, or any other gift, the Spirit of Truth will be his guide, his comfort, and his reward, in this and in every stage of existence.

IMPROMPTU POEM.

ASCENSION THROUGH SORROW.

CAN earth confine the Spirit, throughout eternal day?
Say, are we doomed for ever to tread earth's toilsome way?
Shall bodies resurrected imprison still the soul,
Even when it has conquered, and reached the wished-for goal?

Earth-bodies are to spirits, what earth is to the seeds
Of flowers and of grasses,—each one on matter feeds;
And in the dim, strange darkness, buried beneath the sod,
Each germ of life unfoldeth, and seeks the light of God.

How wondrous is the pathway! through which all spirits move;
How mystic are the lessons! which every heart must prove:
Ofttimes the anguished spirit cries out in grief and pain—
What is the use of sorrow? Oh! need I grieve again?

The lesson of life's turmoil—of all its pain and strife—
Is never fully learned, till on the sacred height
Of perfected self-conquest, your souls enchanted stand,
Viewing celestial mountains, from some fair Beulah land.

Along the toilsome pathway, the pilgrim-soul must speed,
Sometimes on fruits and nectar, again on griefs to feed;
Sometimes by flowing waters, where flowers brightly bloom,
Sometimes through arid deserts, as lonely as the tomb.

God leads his children onward, through sunshine and through storm,
Their brows oft kissed with radiance from Heaven's bright centres, warm;
But oftentimes the desert develops most that power,
Which sends a Christ to battle, to win the victor's dower.

Temptation by the devil, ye every one must know:
Tempted by avarice and pride, by passions, by each low
And selfish earthly motive, ye must to Satan say:
Get thou behind me, Tempter! and triumph in life's fray.

Oh! were it not for Olivet, for Calvary's sad cross;
Oh! were it not for earthly death, crowning all mortal loss;
The resurrection angels for you would never sing—
Another soul has conquered, and death has lost its sting!

Ascending 'mong the angels, behold the Soul arise,
The conqueror in triumph, through highest paradise,
Mounts on and up still higher, till realms celestial see,
Are opening to receive him, while angels chant with glee:

Welcome! oh, conquering Spirit; welcome! oh, Soul divine;
Welcome! to this your birthplace, the Kingdom that's now thine
Is empire o'er all matter, death's icy hand to thee
Henceforth will be a symbol of perfect victory!

BENEDICTION.

(May the Ascension of the Spirit over all material strife, be yours in blest experience now, and in fulness of glory hereafter. May Heaven's best blessings rest on you all, and may you become one with all true conquerors for ever!)

XIII.

A SPIRITUAL VIEW OF THE TRINITY.

IN our last Discourse, we led you up in some measure to where you were prepared to see (if you followed the drift of our argument) how without one making three or three making one, in any nonsensical manner suggested by way of ridicule by opposers of the doctrine of a Trinity in Nature and a Trinity in God, the idea of the three-fold expressions of the Divine Mind, prevalent all over the earth from immemorial ages, may not after all be inconsistent with Monotheism, or the most uncompromising declaration of the Israelites: The Lord is One.

Upon the question of the unity of the Godhead, Unitarians and Trinitarians are professedly agreed: they only differ as to what is meant by absolutely unity, and so mystifying have been the definitions of the Trinity put forward under the name of Athanasius especially, that it is scarcely possible for any person of ordinary mental calibre, to gather anything like a definite idea of what the Fathers of the Church really thought of the nature of God, judging by such a compilation as that called the Creed of S. Athanasius, yet that creed was laboriously compiled by many of the most learned doctors of the fourth century, gathered in solemn council to obtain from the Holy Ghost a clear and definite refutation of the heresies of Arius and his followers. So say all orthodox Church historians, while even the candid Unitarian feels compelled to credit some, though not by any means all, of those engaged in the Arian and Athanasian controversies, with at least a sincere desire to arrive at truth, and defend the true faith from all successful attacks in future.

The doctrine of the Trinity is certainly not one of those doctrines which are "plainly revealed in Holy Scripture," so that no one carefully reading the Bible can fail to come to the conclusion that God has revealed Himself in that Book as three in one or one in three. The three persons and one

God, of the Church of England litany, are certainly not plainly revealed as constituting the true Godhead, but quite the contrary is the case, for the word trinity does not occur even once in the whole Bible, and Jesus taught his disciples to pray to one only God, the Father, who is in heaven, whose personality must certainly be one, if the term Father conveys any idea to the human mind.

The most that can be proved from the New Testament is, what the Arians endeavoured to prove, that there is but one God, the Father, and one Lord or Master, Jesus Christ, and a Spirit of Truth, whom Jesus said the Father would send in his name. You may possibly make your case good by reference to Scripture texts, if you are Arians and believe in the superiority of Jesus Christ to all other created beings; but you must in that case regard him but as a creature of God, though the first and highest of all creatures. Arianism deduces, from the plain language of the New Testament, that we are commanded to worship God the Father, that our prayers should be addressed to God through Christ, for the Holy Spirit; therefore, Arianism, though distinct from Modern Unitarianism, is a purely monotheistic system, as it regards Jesus as only a finite being, even though a super-angelic personage; but the difference between God and any creature, no matter how exalted, must ever be the difference between the finite and the infinite, which is an infinite difference.

Arianism permits of a secondary worship being offered to Christ, much as the Roman Church allows of a secondary worship being paid to Mary, the mother of Jesus, and numerous saints and angels; but though their prayers and intercessions are asked for by devout Catholics, they are never adored in the Catholic Church as parts of Deity.

The creed of Athanasius is not only utterly unintelligible, but with its damnatory clauses it is one of the most objectionable and preposterous compositions ever palmed upon the world, as an embodiment of truth, while the damnatory clauses are strong presumptive evidence of its internal weakness, for whenever a position is insecure, it is necessary to fortify it by threats, so as to suppress inquiry. To the timid and superstitious, what can be more awful than questioning the veracity of a creed, which tells you if you do not believe it in its entirety, you will perish everlastingly? No doubt multitudes have suppressed their honest convictions, from sheer dread that, perhaps if it were true, and though they thought it was false they were not absolutely certain of its falsity, they might be bringing upon themselves and others the terrible penalty of everlasting torment. Believe or be damned, is a very convenient motto for those, who having usurped power on false premises, desire to maintain their hold upon the people through fear; and as certain passages of Scripture appear to favour this dogma, it has been peculiarly easy for interested parties to twist texts to suit their own arrogant assumptions.

The New Testament is not a book which can be taken literally, from end to end, as a divine compilation, neither is it so plainly written that every one can understand exactly what it means. Again, no original MS. has yet been discovered, dating further back than the fourth century, the three oldest MSS. being the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS., traceable to the fourth, and the Alexandrian MS., only traceable to the fifth century. These three MSS. are not literal transcripts of each other, thus it is evident to any scholar, even of the humblest pretensions and narrowest opportunities, that it is absurd as well as cruel and unjust, to endeavour to decide any point of doctrine by reference simply to a few ambiguous statements in the Gospels or Epistles.

The declaration in the Epistle of John, that there are three who bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one, is considered an interpolation by students almost universally, while the damnatory clauses, apparently justified by the reputed saying of Jesus: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned," is open to quite another interpretation than that usually put upon it. All such passages are true in a prophetic sense, especially when "condemned" is substituted for "damned," as it is in the Revised Version. In the old law, "Whosoever sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed," does not necessarily prescribe capital punishment as the doom of murderers; it makes a prophetic statement, signifying that those who wrong their brethren shall eventually suffer as they have made others to suffer; while David's prophesying against wicked men, declaring that their wives shall be widows and their children fatherless, when understood in the letter only, becomes offensive as a prayer.

We have no time to enter upon these topics now, as our subject is the Trinity, but as we have touched upon the law of compensation, or just retribution, we promise at no distant date to speak more fully upon methods of compensation in spirit life; showing, as far as we are able, how every act of life brings with it its own punishment or reward, not as an arbitrary act of divine sovereignty, but as a result of infinite wisdom, displayed in the natural law of cause and effect, which governs the spiritual as well as the material world.

The greatest objection which can ever be brought against the popular Christian view of the Trinity, is that it makes evil everlasting, and declares an opposition between different attributes of the Divine Nature. Take the attributes of Justice and Mercy, for example, as they have ever been the principal subjects of contention in the Church. Justice is always regarded as the especial attribute of God the Father, Mercy, of God the Son. Now, it is invariably stated by the orthodox, that the Son came into the world to appease the Father's wrath, but if Father, Son and Holy Ghost are all one, as the creeds of Christendom declare, then the wrath of God must be the wrath of the Son as much as of the Father.

Old pictures of the Trinity represent the Father as a stern-visaged, elderly man, the Son as a younger man, and the Holy Ghost as a dove: that is the popular picture of God, put into the hands of children by Roman Catholics and Ritualists, while Gustave Dorè, the celebrated French artist, in his celebrated Illustrated Bible, has intruded this distressing caricature of the world's belief in a Deity. Dorè's picture, as a work of art, is exquisite, and perhaps when spiritualized by the imagination of him who gazes upon it, it may illustrate some occult truth concerning the operations of the Divine Mind, but Madame Blavatsky, in her "Isis Unveiled," commenting on this picture, has to our mind given utterance to a far deeper meaning, doubtless in the artist's own mind, when she says, that to her and to all true mystics and deep students of divine things, the chaos in the background, dim, vague, awful though it be, is far more suggestive of the Eternal, whom no man has seen with fleshly eyes at any time, than the two men of different ages and the bird, in the engraving.

The very fact of the Son being represented as younger than the Father, in the picture, shows that nothing can have been originally intended, than the Law as given to Moses, and the Gospel as revealed by Christ. Age may apply to divine revelations to man; one dispensation of truth on earth may antedate another, but one person of the Godhead cannot be of unequal age with another, if all three are alike eternal. Thus the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity, that the three persons are co-equal and co-eternal, is defied rather than expressed in many phases of Catholic art.

How extremely significant appear the grand old words of the second commandment of the Decalogue, as they recur to one's mind when gazing upon Christian pictures: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth." Knowing how prone to idolatry the people were, knowing how readily the Israelites would lapse into the idolatries of the neighbouring peoples, if they were allowed to have images and pictures in their synagogues, Moses sternly forbade them to cultivate what is ordinarily termed religious art. Col. Ingersoll and others have made much capital out of this prohibition, and have endeavoured to show how obedience to such a command robbed the Hebrew people of all the inspiration they might have derived from a pure and ennobling art; but the dangers are so great, of bowing down to the creature and worshipping it as the Creator, limiting Deity within the narrow groove of man's conception of some finite object, that after all it may be well to exert a wise, restraining power, and prevent as far as possible the introduction of objects, calculated to lead the mind astray, into places of public worship.

This is an age of renaissance, however. Puritan supremacy has despoiled cathedrals of much of their ancient beauty, and a work of restoration is now going on, by means of which painting and sculpture are being brought back into something like their old prominence, in places of religious assembly. We are not sorry that the tendency of the age is to artistic revival, but we do regret the craze which possesses the minds of those who desire to have everything mediæval. As in mediæval times art was crippled and dwarfed by corrupting and corrupt theological phantasies, the great masters were like chained eagles: they longed to soar, and the Church doomed them to paint and sculp as it directed. The working of theological bigotry is discoverable in the subjects chosen and the manner in which they are treated, even when the workmanship is so perfect that no artist of to-day can rival, much less excel, it.

But what is a perfect skull or dragon compared to something intrinsically beautiful, outwrought with equal accuracy, care and skill? What is the perfect delineation of an emaciated misanthrope, compared with an equally perfect portrayal of some form radiant with beauty? In a brighter and freer age, Art will be again the handmaid of Religion, but even if the execution be not so grand in a hurrying age, as in one of loneliness and contemplation when years passed as months in the completion of some exquisite work of art. Art is destined not to live as a memory of the dead past simply, but, resurrected in more glorious apparel than any in which it has yet arrayed itself upon earth, it will take humanity captive, in a period of true renaissance, when it stands as the embodiment of the loftiest conceptions of Deity, the human mind can possibly attain unto.

In the art of the future, Christs, Madonnas, angels will multiply, but finite forms will never be expressive, to the true reader of the language of art, of the Eternal Infinite, but only of those real and ideal forms in nature, which express godlike powers, and enable man to see through the windows of the eyes of those, whose souls have most expanded the life of God within, which is the perennial spring of happiness, the fount of true greatness, and essential life for ever. Take the Christian's picture of Father, Son and Holy Ghost, along with Madame Blavatsky's suggestion as to the chaos illustrating, as far as can be illustrated, the unfathomable nature of the absolute Godhead, who is beyond all lords, angels, and messengers who have appeared to man.

In ancient Egypt, as we have previously reminded you from this platform, the ideas of Deity were three-fold as well as unitary, as among Christians, and indeed almost all ancient peoples have introduced triangles and triadations, to set forth their ideas of Eternal Mind; even the original Monotheism of Israel has not excluded the number three from the name given to Deity, as there are three consonants in the name Jehovah, J H V H, vowels not occurring in Hebrew writing, and the H being repeated, there are but three letters in the name Jahveh or Jehovah. By many scholars these three letters or three syllables have been regarded as expressive of the past, present, and future of the Eternal.

Of course this Israelitish name for deity, gives no clue as to how the tri-personality of deity crept into the beliefs of the world, disfiguring all of them except the Jewish; for the Jews, in spite of their innumerable persecutions at the hands of Christians, wandering through all the Christian countries, have never renounced their unswerving fealty to the religion of their fathers, touching the unity of God. Here and there a Jew becomes a convert to Christianity, not generally with very beneficial results either to himself or others, and usually not until almost a fortune, collected from the credulous contributors to missionary societies, has been spent on his "conversion." Though the Jews never preached the doctrine of the tri-personality of the Deity, almost all the ancients were deeply imbued with it, but the original conceptions were nothing like the disfigured and distorted versions of the Trinity, which have made the Athanasian Creed possible.

In Egypt the Trinitarian idea was beautiful, poetic, and natural: God the Father, God the Mother, and God the Child. Osiris, the Father, was worshipped under the similitude of the sun; Isis, the Mother, under that of the earth; and Horus, the Child, under that of the atmosphere; but beyond Osiris, Isis and Horus was the Grand Central Sun, the centre of the Universe, around which all worlds revolve. To this supreme central orb, ineffable and eternal, all loftiest thought was directed, and if any outward form was ever introduced to symbolize the absolute centre, it was that of Alcyone, the centre of the Pleiades, and of the "sidereal heavens," because the most distant orb known to the ancient world.

In India, Brahma, Creator; Vishnu, Preserver; and Siva, Destroyer and Reproducer, expressed the three-fold powers of Deity to the Hindoo mind; but beyond the three was the one Brahm, the Divine Essence, the Unchanging Being, who had no visible forms, and was beyond all outward adoration. Nirvana is said to signify the perfect absorption of the mind of man in a contemplation of the Infinite, till the finite becomes lost in the infinite. To Brahm no altars or temples were erected: he was worshipped only in the heart of man, and was truly the spiritual Deity of the Ancients. Is it not singular that the Church of England litany addresses three persons and one God, following, even if accidentally, directly in the track of those very Brahmans it sends missionaries to convert to Christianity? The enlightened Brahman cannot comprehend the mission of the Christian missionary, because, reading the religious text books of England in the light of his esoteric knowledge of the inner meaning of terms and symbols, he finds Christian conceptions completely analogous with those of the wisest and purest of the ancient Brahmans. But both Brahmanism and Christianity have become corrupt, so missionaries are needed both in England and India; but for the Brahman of to-day and the Christian of to-day, to try and convert each other, is truly a blind man leading another, and both falling into a ditch.)

The idea of divine incarnations, in the persons of Avatars or Messiahs, is extremely natural, because no one can fully realize or sincerely love the abstract. Abstract goodness to us is unintelligible. Impersonal being we can scarcely conceive of. The incarnation idea is an attempt of the human mind to introduce reality into the thought of God. Three persons are two too many, as they produce a confusion in the mind, and belief in them leads naturally to tritheism or polytheism, which certainly prevails to a large extent in Christendom, though all Christians most positively declare that they cannot endure the idea of more Gods than one. But who has ever joined in Trinitarian worship, without feeling the strange incongruity of addressing three separate persons, and yet maintaining that these three are but one.

The mischief which Trinitarianism always accomplishes, is the division of the thought of God into, at least, two irreconcilable parts. The Holy Ghost and Jesus agree very well together in the mind, as the fourteenth chapter of the fourth Gospel, which mentions the Holy Spirit particularly, so closely identifies the Spirit with Jesus, that the coming of the Comforter always seems to mean the coming of Christ in spirit, though his physical form is not present. The attributes of the Son and Holy Ghost are also in accordance. Both reveal truth, both breathe forth loving-kindness, and the mind very naturally associates the idea of Christ with the appearance of Jesus upon earth, and that of his holy spirit as the manifestation of Jesus to his disciples after his removal from the external world. "Wheresoever two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them"; "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you"; "The Lord is that Spirit," and several similar passages in the Gospels and Epistles, favour the idea of the Holy Spirit being really a spiritual manifestation of the ascended Jesus; but between the idea of Father and Son there is no such agreement, unless we get rid entirely of every cardinal assumption of orthodox Trinitarians, with reference to the mission of Jesus and the attributes of God the Father.

The New Testament certainly does not teach orthodox dogmas. If we carefully note such passages as "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son"; "His name shall be called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins," we can trace a perfect unity of feeling between God the Father, and that Great and Holy Teacher, who said, "I and my Father are one"; but if God so loved the world that he gave his Son, then surely God was never so angry with the world that his Son was compelled to assume human nature to assuage his wrath, in order to deliver mankind from everlasting torment. If the mission of Jesus was to deliver his people from their sins, then it was not to save them from the penalty due to transgression, but from sin itself.

All orthodox views of the Trinity are built upon erroneous ideas of justice, sin and the consequences of sin. It is mere absurdity, insult to common sense, to indulge in fiery but meaningless rhetoric concerning the sin of a finite creature, committed in time, being an infinite transgression, meriting an eternal punishment. No human act can possibly be infinite; no human act can possibly merit eternal doom; neither can any act of man possibly merit everlasting happiness or glory.

Now we come to a point of issue, not only with the orthodox believers in everlasting torment, but almost equally with those kind-hearted Universalists, who have represented the God of Calvin without the devil of Calvin; for Calvin, like Mohammed, was really a reviver of the Persian duality, Ormuzd and Ahriman, the power of Light and the power of Darkness, though conjoined in one person. These Universalists, who have taken away the fear of hell and the wrath of God from their theology, have left us with a good-natured, easy-going Deity, who is too kind to damn any of his creatures.

and who takes them all immediately to a heaven of happiness when their earthly life, however short and unsatisfactory it may have been, is ended.

Universalism, as taught in America a century ago as a protest against Calvinism, was an excellent and necessary antidote to the harsh and bitter theology which it supplanted, but to the logical mind, thinking deeply upon the nature of justice, Universalism was a beautiful but unsatisfactory poem; and though the truths it realized have permeated all other denominations to a greater or lesser degree, Universalism itself, even in its sectarian form, has considerably advanced during the past half-century, till Universalism and Unitarianism are now almost identical in America.

Unitarianism is the stronger and healthier system of the two, though it often lacks the intuition, discernment and keen spiritual perception of immortal verities, necessary to make Unitarianism the prevailing religion which speaks to the heart as much as to the intellect. We have known many warm-hearted and deeply spiritual Unitarians, but we have known many extremely agnostic and sceptical. Their religion has seemed of the head rather than of the heart. Their discourses have been learned and extremely intellectual, but they have lacked spiritual power, and have failed to include a strong grasp of immortal life. It is on this account that Unitarianism does not keep and hold many of the greatest thinkers of the age, who are strictly Unitarian in their thought of God. No religious system is complete unless it has the clearest and fullest grasp of Divine Justice, and of the law of Divine Retribution, hereafter as well as here. Some Unitarians, indeed many, have this. Many of their sermons are full of living appreciation of the very highest truths which Spiritualism can possibly teach, and these men require no phenomenal evidences to convince them of the immortality of the human soul, and of progression after death.

The only satisfactory doctrine of the immortal world, which commends itself to reason and intuition alike, is that God is one, and his law is one. As the results of yesterday's activities appear in your condition to-day, as you are to-day preparing yourself to be to-morrow what you could not be, were it not for your having been exactly what you now are, so in the future state, every day prepares you for its successor. When your body dies, and your spirit is emancipated, it does not find itself at the end of a journey, but only at one halting place along the road. Death only introduces you to another state of being, where you can gain fresh experiences, but in the spiritual world you must go on earning whatever you obtain, meriting whatever you enjoy, and thus perpetual misery could only be possible if a spirit were to go on incessantly committing sin, and thus bringing upon him constant punishment for constant sins committed. Immortal happiness is only possible to those who are everlastingly living in accordance with the divine laws of being, which ordain that true felicity must ever follow upon the performance of deeds of genuine benevolence; and it was this gospel Jesus taught, when his mission was to save mankind from the misery consequent upon wrong-doing, by leading persons out of evil and the love of it, into the green pastures of philanthropy, and beside the still waters of integrity.

Justice is to us the one complete and all-expressive word, which pronounces the sum of Divine perfections. Justice we regard as the perfect sphere, the absolute whole. Some people seem to think by employing the phrase—God is Justice, we take away all the softness and beauty of John's delightful declaration—God is Love; but when the poet Bowring wrote that hymn, which has found an honoured place in almost every hymn book, every verse ending with "God is wisdom, God is love," did he take anything away from the beauty and the poetry of the statement—God is Love, by prefacing it with—God is Wisdom? Do we desire to be governed by a being who is unwise, indiscreet, foolishly fond? A merely sweet-tempered ruler, who lacks force of character and true wisdom, may be amiable, but he will certainly be weak, and often make mistakes which will work disastrously to the governed. Perfect wisdom blended with perfect love—these are the elements which go to make up a perfect character, and to us the word Justice, properly interpreted, means love and wisdom in equal proportions. Love is one hemisphere, Wisdom is the other, Justice is the sphere, therefore, when we gain a true idea of justice, we do not mean anything distinct from love and wisdom: we mean love and wisdom both.

Thus the unity and the duality of the Divine Nature are not irreconcilable but perfectly in accord. Our Father and our Mother! should be the cry of every true aspirant to the Divine. We need a Mater noster as well as a Pater noster, in our theology. We need new pronouns to express the thought of God. He and she, not he only, should be used when the Deity is mentioned. Let us make man in our image, after our likeness, said God to himself, or rather said the divine Fatherhood to the divine Motherhood, and man appeared, rational and emotional, spiritual and intellectual, male and female.

As we watch the organisms of the lowest types of animate life, we find they possess the organs of both sexes. Life starts with masculinity and femininity conjoined, and only as the progress of life is upward and onward through material forms, do the sexes appear in separate organisms. The grand old philosophers of ancient days followed nature's suggestions perfectly, when they taught the duality of the human soul: and told how the soul in its paradisiacal home, ere it came in contact with material substance, was male and female; and how, again, when earthly pilgrimages are over, it will be reunited, and form a perfect sphere.

The very highest spiritual truths are in such perfect accord with nature's material revealments, that we are convinced that in the New Dispensation, when knowledge shall be disseminated among the multitude, instead of being confined as of yore to a privileged minority, the deepest mysteries of spiritual being will be deduced from a study of external life; as nature's outward form is but the vesture of the Spirit.

Now, if we have a perfect Sphere as our symbol of Deity, if our conception of the Eternal Mind, be of a Being of infinite and perfect Justice, a Father and a Mother in whom Love and Wisdom are blended in eternal union; if we go one step further and regard all life, all creative and sustaining power throughout the universe, as an emanation from the Divine Centre, as the proceeding influence of God, then we have accounted, we think, satisfactorily for the world-wide belief in a Trinity as expressive and interpretative of Unity.

The Circle is the whole, the Triangle the expression of the Circle. God is Love; God is Wisdom; God is Power: three manifestations of Deific Life. God is Justice, one perfect unity of nature, one divine sum of attributes. Justice is comparable to the perfect ray of white light; Love, Wisdom, and Power are as the three primary colours. Say white, and you mean the whole; say red, or blue, or yellow, and you mean one of the three primary constitutive parts of white.

Such a view of Deity, while it utterly destroys the caricature of the natural and spiritual Trinity prevalent in Christendom, nevertheless explains the origin of the idea of three persons (properly manifestations) but of one God. In the future, as in the olden Trinity, it will be God the Father, God the Mother, and God the Child; and the Child (Son and Daughter), in essence like the Father and Mother, who gave it birth, is none other than the Logos or Word, the Divine Light, which is the life of man; the Divine Energy by which all things are formed and are sustained; the Divine Soul of the laws of Being, who is within you all; the Well-spring of your Immortality; the Divine Nature, deathless as the Eternal, which, having had no beginning, shall also know no end!

IMPROMPTU POEM.

OUR MOTHER WHO ART IN HEAVEN.

A LITTLE boy knelt at his father's side,
When fell the shades of even,
Repeating the old familiar prayer—
"Our Father who art in heaven."
And when he had ended his evening prayer,
And had chanted his little hymn,
Ere he kissed his father and bade him good-night,
He looked up with his eyes all dim
With unshed tears, and with quivering lip
Said: "Father, why may not I say—
Our Mother in heaven, whene'er I kneel down,
At morning and night to pray?

"Is God only Father? In his mighty heart
Is there throbbing no Mother love?
And if I shall see him in heaven so fair,
If I reach to the realms above,
Will God but appear as a strong mighty man?
Oh, tell me, dear father, I pray,
Why manhood is only expressed in our God,
While woman is purest, men say?

"I love you, dear father, you've always been kind,
And dear mother loved you when here,

But mother and father together are best,
  Two parents I want to have here,
And you were so happy when mother was well,
  It seems to me God cannot be Quite happy in heaven, if he's all alone,
  Ruling worlds by his sovereignty."

The father made answer: "God's word has declared,
  That Jehovah, the God over all,
Is far beyond mortal conception and thought,
  His glory must mortals appal,
Unless they behold him in Jesus, his Son,
  And through him alone can ye trace
The tenderness greater than dear mother's love;
  Some day you will look on his face,
And when you are cleansed from every stain,
  From all earthly foibles set free,
The dear loving Jesus will be to you more Than the tenderest mother can be."

"But why," said the child, but half-satisfied yet;
  "Why is Jesus a man, why is he
To be ever expressive of God's inmost heart?
  Why may not my mother, to me—
The one whom I've loved, who has tended me here
  With all love's devotions so free,
Oh, when I'm in heaven, say, shall I not find
  My own mother nearest to me?

"You say that good Jesus atoned for my sin,
  Bore the pain which he bore on the cross,
To redeem me from sorrow and save me from hell,
  But still I remain at a loss
To know, why the Father of Jesus should send
  His Son to this dark world of pain,
That those who had wronged him might, freed from all sin,
  To the heights of his glory attain."

"Oh, child! 'tis a mystery, you must accept
  All that God in the Bible declares,
Or never in heaven, my child, will you sing
  God's praises; for he who dares
To question His Word, or to doubt that the Lord
  Is our Saviour from sin's endless night,
Shall never be found in the Lamb's book of life,
  Or be clothed in garments of white."

The child said no more but betook him to rest,
  He was tired with the heat of the day,
And his poor little brain had been heavily tasked,
  To try to find out God's true way;
His father had baffled him, caused him to doubt,
  When fain he would make him believe,
But the germs of inquiry were rife in his mind,
  And new truth he was nigh to receive.

As he knelt by his bedside alone in the dark,
He prayed that God's Spirit might come,
And reveal to his spirit the truth of the world,
Which his Mother oft told him was home.
He prayed that God's angels, who came in old time
To Joseph, in dead of the night,
Might come also to him, and reveal God's great law,
And into his spirit shed light.

Was he sleeping or dreaming? He never could tell,
Throughout all life's after years;
He only remembers a beautiful form,
Which still often in vision appears.
He thought he was standing on high table land,
Where the spice islands dot all the seas,
Where bright birds, with gay plumage, incessantly sing,
And melody make with the breeze.
There were hill-tops and valleys, and beautiful lakes,
The sky was than sapphires more blue,
The waters were emerald, sunbeams did shine,
Golden with radiant hue,
Beaming forth on the waters in colours unknown,
Unperceived by the flesh eye of man,
Till the landscape was covered with flowers which spoke,
As a friend speaks to his fellow man.

In the midst of that beauty an angel appeared,
But no wings on her shoulders saw he,
She was guiding a vessel, and onward she steered,
While the children on deck sang with glee;
Till at length, close beside him the ship sank to rest,
And the face of the angel beamed bright,
And when she came closer, and touched his dim eyes,
He beheld her, with spiritual sight,
As his Mother, transfigured, grown young, and grown free
From the wrinkles care traced on her brow,
And she whispered: "My darling, I answer your quest,
Come up into heaven, come now!"

She touched him with pressure more tender and mild,
Than mother on earth ever knew,
She took him on board, and presented him there,
As her son, to her beautiful crew,
Saying, "These are my children, who gathered from earth,
In infancy's earliest bloom,
Need guidance and training in spiritual life;
Look there at those flowers, whose perfume
Makes grateful the atmosphere, they whose bright forms
Are so matchless, so choice and so rare:
These are words, these are letters, in language of heaven,
Their voices sound forth in prayer,
In praise, and in answer; wherever we go
The flowers instruct us in love,
They are all living creatures, have voice of their own,
And their songs make sweet music above."

He saw one bright blossom, more fair than the rest,
Far fairer than flowers of earth,
'Twas a typical flower, which bloometh in heaven,
From breath of the angels its birth
Is perfected through stages of growth, which express
The efflux of heavenly truth,
And that flower is immortal, it sees no decay,
It lives in perpetual youth!

That flower ope'd its petals, disclosing its heart,
And that heart was as white as the snow,
As the white beams of pure light, in perfected ray,
Shines forth from the heavens, aglow
With the light of God's presence, this beautiful flower Disclosed two hearts blent in one,
Two lives which were blended in perfect accord,
And together they shone as the sun.

The flower said: "You ask me of God and the Soul;
You say: Have I mother in heaven?
God 's father and mother to every child,
To whom his love life has given;
The angels are dual, and God is the same,
For celestial life doth display
The life of God's image, which feebly on earth
Is enshrined in your bodies of clay."

The flower ceased speaking, the boat glided on,
The Mother just kissed her child;
He felt the warm imprint upon his red lips,
He awoke from his dream, and smiled,
And knew that the vision had answered his prayer,
And, henceforth, he knew not doubt's carking care.

BENEDICTION.

May the light of God's perfect Love,
And His Wisdom, eternally kind,
Lead you all to discover His Justice divine,
And to the Eternal Mind.
May your praises for ever and ever flow,
In deeds, thoughts, and words of peace,
Till you reach those fair regions where griefs enter not,
And doubtings forever cease!

AMEN.

XIV.

WHAT IS PROPERTY?

THE subject with which we have to deal this evening, is one of paramount importance to the whole human family. Its importance, indeed, cannot possibly be over-estimated, as the proper distribution of Land lies at the very root of the question,—How can the ever-increasing population of the globe be adequately sustained, or if the increase continues to be as great during the next century as it has been during the past, how can man manage to exist at all?

There are some who think it safe and wise to leave everything blindly in the hands of fate, but these are not the reformers of the world, neither are they the men and women by whose activities the world makes progress. The true reformer is ever a genuine philanthropist; a whole-souled worker for the mass of mankind, caring for the race rather than for a few privileged members of it; therefore, the reformer is ever opposed by those who have vested interests in monopoly, and there are always to be found in abundance those who think their own personal welfare, and that of their offspring, is of so much more importance than that of mankind universally, that they most vigorously oppose every movement which is set on foot for the abolition of partisanship, clannishness, and all other narrow and exclusive frames of mind, which deny the right of all God's creatures to enjoy an equal share in the good gifts provided by the Eternal for all His children.

Of course there are those who believe in the divine right of kings, in the justice of the laws of entail and primogeniture, which yet hold sway in England, and some even go so far as to say that God has ordained some to positions of honour, and others to positions of dishonour in this world, and that it is sacrilegious to try to alter the divine decrees. But in precisely similar ways has slavery been justified, while polygamy has also been upheld as both sanctioned and commanded by the authority of Holy Writ. But advanced thinkers of all schools, in the churches and out of them, are now beginning to regard nothing as sacred or divine which contravenes justice or interferes with the equal rights and liberties of all sections of mankind, and so desperate are the people at large now becoming, that unless rights and liberties be allowed to the multitude, through the adoption of pacific measures, the passing and enforcement of wise, humane, and equitable laws, England will soon be convulsed with as fierce insurrections as have ever desolated any country of Europe.

The entire question of human emancipation from practical slavery—and the slavery of many nominally free-born children in England is worse than the negro slavery of the past—hinges upon a correct and decisive answer being given to the all-important enquiry: What is Property? If Land be Property, if private property in land be permissible and even just, then in course of a very short time, comparatively speaking, very few people will be anything but abject slaves utterly in the power of absolute and tyrannical masters. If land positively belongs to a few wealthy landowners, and these owners of the soil choose to deny all except their own particular favourites to tread upon their ground, then the bulk of mankind will be forced into the air or the water, in neither of which elements they can live, or even should they be allowed to walk the earth on sufferance, by what possible manner of means could they make provision for their simplest and most pressing wants, if they are denied the right to cultivate the land or build upon it?

The present terrible depression in trade all over England is consequent upon land usurpation. The monopoly of thousands of acres of valuable territory by persons who not only do nothing themselves to increase the value of the land to which they lay claim, but who veto the industries of all who improve it, by taxing the working people of the country so heavily for all improvements made, that it is in many instances impossible for persons to continue to live and pay the ever-increasing rates and rents, which go up as fast as the slightest addition is made to the value of the land claimed by nobles and millionaires who have perhaps lived out of England, or, if at home, far away from the scene of those industries which are daily increasing their revenues, though they have done nothing whatever to deserve the addition of a single farthing to their incomes. There is surely something radically wrong in a system which allows property to increase to an unlimited extent for the personal aggrandisement of a few privileged persons, who are the drones, not the workers, in the great hives of human industry; and it is to the finding of a remedy for this disgraceful and dangerous crime, that the Land Nationalization Society has been established in all parts of England.

You have doubtless all read, or at least heard of "Progress and Poverty," and "Social Problems," two very valuable and instructive works from the pen of that earnest American champion of right and liberty, Mr. Henry George. Those works have been, as all such works are sure to be, most severely criticized, and perhaps they are open to criticism in many particulars, and we must, always remembering that no author is final or infallible, regard criticism as a compliment rather than an insult to an honest agitator, for it is the work of every reformer to set people to thinking for themselves, and we are convinced that whatever makes people discuss these great problems, these burning questions of the day, fearlessly and candidly, must lead, and that very soon, to so complete a revolution in popular sentiment with reference to these matters, that if the theme be only kept prominently before the public, the word Property in the next generation will have an entirely different signification to that commonly accepted at the present moment.

Property is necessarily subject to increase, and can increase without loss or injury, and even with constant gain, to those who assist its increase, as well as to the individuals who are said to hold, own, or possess it. Land cannot be property in the same sense in which the results of labour constitute property, because no one by his own exertions can add to land, except to a very small extent. Certainly there is such a thing as "made land" here and there, as may be instanced in the filling in of the Back Bay, in Boston, U.S.A., and the building of palatial residences, gorgeous churches, and imposing public buildings, where a few years ago it was all water. But the immense bulk of land upon the earth was simply found by man, and could in no possible sense be the property of the finder, as nothing can be rightfully any one's property unless it represent the result of his own personal industry. Still, it is quite just and reasonable to admit that all who discover unoccupied or uncultivated land, have a right to take possession of it for building purposes, and have a right to cultivate it for the supply of their necessities. Therefore, property may consist in what is built upon land, and in what is produced by the cultivation of the soil, as every one has a right to the fruit of his own toil, to the reward of his own labour. But the assumption we entirely repudiate is that made by those who claim that land itself belongs to certain individuals, and that these persons have a right to hold it in perfect idleness, that they may practise cruel sport upon it, or simply retain it for their own amusement.

In many instances the land thus claimed has been actually stolen from its original inhabitants, and has been stolen in the most merciless manner, by usurping tyrants who turned it into a hunting ground, after they had pillaged it and driven the dispossessed inhabitants to starvation, or slain them at the point of the sword. The story of the Black Forest, in every child's History of England, tells the story most truly and graphically, of how the land was cruelly wrested from the people, and profligately spoiled by a company of heartless nobles. From some of these dishonest men, people of great gentility and family antiquity boast descent, and when we hear of people's ancestors having "come over with the Conqueror," and how they are numbered among the upper ten thousand, because their ancestors were ruffians who despoiled countries and put whole populations to death, we cannot but mourn for the false heredity and senseless vanity which allows people of any degree of common sense to glory in tracing their descent from men whose boast it was that by the triumph of might over right, by simple brute force and the use of barbarous and bloody weapons, they gained a foothold for themselves and their descendants on land which only became theirs through grossest acts of heartless tyranny and dastardly destruction of the means of others' subsistence.

This, we are told on every hand, is an age of progress, and so it is in mechanical invention and labour-saving appliances; but is not labour often so saved that the saving of labour in many instances means starvation to those who are dependent upon labour for the means of life? Formerly women could earn good wages as seamstresses, and there were many trades and industries at which they could earn a comfortable living, at which they can now scarcely earn a penny. Everything is being done by machinery, and the machine has brought in its trail many a thousand evils, unfelt by your hard-worked though healthy, happy, and sufficiently-fed ancestors.

This is an age of luxury, and the wants of the people seem to be ever on the increase; but does human happiness or the prosperity of the multitude keep pace with this constant increase in visible signs of wealth? Ostentation and display are rife on every hand, but do we not come face to face every day with poverty, the most abject, crime, the most infamous, and misery, the most hopeless? Are not the streets of every town and city throughout the civilized world. pictures of the most frightful contrasts? On the one hand churches, public buildings, mansions vie with each other in magnificence and costliness. Splendidly-appointed carriages roll by filled with the devotees of rank and fashion, while across the way, the beggar covered with rags is as desolate in modern London as was he who lay covered with sores, with no friends but dogs, at the gate of Dives, in an old Oriental centre of mingled luxury and misery.

The great problem of the age is what to do with the ever-increasing number of those who are born, and who continue to exist unclothed, unwashed, unfed, unsheltered. Gospel Temperance Societies, Total Abstinence Leagues, and many other worthy organizations are formed to counteract vice and misery and put down the sin of intemperance, the prolific source of so much misery and so many abominations; but, was Mr. George, when he replied to a question in Leeds, not so very long ago, very wide of the mark when he declared that drunkenness was occasioned by misery and squalor fully as much as misery and squalor were brought on by drunkenness? The root of the matter lies far deeper down than the excrescences upon the surface of society, and while they do well who strive to banish intemperance, they do still better whose views and measures are yet more radical, and who, seeing a deep-seated cause for the manifold evils all reformers unite in bemoaning, and are endeavouring to suppress, are not content with paliative measures, but going to the very root of the matter, find in the Land Question the only real basis for practical, solid and effectual reform.

Dr. Watts was a sound philosopher, when he taught children to sing, that Satan always finds mischief for idle hands to do. He needs to preach to the sentimental advocates of indiscriminate almsgiving to-day, who, while supporting the lazaroni, who make begging a profession, are also supporting the public houses far more than they support the poor. We do not wish to suppress any natural and spontaneous outburst of charity which any kind-hearted person, touched with sympathy at the sight of human woes, may feel. We do not say, never throw a penny to a beggar in the street, or give a gratuity to an itinerant musician; very often the poor are forced into the streets to beg and sing, because they can get no work to do, while they are both able and willing to work; but work is scarce, wages are low, and labourers are plentiful. Thus, many who would fain work, must either beg or starve; but as discretion is the better part of valour, and we all admire bravery and account it a virtue, though in these days it is not the only or even the highest virtue, as it was among the ancient Romans and the old Latin races, who had only one word for virtue and bravery, as there were not two ideas but only one to express, even charity may not be the less beautiful or sincere, because it is discriminating and has a brain as well as a heart. The goddess Love need not be blind or thoughtless, in order to retain her sweetness, her gentleness, and her poetry. She may well lose the mawkish sentimentality in which she often disguises and disfigures herself, but when people, who are really kind-hearted, add to their sympathy common sense, sound judgment, and real work for the poor, charity will not be the enervated, crippled goddess she often appears to-day, provoking a sneer rather than applause from many, who though they do not wear their hearts upon their sleeves for every daw to peck at, are nevertheless sound, practical, political economists, who though not characterized by sentimentality, are keenly alive to the sorrows of the world, and do all in their power to remove them.

We can never confine ourselves to the advocacy of any one system of reform, when we see so many springing up around us, all proceeding from sincere good will to mankind and earnest effort for the improvement of the race; but if there is one scheme more important than all the rest, it is the Nationalization of the Land, as this scheme enters into the cause of direct suffering, and while aiming at the immediate relief of present distress, as do all other and less radical measures, it aims also at preventing a recurrence of these disasters in the next generation.

Work is the sovereign remedy for every ill. Labour, which occasions suffering and painful exhaustion, may be traceable to the transgression of a divine law, or to human imperfection; but work itself is divine. All religions picture an active God, and all who tell of angels speak of them as busy as well as happy beings. Every child is born with a love of occupation, and no system of school education or home training is anything like complete, or even praiseworthy or worthy of recommendation, unless it makes provision for the employment of every faculty of mind and body. Mischief is the misdirection of energy. Never aim at the annihilation or suppression of a faculty, taste, appetite, or talent, but aim at harmony in the use of all. Aim at symmetrical unfoldment, aim at roundness of character, and remember that everybody is good for something, and, given a fair chance, every one may become useful if not great.)

Mrs. Weldon, whose name is now a household work to all readers of the daily newspapers, when conducting an orphanage, entirely her own enterprise, some years ago in London, says she found every child who could be picked up in the gutter good for something; and that brave, philanthropic and cultured lady, who loves children and makes them love her, has discovered means for calling forth their latent powers, so that every one may be an ornament to society, if his or her education is only persevered with.

Some reformers are Malthusians, and see no other way of limiting distress than by limiting the population, and while we are quite ready to admit that in the present state of society many children are born only to grow up as criminals and sufferers, we do not anticipate any evil from the birth of any number of sound, healthy children who, coming from good parents, and being themselves well educated, shall be able to fill useful and honourable places in society. The population of Great Britain, without Ireland, at the present time is about thirty millions in round numbers, and it has been computed that were it ninety millions, the country would be quite large enough to sustain the people were the land properly distributed and cultivated, and were monopolies abolished and political rings broken up. In America the land can sustain twenty times its present population, and then not be at all overcrowded. Australia, amply large enough to sustain hundreds of millions, is now occupied by just a few millions of Anglo-Saxons and a handful of Aborigines. The land, not yet under cultivation in the British colonies and dependencies, can be made to sustain so great a number of persons in comfort and even affluence, that the overpopulation of the world is something so remote that it is quite useless even to discuss it. But unless the Land Question is decided, and that very swiftly, the world will be practically overpeopled with perhaps a twentieth part of the number which could be easily sustained, without any further improvements in agriculture or the practise of any superior economy than that which already prevails.

Turn where you will, and you are on somebody's land. Someone has set up a claim to private property in the very earth you tread, therefore, you are on that land by permission or on sufferance. It is not your own, and should you improve it entirely at your own expense, the bulk of remuneration would not go to you, who are the active, and, indeed, sole cause of the bettered condition of that spot of earth. The revenue derived from your labour increases the rent-roll of your landlord, who is very likely, at the present moment, on the Continent, spending his money abroad, and not adding even to the support of trade in his native country, or in any manner to the wealth and prosperity of the people whose earnings he is squandering on selfish luxury, at some fashionable haunt of dissipation abroad.

One of the greatest and loudest outcries against oppressive landlordism in Ireland, began with the protest against the Irish land-owner exacting higher and higher rents from Irish farmers, because they, his tenantry, improved the land, while he squandered their earnings abroad, and had a larger profit every year, if they were only industrious enough to keep on improving his property. Had they received the use of the land, with the understanding that improvements were to be accepted in lieu of rent, the scheme might have been fair enough, and have been an incentive to the tenants to work; but who cares to improve land to fill fuller still the already overfilled coffers of some peer or landlord, who cares nothing whatever for his tenantry, and appoints bailiffs and stewards to enforce extortionate rents, and evict all tenants who cannot meet his disgraceful demands? (Do you wonder at the present disorganized and dangerous condition of Ireland? Blame the Land League, and Mr. Parnell, if you will; protest with all your might and main against the iniquitous outrages which the infuriated Celt has resorted to in his desperation, but be not hard on the sinner whom injustice has turned into a criminal, and then let the original offender receive your compassion and laudation, while you condemn to imprisonment, or even death, the lawless champion of freedom, who, though acting ever so rashly and unwisely, is still, in his rude way, uttering his protest against that tyranny and oppression, which you all, as Englishmen, affect to hate.

Home Rule may not be the means of saving Ireland, even if it is obtained. England has Home Rule, but here the condition of many of the working people, and of paupers generally, is little better than in Ireland. England has not been desolated by famine so much as Ireland. Englishmen are not quite so improvident and impetuous as Irishmen, but if things go on for another fifty years in England as they are going now, England will be the scene of as much fighting and desolation as Ireland is the scene of at the present moment.

America has Home Rule, and yet across the Atlantic the self same evils are threatening the nation of the United States, as are threatening England. There the Stewarts, the Vanderbilts and other monopolists and millionaires, are fast buying up all the available land, and if they are ever induced to sell, though they buy cheap, they are determined to sell dear, and, by controlling the stock markets, are the means of bringing frequent panics upon the country. These panics, of course, mean suffering to multitudes of innocent persons, and though these men are spoken of in many avowedly Christian circles as honourable and religious gentlemen, no thief or highway robber can really be more dishonest than he who, taking advantage of his neighbour's necessity, compels him to pay an extortionate duty upon the very necessaries of life, as is the case when railroads are under the control of indivdual monopolists. Rates of passenger travel and freight transportation are regulated by the arbitrary decree of the man or men to whom not only the railroad property, but the land through which the trains pass, belongs. By controlling railroads and steamships, freight can only be transported if the owner of the means of transportation gives leave, and his permission gained, he charges whatever he thinks fit. This makes the necessaries of life extremely dear.

Therefore, in the Eastern States, Western produce can only be obtained at fabulous prices, and though the States are nominally united, the monopolist does all he can to keep the union a fact in name only.

Co-operation has been suggested as the sovereign remedy for all these ills. Societary versus individual property has been advocated, as peasant proprietary in land has been suggested by many as the true solvent of the land difficulty. Now, as to co-operation, theoretically it is irreproachable. The ideal co-operative schemes, of which we hear so much, are well nigh perfect. So were the Owens' communistic plans, and the failure of either Co-operation or Communism, in an actualized state of society, is due, not to an error in the ideal system, but in the means of carrying it out. There is a danger everywhere from the tendency of large organizations soon coming under the dictation of a very few wealthy and influential men, and these are considered, by the country at large, extremely important because of their wealth. No matter how they got it, the vote of a man of immense capital is worth more, in the eyes of all aspirants to political power, than that of a labourer.

Make all votes of equal value, establish manhood, yea, and womanhood suffrage, too, and if there be evils accruing to the nation at first, from the adoption of so broad and liberal a policy, these evils will be but the excrescences by means of which the bad blood of the nation, the virus which inoculated its veins in the old feudal times, and has been lurking as a deadly poison within ever since, will be thrust forth; as the agitation, and even revolution, consequent upon the franchise, cannot be permanent, though for a while a sudden accession of liberty sweeps down like an avalanche upon the land, and the timid fear for the future, not knowing that the turmoil of the present is but the harbinger of happier and more peaceful days.

Co-operation, independent of officialism and party strife, will be a fact so soon as the great mass of men and women find it to their interest to club together, and stand shoulder to shoulder as one man, against a common foe. While individuals cannot easily become large capitalists, except in very rare instances, the accumulated and united capital of a multitude can be a power sufficient to offset that of any and every millionaire.

Now, should the great People arise in their might, and determine to counteract the existing evils, they must compete with the monopolies of the day, and can do so provided they can trust one another, and work together as partners in a common firm. A railroad built and managed as the property of a million, controlled by representatives chosen from the people, might leave undisturbed the manœuvres of monopolists, and yet at a cheap rate do all the business of the country, and leave the monopolists' enterprise to sink or swim as best it might. But the great question which arises is—How shall the people get possession of the land whereon to build and create wealth? For nothing can be done without land, and that is fast disappearing even from those who are ready to pay a fair price for it. It is in the hands of an ever-narrowing few, who hold it with a death grip, and who are starving the million to support the handful.

There is at present an old land tax of four shillings in the pound on all English land, a mere fraction of which is now paid. Enforce that tax as a step towards the absolute nationalization of the land, and the burden of taxation will fall, not upon those who make good, but bad, or no use of their property. If four shillings in the pound should be the tax levied upon the justly-estimated value of land all over the country, then those whose land was of little or no use to them need not pay the tax: they could at once allow it to become the property of the Government. Those who cultivated land, and built upon it, would be the means of employing many who are now idlers, able and willing to work, but without employment or the means of subsistence. Houses would become more plentiful, food would be cheaper, clothes would find purchasers, and by the proper employment of the unoccupied thousands, strikes and panics would be averted, and the country saved, and all through the settlement of the land difficulty. No one should be allowed to claim what he does not employ for the general good, and no one should be permitted to so underpay labourers as to allow the rich to be ever growing richer, while the poor are ever becoming poorer.

Peasant Proprietary has been suggested as a means of settling all the present embarrassing and pressing questions with reference to land, but while peasant proprietary may be an ameliorative or palliative measure, it does not partake of the nature of a radical reform. It would temporarily reduce the evil, it would allay some immediate distress, it would split up vast estates and farms into many small ones, but it does not propose a radical change in the present system of land proprietorship. Private property in land is admitted by the peasant proprietor as much as by the wealthiest earl or duke, while the advocates of peasant proprietary, of course, cannot object on principle to the ownership of land by individuals, and until we clearly understand the injustice of any claim to the ownership of land, we shall not have solved our problem or settled our dispute.

The Peasant Proprietor says he has laboured hard to possess himself of a small estate, which he shall be able to bequeath to his children after him, and he asks, very naturally—Have I not a right to do what I will with my own, and is not that my own for which I have industriously laboured, year after year? Is that which I have earned to be taken from me? Am I to forfeit everything, and see my property distributed among the multitude? Our answer is—You can never have worked for or earned land, though you may by your own industries have rendered land valuable which was comparatively worthless before you took it in hand. You may have procured the right to the fruitage of certain acres of ground and to the buildings upon it, but the land itself does not belong to you, merely because you have discovered it, or brought forth its latent powers, causing it to yield a luxuriant harvest. But if you, possessed of this land as you think justly, should be compelled to deliver it up to the Nation, you must of course claim and receive compensation for what is reasonably your own. The Nation, or the State, having the right to take the land, has not the right to grasp the fruit of your toil. Now, you did not make the land, therefore, it is not yours. The ground is the property of God, and you did not buy it of the Creator. It has been decreed to you by no special gift from Him. The land belongs to all men equally. The Creator has given it to the inhabitants of the earth, without favour or restriction, and no one person can possibly say he has a greater right to land than another has.

But how will you divide the land from the results of the labour which has made it fruitful? How will you separate between the property of the man from whom you take the land, and the land itself? The answer, to us, is very simple. If the State takes your land as it is, with all the improvements or buildings upon it, which are results of your industry, you must be compensated for all that is yours; as the State has no right with anything except the land itself. An offer may be made to you to retain possession of the land, by payment of ground rent to the State. You must pay your tax on the land instead of on the property, and we do not think if the taxation were shifted, if you were all obliged to pay for using land because the land is national not private property, and were then excused from all tax upon legitimate private property, that any one of you would be injured. A reasonable scheme of land nationalization merely forces all persons to pay the public for the use of land, which is public property, but does not extort money from any one because he improves the land, and thereby cheapens the commodities of life, and by increasing lawful competition benefits the entire community.

Now, the immediate advantages of land nationalization would surely be these. The nation claiming the land, but not its produce or the buildings erected upon it, would compel all who keep land idle, as pleasure or hunting ground, to pay dearly for the privilege of playing dog-in-the-manger, or devoting some of the best parts of the country to purposes of cruel sport. Fox-hunting, grouse and pigeon-shooting, and other sports indulged in by the nobility and landed gentry, are surely of no use to the country, and why should a privileged few be allowed to amuse themselves at the nation's expense, without paying, and that pretty dearly, for the privilege. Suppose the land tax of four shillings in the pound were rigorously enforced in every case, on the evenly estimated value of land, and the valuation were determined and fixed at a uniform rate by the chosen representatives of the people, assembled in convocation, then if any chose to pay this tax, they would be pouring into the nation's coffers an amount of wealth by no means inconsiderable, which could at once be utilized in many schemes of improvement. But those who make no use of land at all, and really receive no enjoyment from the nominal possession of it, would surely, in most instances, deliver it up to the nation, or else improve it or build upon it.

Now, if it were improved, cultivated, built upon, these works could not be undertaken without the employment of a large number of men to do the necessary work. As the land became fruitful or covered with houses, which could be sold or rented, the wealth of the country would positively increase, as wealth is created by labour, and the enrichment of the masses does not necessarily mean the impoverishment of any body. If land cannot be added to at will, while capital can be increased by labour to a practically unlimited degree, as all property was originally the result of labour, we do not see that any one needs to suffer by the nation's claiming the land. If those who are now holding it unoccupied shall be obliged to pay the nation for their tenure of it, they will simply be forced to make it productive, or in some way remunerative, that they may still afford to hold it; and by making it fruitful, or building upon it, they enrich the nation, and have an opportunity of enriching themselves also, as labour creates capital, thereby adding to the wealth of all who work or furnish the means for the carrying on of any industry.

If this land tax were at once rigorously enforced in every instance, a very large amount of land would at once be given up, and that land could be utilized in providing bread for the starving millions, and clothing for the multitudes who now go naked in the streets. We want more houses, more clothing for the masses. Hundreds of miserable creatures are huddled together in foul, unhealthy tenements; thousands go supperless to bed, and starve in nakedness in the streets, while the cry is everywhere, that the warehouses are overstocked, that work can only be allowed half-time, that England is producing more than she can consume. Labourers and workmen of all trades are striking for higher wages. Many mills and factories are only working half-time, and others are closed altogether. A general panic seems imminent, unless some radical plan is at once devised and carried into execution for the remunerative employment of the masses.

England does not produce too much, she produces too little. Every unlet house is required as a home for many who are homeless, every unsold yard of cotton or linen stuff is needed absolutely, imperatively demanded, to cover the almost naked limbs of the many who wander from place to place without rags to cover their nakedness. The present condition of England is as bad as that of old Rome ere she fell, and unless England be warned and repent in time, her place among the nations will know her no more. She will miserably perish, as did the great nations of the old world, who, when they were priding themselves upon their greatness, fell, not from the attacks of Goths and Vandals who swooped down upon them from the North like vultures eager for their prey, but because the plebians were many and the land was not theirs; they would not fight for the masters, who oppressed them in times of peace, and commanded them to take up arms against the invader in times of war. The patricians dug their graves with their own hands, they pulled down their houses about their own ears, and when they fell, the free world rejoiced as it ever must over the downfall of a tyrant.

If England were besieged to-day, how would she sustain herself, in the present disaffected condition of her children? Where would that union be found, which alone secures invincibility? England has so many vipers hugged close to her bosom, that she needs to set matters straight at home before she arouses the ire of all lovers of peace and justice, by seeking to add to her foreign dominion by aggression and bloodshed. The war with Egypt is a miserable fiasco, a wretched burlesque, calling forth the contempt and ridicule of all onlookers. England's present condition is not what it was in the eyes of other nations, and should the time arrive when England shall again become the scene of bloody conflict, how will she sustain herself, how breast the storm which even now seems gathering thick about her? There is but one means of prevention for coming disasters, but one means of securing to England a great and noble place and name in the annals of future history, that is—make Englishmen a unit, let the masses be so employed and remunerated that England becomes self-sustaining, not longer so miserably dependent as she now is on foreign countries; and this can be done in the course of a few short years, solely by employing her own subjects upon the land which now lies idle, and relieving the masses from the terrific burden of supporting a few land-owners in luxury, while the million starves as soon as it can no longer work, or starves, as is in many instances the case, while it is able and willing to work, but can get no work to do.

You will perceive that the scheme which we propose is both an equitable and simple one; it is, moreover, a very practical and easy one. We do not wildly and quixotically propose to divide the land into as many pieces as there are inhabitants, and then give each individual a share. We propose to make the nation itself the steward of all the land, then if you wish to hire land the State is your landlord. You pay for the use of the land you occupy, not to a private individual, but to the nation, in the persons of its chosen representatives, who are bound to employ the national capital in national improvement. To-day the multitudes are working for tyrannical masters, many of whom hoard their wealth or squander it abroad. If you work for the State you work really for yourselves. The governors must be elected by you; they must represent you and use the money you contribute to the general fund for public improvement. Thus can the nation support itself, and you have no taxes to pay nor higher rents, because you are industrious and use the land. You pay for the use of land, if you claim it, whether you use it or not. If you cannot afford to hold it in idleness, you must employ it, and by employing it you benefit all who work for you, and increase your own revenue into the bargain.

Every one knows that if a thousand or a million able-bodied, skilful men should take possession of some unoccupied ground, and build upon it and make it fruitful, they would be adding to the wealth of mankind, without robbing anybody of a penny; and as this has been done abroad, and is still being done in the Colonies and Western States of America, why not turn the estates now lying idle into habitable and productive ground? By employing under Government a large number of workmen, who would work for the State instead of the individual employer, and be well paid for their labour, what results would accrue to the nation at large? Why, very shortly all the unbought goods in the warehouses would be upon the backs of those who at present are almost naked; work would become more plentiful and wages higher; the demand and supply would alike increase, and by this simple addition to the amount of work in demand, a panic would be averted, strikes would die out, and the working people would become self-supporting, and more, they would earn enough to live in comfort, and to make provision for a rainy day.

If parents can take care of their children and educate them, let them do so, but in cases where children are brought up to beg and steal, and have no proper homes, the State might well step in (or better, private parties), and see that no child is allowed to grow up without an education, enabling him or her to earn an honest living at some useful trade.

We believe in the sanctity of Home as much as any one; we advocate independence and self-ownership as much as any; we do not believe in an abstract State swallowing up all individual homes and property, though the time will come when communism will be rendered practicable, and be found the highest state of society;—all we ask for now is that the one who works may have the benefit of his labour; that no dogs-in-the-manger be caressed; that justice reign supreme; and no one be allowed an undue advantage over his neighbour.

In these few and imperfect suggestions for the nationalization of land, we know we have not gone sufficiently into detail to make our views clearly intelligible to all; but in a single lecture, that is, of course, impossible. What we have said has been said merely in the hope of inducing you all to consider this great question, and to place before you our honest conviction as to what may and should be done, and that without delay, to minimize distress, and at length remove it from the globe.

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE CRY FOR BREAD.

WHY are the children hungry? They cry for bread in the street;
Surely the earth produces enough for them all to eat!
I have seen the loaded fruit-trees, in the orchards all so fair,
I have gazed on the golden corn-fields, and, on resounding air,
Have heard the song of feasters, and seen them cast away
The bread, for which men perish in many a street each day!

Why are the children naked, or covered but in rags?
Why do they wander sadly? While each one lamely drags
His tired form from door to door, and through the bustling streets,
Petitions, with heart-rending cry, of every one he meets,—

Oh! buy my pretty flowers, all withering in the sun;
But if he cannot sell them, then, when the day is done,
He sleeps within some shelter, so hard, and cold, and rude,
Or, left out in the dreary streets, he starves for lack of food.

Why are the people homeless? since there are mansions fair,
Unoccupied, yet beauteous, and gardens sweet and rare,
Where flowers bloom but none see them, for high walls built around,
Fence in these sacred precincts, where luxuries abound:
The children freeze and hunger, the women faint and die,
With weary babes pressed to their breasts, in want and misery!

Shall no one feed the children, take off the beggar's rags?
Is charity so tardy that every day she lags;
While death and sorrow increase, while land lies idle still,
That the noble may but own it, though it should the peasant kill?

Have ye no homes made ready, to invite the children in?
Have ye no schools to teach them to build, to knit, to spin?
Have ye no food to give them—those waifs along life's way—
Those foundlings, whom the city swallows like beasts of prey.

Are there no empty homesteads, where children could shed light?
Are there none, tender-hearted, who'd make their own lives bright,
If they would take the children and lead them in the way—
The path of honest labour—which brings the triumph day?

The cry for bread goes upward; the angels hear the cry;
And when the children perish in want and misery;
Their loving arms embrace them, their loving voices cheer,
And the angels draw to heaven those who on earth are drear.

Are there no angels dwelling upon the earth to-day,
Embodied here among you, to drive this curse away;
This dreadful curse of hunger, this poverty so dread:
Are there no means of succour; can the children ne'er be fed?
The Angel of the Earth declares, that it can render bread
For all the starving millions: then raise such food, we pray,
By dint of honest labour, that all have enough each day!

If mighty lords and ladies control the land of God,
If wealth stalks by in purple, while pressed against the sod,
Are the weary forms and faces of those who long to die,
Workless and wealthless, striving in ceaseless misery;
Then pass good laws, we pray you, that all may sow and reap,
That all, through honest labour, may smile where now they weep.

Let loving justice guide you, let love for all mankind
Direct your every measure, till laws become refined
From ancient, feudal cringing to nobles, but in name;
Take ye the rich, broad acres which now the proud lords claim,
Take them by legislation, by voice, which raised for right,
Clamours for Justice only, for Freedom's pure delight!

Take all that now lies idle: there build, there reap, there sow
For future generations plant good seed, that will grow,
And call that man the noblest, who truthfully can boast,
That his work is the bravest, and does of good the most.

The barren lands rejoicing, the wilderness will sing,
Where now the cooped-up children, in dens which miseries bring,
Playing in fields and meadows, breathing the country air,
Eating the bread of honest toil, these will full shortly share
The blessings God is ready to freely shower on all,
Delay not to obey it—the spirit's urgent call;
But go ye and deal justly, let loving justice guide,
And the laws that are most loving, most stable will abide.

BENEDICTION.

May the light of love, so brightly,
  Shine on your every way,
That darkness, injustice, and wrong,
  Like clouds shall pass away,
Before the rising brightness
  Of the sun of the New Day,
Which rises (healing in its wings)
  To drive all want away!

AMEN.

XV.

TRUE SPIRITUAL MARRIAGE.

THE question of Marriage, is one ever recurring, ever interesting, ever important, as marriage is essential to the constitution of home and the rearing of offspring; and as you all very well know, the sanctity of home invaded, children neglected, the true union of man and woman annulled, necessarily leads to the disintegration of society, the destruction and overthrow of all that is most worth preserving in the social order. But a question may well be asked, and that is—Whether the prevailing ideas of the marriage covenant are the highest conceivable, or whether, in a further advanced and more perfect state of human society, the marriage union may not be one of greater solidity and felicity than it ordinarily is at present?

Unquestionably, Marriage is both a divine and natural institution. The union of one man with one woman is ever higher than polygamy, as it approaches nearer to the divine ideal of celestial union, which union is nothing less than the perfect blending of the two halves of one soul, in the perfect bliss of angelic association for eternity.

Swedenborg, when discoursing upon the loves of the angels and describing the married state in heaven, declares that angels are dual beings; that the highest degree of life attainable in this direction, is that marriage of the individual which makes two one. Within the human soul itself this union is consummated, and to this Jesus doubtless alluded when he said, that in the resurrection they would neither marry nor be given in marriage, but would be as the angels. This allusion to angelhood would be meaningless and vague, unless those addressed were familiar with the idea of angelhood, and knew what the teacher meant when he said, that all who participated in the blessedness of the resurrection would be as the angels.

The word angel, of course, literally and simply means a minister or messenger, and it is said in the Psalms, that angels are spirits; in the Apocalypse angels are mentioned as having charge over the seven churches of Asia; and there are those who so interpret the angel in that connection, that they ordain ministers to take charge of congregations, and call them angels, as is the custom among the followers of Edward Irving, the highest minister in the "Catholic Apostolic Church" being designated an angel. This interpretation may be in no sense erroneous, as an angel certainly does mean an exalted minister and a divine messenger, and when in its highest sense it is used to designate those who in spirit-life have attained to the celestial degree, it signifies those who, having completely conquered every material temptation, and learned every lesson earthly experience can teach, no more require the discipline of earthly suffering and pain, neither the sorrows and separations, which may be encountered in spirit-life, until the spirit has become quite delivered from the bondage of all earthward desires and inclinations.

Plato, alluding to the inmost soul of man, declares that the soul itself is dual, and therefore no human life, as expressed on earth to-day, expresses more than half the primal life of spirit. Thus a soul is two spirits, as a globe is two hemispheres, and on account of this division of the soul on earth, it is not good for man to be alone. Every human life seeks companionship, all desire the complement to themselves, and this perpetual longing for companionship evidences the fact of the soul not being perfect upon the earth. Merely earthly unions are for time only, but that marriage which is the best you are capable of making at a given time, may serve a useful purpose in time, though no place can be given to it in eternity. Those companions, with whom you may have pleasantly and peacefully passed a portion of your earthly life-time, may greet you as dear friends in spirit life, but the earthly partner there may not be the conjugal mate.

No earthly law can bind except for time, no ordinance or statute of the Church or State refers to the life beyond the grave. Thus the minister of religion or the civil magistrate, pronouncing the marriage blessing over the husband and wife at the altar, can declare no further than that the union, which is there and then consummated, may last until death parts. Even the Church of Rome, most inexorable in the tying of the marriage knot, not permitting of divorce, allows widows and widowers to marry again. If the Church sanctions second marriages, and yet believes in immortality, evidently the Pope himself admits that the marriage covenant on earth is a covenant for time only; and if any one reads the introduction to the marriage service in the Church of England Prayer-book, he will soon discover that that church has no idea whatever of the perpetuation of earthly union in the immortal world. Nevertheless, the Gospel says, that those whom God has joined together no man can put asunder. If the Church has joined you, the Church can divorce you. if the State has united you, the State can separate you. But if your union be a union made by the Eternal. then no earthly power, civil or ecclesiastical, has power to break the bond.

We have often alluded in your hearing, to the soul's priority to the material form, and have told you that the soul's consciousness, not ending with the animation of the body, has not begun with it, and is certainly not derived from it. The soul unembodied, in the paradise from which you came to earth, in that scarce-remembered home where you dwelt before matter attracted you to the earth, and caused you to take on a physical embodiment, was pure as the snow as yet unfallen, unsullied as the water from the clearest spring, ere yet it has encountered the dust of earth.

The old-time fable of primeval paradise, the Eden state of humanity unfallen. portrays in glowing Oriental allegory the purity and peace of the primal home of souls. The Soul itself, both primal and absolute, a unit of life, imperishable and uncreated, ancient as the Divine Mind, immortal as the Eternal Spirit, prior to assuming a material form dwelt as a perfect globe or ultimate atom of life, in that paradise of which the poets speak. When Schiller speaks of his spirit's reminiscences, when Shelley speaks of trailing clouds of glory accompanying the spirit earthward from its primal home,—these poets sing of that pure life of innocence and peace, which souls have left to tread the troubled round of earthly being.

Some ask—Why should the spirit fall? But then—Why should the seed be planted? Why should the infant lose the innocence of babyhood, and with maturity encounter the storms of earth, and buffet with the billows of a thousand ills and dangers? As every possibility of future glory is embedded in the tiny seed implanted in the ground, as only what is involved in the typal germ can be outwrought through evolution in the full-fledged blossom, as the acorn enshrines, though latently, every possibility of the oak's fruition, so every babe holds in his inmost life every promise of manhood, womanhood and angelhood, which shall ever burst forth from out the infant being, as it progresses towards the perfection of eternal life.

Darwin may boast of having found the law of evolution, Spencer may follow him along his labyrinthine path, and seek the soul imprisoned in the dust, as though the dust first gave it birth. All the scientists, which the earth has ever produced, may enquire of protoplasm, of animalcules, of the lowest signs of vitality on earth, but the dust will never unravel the mysteries of Spirit, no material combinations evolve intelligence, no "evoluted" outward forms can ever prove the origin of spirit, though each one may register some attainment of the soul, which on its outward journey has fashioned the monad ere it formed the duad, and the jelly-fish and monkey ere the earth was ripe for man. Then when human life appeared, one half the soul was embodied in the form of man, the other in the form of woman.

The Spirit of God, working through all the processes of nature, formed man (humanity) at first, both male and female. How many human beings were first formed, or where they first appeared, the records do not say, but Genesis declares, when God made human life in the image of the Deity, he made that life both male and female. When first the soul approaches earth, the soul divides, and the philosophy of counterparts is, that one spirit is but half the soul. The two halves seek each other through earthly life, and through the spheres, until at length the celestial union is attained. The two discover that they are but one, and in the bliss of life eternal there is neither male nor female, but the perfect life in which the two are one.

Paul, writing to the Galatians, says, "In Christ there is neither male nor female," meaning that the divine life, and that of humanity perfected, is not single but dual; and when in Genesis God speaks to God, or angel speak to angel, saying, Let us make the human race in our image and after our likeness,—the allusion is to the duality of life. The half of the soul addresses the other, and in that is expressed the true duality, which is the perfect unity of God. King David said, whenever he should wake up in God's likeness, he would be satisfied; and no soul is satisfied before the celestial marriage, for nothing short of it contents the spirit, and only to the extent that earthly unions resemble the divine, are they felicitous or spiritually lawful and enduring.

We do not deny that many unions upon earth are spiritually lawful and accomplish good, even though they may not be eternal. All human acts on earth can be but relatively right, as only a relative amount of light is given to earth's children, and if when at the marriage altar you can say to the man beside you—This man I love more than all others; I have singled him out from his fellows to be my spouse, not because of rank or wealth, but because of the love I bear him,—then your husband is such to you in more than name. But if for gold or lands you shall allow the form of marriage, submit to the outer rite, while the heart is a stranger to the ceremony, then though your bridal array be ever so pure, and you conform ever so perfectly to the laws of man, your marriage is but mockery in the sight of heaven. The earthly law is not clairvoyant, its representatives have not the power to read the heart, therefore earthly ordinances are often unavailing in the sight of heaven, because they are but cloaks, disguises, resorted to to cover shame and wrong.

No one can positively foretell the future, no one can know all that is in store for him. The best may be deceived, or may unconsciously, unwillingly deceive themselves: and if you find you have made a mistake, you are not a sinner; you are free from blame if the mistake be nothing more. Thus we do not say that all unhappy marriages began in sin or wilful deceit, but if they were free from this dishonour, they certainly took rise in ignorance, and can be nothing higher than painful and humiliating experiences, needed, to teach the spirit which passes through them, lessons which can be learned successfully in no other school than that of such experiences as these, painful though they be.

Those, who make such mistakes unconsciously, deserve pity, not censure. They suffer quite sufficiently in their own lives, without having to encounter the jibes and jeers and condemnations of their pharisaical accusers. Even if adultery be committed, the policy Jesus adopted was not to curse the sinner, but to seek her reformation. If those who follow

Jesus nominally would follow him in reality, instead of recrimination and abuse we should hear of sympathy and kindly exhortation, not condonence with iniquity, but the helping hand outstretched to enlighten the benighted and reform the evil doer.

Angels never indulge in harsh invective, they never censure those who are not as pure as they are themselves, for well they know that censure only drives the sinners deeper and deeper into the pit of degradation. Those who draw in their skirts and pass by on the other side, considering themselves too holy even to touch the garments of a fallen sister, may be the very first to fall when temptation is presented to them; while those who have risen superior to it, can afford to sympathize and uplift, not dreading the contagion of another's vice, then can safely seek the reformation of the offender.

The present deplorable condition of morals, both public and private, in all centres of modern culture, is due not only to the weakness of human nature, as is often said, but in very large degree to the extremely faulty and incomplete training of girls. This defect in their education, coupled with the false notions of woman's rightful sphere, instilled into the minds of girls almost from infancy, is one of the most fruitful causes of woman's degradation, where vice flaunts itself unblushingly in the streets of all your towns and cities.

Man is styled the lord of creation, woman is to be his vassal, the creature of his will, the child of his caprice, the toy that he may play with to-day and ruin to-morrow. The man who blasts a woman's name, deceives her when she has confided in his honour, is said to have been "indiscreet." He "sowed wild oats" in youth, but all men are alike. He is received with honour in society. He may pick his bride from among the fairest in the land. He may lead a spotless virgin in her teens to the hymenial altar, and is considered a suitable partner for the flower of some illustrious flock of pure and trusting maidens; while the woman whom he has deceived, whose life he has cruelly blasted, is no fit company for such honourable gentlemen as he.

Far be it from us to wish to degrade women to the level of fashionable society men; far be it from us to do other than seek to secure in its fullest beauty the purity of woman; but, in common justice, let there be but one law for man and woman, and let not that be accounted excusable in the stronger which is condemned as inexcusable in the weaker vessel.

According to the present law, woman is inferior to man, no matter what her mental power or moral excellence may be. Because she is a woman, she is therefore man's inferior. A drunken and illiterate man of brutal habits enjoys the franchise; he can go to the polls and assist in electing a member of Parliament, or a member of the Senate, but should a woman be ever so talented, ever so worthy, ever so qualified to vote intelligently, she must be denied a voice in the affairs of State, merely because she is a woman.

It is both nonsensical and unjust for the opponents of Woman Suffrage to say that woman's rightful place is home; it is equally unjust to deny the ballot to all women, because some say they do not want it. Some men do not vote, and no one can compel them, but suffrage rightfully considered is a duty as well as a privilege, and as right laws affect women as much as men, and women can earn property as well as men through their own industry, what can possibly be a grosser injustice than taxation without representation?

Of course, if women prove themselves incompetent for certain kinds of work, now undertaken by men only, those particular fields of labour must ever be the scene of man's undivided operations. Truly, woman does not go to battle, and is not often fitted for a soldier's life, still there have been women who, like Joan of Arc, have headed armies and displayed a bravery on the field of battle, which if man could imitate he has never been known to surpass. But we have had too much of warfare; we need not to deify those who can excel only in works of slaughter. It is not he who drives the knife into his brother or shoots him dead with a revolver or slays him on the battle field, who will be accounted worthy of renown in coming days.

It is Bright, the advocate of peace, who, even more than Gladstone, powerful and eloquent though he be, is looked up to as the greatest statesman of the times, by those whose spiritual vision is least beclouded. The altars of gods of war are fast falling into decay. It is not the god of battles who is adored by the most refined and spiritual of earth's inhabitants to-day. Thus woman's disinclination for cruel sports and cruel battle, will be her passport to honour in the coming days, for she who renders strife impossible, is surely greater than he who engenders it.

It is to woman that all the world looks, as the bringer-forth of the Redeemer. A virgin must conceive, and bear a son, and call his name Emmanel, which means God with us. The virgin-mother of Christ, Mary immaculate, brought forth a sinless babe, according to the records, and because of the purity of her conception it was styled miraculous. A miracle, indeed, it must have been, if ever wife or maiden brought forth a child unpolluted with hereditary taint, in the days when Israel, sunk in degradation, was a vassal of the profligate and declining Roman Empire! Not to be wondered at, is it, that a legend passing strange was woven around the history of so remarkable a mother and her child.

But whenever an unusually-divine result has been obtained, the world has attributed it to a miracle, deeming it necessary that the laws of nature should be set aside, that a child should be born without the stain of sin. But it is not obedience to the law, but disobedience thereunto, which brings sin and sorrow to the world. God's laws, the laws of nature, are not themselves impure, and when the time shall have arrived that they are thoroughly obeyed, every birth will be a divine incarnation, every mother will be pure as unpolluted maid, and God's sons and daughters will people the earth, and life celestial shall at length be ultimated upon earth.

The dreams of sage, poet and prophet, concerning the Golden Age, are not too bright and hopeful to be real. No picture of the future of the world is any too highly coloured. Isaiah's prediction of the perfect people, whose swords are converted into plough-shares and into pruning hooks, will yet be perfectly fulfilled; and when that day shall dawn, the age of harmony shall be heralded by such divine messengers, as with the dual voice of man and woman, the blended powers of mind and soul, of intellect and of affection, shall demonstrate that perfect union of all faculties of mind and spirit, which are never truly understood or rightfully applied till every organ of the brain and conception of the spirit fills its own distinctive niche, and contributes its own peculiar part to universal harmony.

The highest life must be a symphony; the powers of human nature must play together like many instruments in an orchestra, or many voices in a choir: as in the Book of Revelation, the perfect life is symboled in the woman, whose diadem shines bright with the blended lustre of twelve stars. Twelve and its multiples ever signify completeness. The head adorned with diadem of twelve stars, is an allusion to the twelve-fold glories of the perfected reason, while the clothing of the body with the sun, means that the inner light of love, with all-encompassing sheen of golden glory, must robe, as in a vestment of perpetual and unsullied light, she who is to bring forth the Male Child, who is to rule the earth with Rod of Iron, signifying power and might invincible, strength adequate to accomplish the final overthrow of ignorance and wrong; while the moon beneath her feet, emblem of all material desires and all external wealth, signifies the ultimate conquest of the soul over matter, and the complete subjection of the material to the spiritual being.

Have you never pondered over the story of the Sphinx, grim and hoary with years, with woman's head and lion's body? This mystic figure stood in ancient Egypt, propounding her question to every passer-by. What was the riddle of the Sphinx, but the query of to-day: How shall power and gentleness, how shall love and law, how shall intellect and affection, how shall science and religion, how shall man and woman be so united, that there be no more conflict between the material and the spiritual realms? If any one can answer that interrogation, the veil is rent in the midst of the temple of human life, the glass, through which truth is but darkly seen, is broken, and, face to face, is the vision of truth discerned. The destruction of the Sphinx is but the end of mystery, of conflict, of all gloom and doubt, the unveiling of the secrets of eternity, the acceptance by man on earth of truth in the celestial degree. The letter killeth but the spirit giveth life.

How shall justice be merciful and mercy just? How shall infamy be slain, society protected, the criminal reformed, and yet the death-penalty be abolished, and dungeon cells give place to light and airy schools of industry, reformatories and hospitals for the morally sick and mentally deformed? How shall more than Plato's dream of an ideal republic be made practical, and a state of society be attained where the weak are made strong, the crooked straight, no one harshly dealt with, and no one slain?

The voices of the angels of the New Messiah are on the air: their songs upon the breeze proclaim deliverance to the captives, emancipation for all in bondage; and this New Dispensation of truth, even now dawning, is the age of man and woman, of reason and of love, the age of reconciliation and mutual understanding, when neither science nor religion, the brain nor the heart, man nor woman shall be unduly exalted, the one above the other.

True marriage means equality. Woman is to be man's helpmate, and a helpmate is not a servant or an inferior, but an equal. We often hear men speak of their wives as though they were less than themselves intellectually. If that be so, and sometimes it is, the woman is either superior in her intuitive perceptions, which removes the inequality and balances the temperaments, or the marriage is an unhappy one.

It is often said, that a couple cannot agree: they are too much alike. Though that expression sounds strange to unaccustomed ears, and the prevailing idea has usually been, that persons must be very nearly alike in order to blend well, there is great truth in the expression—they cannot agree because they are too much alike. No one is perfect, no one has all the elements of greatness within himself, and it stands to reason no one will be satisfied with a mere echo or repetition of himself, unless he be so insufferably conceited as to live in perpetual thirst for flattery, able to conceive of nothing more delightful than the heaven of the egotist, which would be a hell to all sensible or unselfish persons.

Good contrasts are always better than bad matches. Colours which are very dissimilar offset each other, showing each other up to the best possible advantage. But a very brilliant red or blue close beside the same colour, a shade paler, is not usually an artistic success. Either one colour must reign alone, or when there are but two, those two must be such contrasts that the one helps the other, so that a pleasing harmony of blended effect is produced.

Now, with regard to the blending of temperaments. A great deal has been said about positive and negative being brought together, and the prevailing idea has been that a strong, proud, masterful man should marry a gentle, docile, confiding, and simple-minded woman. Some such unions have been relatively good, and the outward results have been apparently satisfactory. There are some men, and women also, who are never happy unless they are playing the part of king or queen, master or mistress. They have a greater desire to be obeyed than to be loved; they want some one to control, some one to look up to them, and follow their lead unquestioningly. A man or woman of this type wants a servant rather than a companion, a pupil rather than a confidante. Then, on the other hand, there are those who are never happy except when they are ruled. They love to look up to someone else, and are seemingly unable to originate any ideas, or take the lead in any enterprise.

We know men who have absolutely ruled their wives, and wives who have absolutely ruled their husbands, and have yet been extremely happy and well-suited to each other. But these unions are not the highest; they are certainly not the closest earthly approximations to the blessedness of celestial oneness of life, for in the angelic state, one is as positive as the other, one as negative as the other, only where the one is positive the other is negative, and where the one is negative the other is positive. They both are equal in all the elements which go to make up character. They may be likened to a world in which land and water are equally divided. They are never wearisome to each other, can never exhaust each other, for the one has what the other lacks, and in such exact proportions, that the two really make one. That is the spiritual theory of counterparts; that is the prophecy of future marriage; and whensoever you have attained to so well-balanced a state of mind, that you are equally poised and have found your equilibrium, there will be no stronger and no weaker vessel, no masculine superiority, no feminine inferiority; for wheresoever one is superior to the other, one is a mystery to the other, and one is a disappointment to the other.

Similarity of tastes is necessary to a happy union, and yet similarity in occupation may often be a mistake on earth. Nevertheless, in the case of the poet and poetess, Mr. and Mrs. Browning; in the case of those eminent and noble Spiritualists, Mr. and Mrs. Howitt, or Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, both have been literary, both have taken up the pen, both have worked in the same field, yet there has been no rivalry. They have always spoken affectionately and approvingly of each other's work, and, though engaged in similar pursuits, the one mind has suggested what the other could not have perceived, and so they have complemented each other's labours, and given the world a glimpse of what true marriage union may be, will be, and must be.

But when the outward work is not similar, the appreciations and sympathies of the pair may be united. The man, for instance, may be a great statesman, a man of letters, a politician, or he may be a physician, a surgeon, a lawyer, or a minister of religion. The woman, who is his wife, may be a poetess, an artist, a singer, one who spends her time entirely with the muses, yet she has a fine brain, quick intellectual perceptions, a keen, analytical mind. She is far more intuitive than her husband. She looks at matters from the other side, but she is no ignoramus; she is no soft, simpering woman, who writes silly sonnets, sings sentimental songs from morning till night, and goes into hysterics at the slightest disappointments. She is a brave, strong, sensible woman; musical, artistic, poetic, æsthetic; and yet her husband can discuss with her the merits of Gladstone's latest speech in Parliament. She can read his law books with him, and help him to solve a knotty problem in theology. Perhaps she could not take his place, and he certainly could not fill hers; but she is charmed with his discourse, her mind gladly drinks in the wisdom he imparts, while he, tired with unceasing mental strain, finds in her love of the beautiful and cultivation of the arts, the very balm he needs to soothe his weary brain, after the struggles and turmoils of his professional or business career.

Without extending our observations further along this line, we have said enough to illustrate a principle, and that is, that true equality does not mean that one shall be in all things exactly on a par with the other, but that one shall always be able to fill the void, or supply the defect in the life of his or her companion.

Women should be brought up to fill any place in society which man can fill, not that they may need to fill it, but they must be ready for it in case it is opened to them.

The duties of motherhood are often so pressing, that women who have families of young children cannot, in duty to their offspring, leave home to appear in public; and, indeed, their time may be so occupied with home duties, that to neglect them, even for important literary work, would be a sin. A woman who intends to entrust her children to the care of hirelings, should never become a mother. Her own child, not a dog, should be a mother's constant companion wherever she goes; as a child needs to imbibe a mother's life by constant contact with her, if the mother is to become really the parent and guardian of her offspring.

But if some of the very best years of a woman's life are spent in rearing children, is that any reason why she should not be a highly-cultured woman, capable of filling the highest place in Church or State, should occasion demand? No qualifications can possibly be too great, to render one a pattern mother, and if, when she has leisure from domestic duties, she devotes herself to the improvement of society, by efforts of tongue or pen, instead of spending her spare hours in foolish and unhealthy dissipation,—will not the world at large, and her own husband and children in particular, be immensely benefitted, if the wife and mother, instead of striving to be a fashionable belle, a queen of society, endeavours to work with heart and brain for the improvement of the race?

Alas! for those husbands, sons, and brothers, who feel that the women in their families are their inferiors. Alas! for those who cannot confide in the wife or mother, feeling that only a man can understand them, and have sufficient common sense to pass an opinion worthy of their consideration. Superior women make superior men, and that woman alone is fitted to be the wife or mother of a man of real power, who can be in all things his confidante and bosom friend.

The present system of training girls, leads to the desecration of home, the support of men's clubs, where husbands learn to forsake their wives, fathers to neglect their children. The education of girls, not simply in accomplishments, the training of daughters to be useful more than ornamental, and the throwing open of the doors of every hall and college in the civilized land to woman, is imperatively demanded, to open the way for the purification of society, and the breaking up of those infamous assemblies, where man rules alone to oppress woman, and where no other means are devised for the healing of the nations than that warfare, strife, and aggression, which sooner or later, unless it be abolished, must lead to the overthrow of any nation which allows it.

Not to render women unfeminine, not to disqualify them for the duties of wife and mother, but to render them the better able to perform these duties well, do we advocate the acknowledgment, before the law, of man and woman as the perfect equals of each other.)

IMPROMPTU POEM.

TWO HEARTS THAT BEAT AS ONE.

BEFORE the World from Chaos was brought forth!
Before the sea or air or sky were known!
Before yon glorious orb of light portrayed
The glories of that light which suns have known!
Before God's Spirit breathed upon the slumbering clay,
And woke man into being by His mighty word,—
In realms afar, beyond all mortal ken,
Two human spirits tidings of God's plan had heard!

At that far-distant time they were as one,
Had never known a separate life, for there,
In paradise, before material birth,—
Knew not how souls must human bodies wear,
To unfold their powers, and bring into relief
The native graces of that life within,
Which unto God for evermore must turn,
As it in God for ever must begin!—

These spirits—cherub, seraph, two in one—
Were like two children happy in their play,
Like two sweet infants who, in babyhood,
Can know no shadow of life's dark dismay;
Obeying all God's will, they sweetly moved
Like two Æolian harps, who aye respond
Unto each breath of air, which reaches them.
In closest union were these spirits, fond,
United in such true, seraphic bliss,
As in the paradise unforfeited, those beings know,
Who have not yet heard matter call to them,
And earth appeal to draw them into clay.

But one day came an angel, radiant, bright,
With golden crown upon a lofty brow,
Where wisdom sat, while from her eyes sweet love
Shone forth, such as God's servants show,
Who, through life's pilgrimage of trial and pain,
At length to homes of perfect bliss attain.
So, soon as she approached, these spirits said:
"Oh! why are we not beautiful as thou?
We are content in our pure innocence,
But then we have no crowns upon our brow,
No palm of conquest, and no victor's dowers:
Oh! say, how can such bliss be ever ours?"

"My children," said the angel, bending down
In tenderest fondness o'er that childlike pair;
"I am a guardian sent to you, that I
The mystery of life's unfoldment may declare.
Ye have just felt the pain of strong desire,
To be more beautiful, more fully blest:
The earth attracts you downward unto it,
And ye must needs descend, then enter into rest.

"But if ye follow these impulsions, strange,
Then through long ages ye must separate be,
Endure all earthly ills, and wear all earthly chains,
And, for a while, of heaven forgetful be.
Ye needs must dwell apart, and union crave,
But when ye meet in heaven for evermore,
Then, beautiful as I, will ye appear,
And sing the angel's song, upon celestial shores."
"Oh! let us go," the spirits answered; "we
Can bear a little parting, though 'twill be such pain,
If in the future ages we, like you,
Can such transcendent height of glory gain."

"Then, be it so," the angel then replied;
"And, lest ye wander all too far, I'll be your guide;
Ye will not always know that I am near,
But, though unseen, your every cry I'll hear;
And when ye think you're all alone, I'll be Beside you, ever watching faithfully."

* * * * * * *

Into a quiet garden came an angel form,
So beautiful and bright, it startled one who knelt
In lonely prayer and anguish inexpressible.
A yearning in her heart for love she felt.
She had known honour, wealth, and power and state;
Had been caressed and feted, made to taste
All that the world calls sweet and most desires:
But still her heart for something more aspires.
Suitors had she, and those who loved her well,
Yet in her heart a burning prayer did swell
For one, she felt most sure would some day bring
All she desired, upon life's rosy wing.
This was her guardian angel who drew near,
One whom she loved and trusted, and felt near;
E'en when her earthly eyes were holden most,
She felt the nearness of her brighter sphere,
And while thus weeping, musing upon love,
And what would fully satisfy her heart,
This angel said: "Go quickly to a scene
Of pain and woe, where, in death's sharpest smart,
One lies in suffering, calling on the name
Of some dear maiden, whom he seems to see
Before him always in his every dream:
She only soothes him in his misery!"

* * * * * * *

Beside a solitary couch a woman kneels:
A man is dying, in his palid cheek
No hue of health is left, and in his eyes
There is no lustre; but, with love so meek,
So saintly, so angelic, doth she look
Into his fading eyes, while he in hers
Gazes, until his deepest soul, within,
With tender memories of distant ages stirs.
His voice is faint, his eyes can scarcely see,
But yet he murmurs in his broken tone:
"We were together once, in some sweet paradise,
And when we both from this dark world have flown,
Then once again together shall we move,
The depths of wisdom and of love to prove!"

* * * * * * *

'Tis summer-time, and over hill and dale
The sun shines brightly, and the flowers are gay:
But in one grave two hearts, that beat as one,
In peaceful quiet, softly, calmly lay.
They passed together from these scenes of care;
They both had suffered, both through pain grown strong;
They were prepared for the angel's crown,
Ready to join in heaven's triumphant song.
And when their eyes were opened, in the life above,
They knew that theirs was an eternal love:
Its birth in paradise they then discerned,
And the two mortals to one angel turned!
One in so far, that every thought agreed, and yet Companions were they and for aye will be;
And when ye all have fully vanquished sense,
And over earth gained final victory,
Then will some beauteous angel unto you
Make known the dual mystery of the spirit birth,
And teach you how two hearts that beat as one,
Though long times sundered while upon the earth,
At length must meet, and will for ever prove
The eternal sweetness of the soul's abiding love;

BENEDICTION.

May the light of the Spirit of Truth be your constant guide through earth, leading you day by day ever nearer and nearer to that Divine Estate, where no life shall be sad or lone or solitary; but where all bask in the fulness of joy immortal, and are satisfied for ever in the likeness of God! AMEN.

XVI.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE OF THE APOCALYPSE.

The Woman, the Male Child, and the Beast.

THE book of Revelation, though one of the books of the canonical Scriptures, is so mystical and abstruse to general readers, that it is anything but a revelation to the majority of Bible students. To Martin Luther this book (the Apocalypse) was so incomprehensible, that he rejected it, refusing to allow that it was a divinely-inspired document; but to Emmanuel Swedenborg it was, with the book of Daniel, the most fruitful source of spiritual instruction and delight.

In his "Apocalypse Unveiled," Swedenborg undertakes to unfold the esoteric or inner meaning of the book, in the light of a spiritual history and prophecy concerning the earth as well as the spiritual world; and while we do not intend to confine ourselves to any particular methods of interpretation, we certainly intend to treat the Apocalypse, not as a mythical history of a golden Rome, which is all it appears to be to many modern critics of the sceptical type, but as a figurative embodiment of those essential truths and principles of being, which the Ancients were ever wont to set forth in Kabalistic form, for the enlightenment of all who were sufficiently advanced spiritually to comprehend the metaphorical language which, while it hides from the uninstructed, reveals to the student of the figure-language of the ancient Orders of spiritual scientists and historians all over the world, not only the past but also the future history of the earth and its inhabitants.

Time was when but one language universally prevailed among the learned, and even now that language has not become obsolete, though it is understood only by the comparatively few, as masonic signs, emblems and pass-words have no meaning to those who are not Masons.

The confounding of tongues at the time of the building of the Tower of Babel, doubtless alludes historically to a period when diverse written languages were substituted for the simple, universal and expressive language of numerals, adopted by the Grecian sages in latter days, as well as by the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and others at much earlier periods of human progress.

You have doubtless most of you heard of the Pythagorean system of Numerals, and of how Pythagoras, the sage of Samos, was wont to convey spiritual ideas to his pupils by means of numbers. Almost the first thing which strikes the reader of the book of Revelation, is the constant reference to numbers in that book, and no one carefully perusing it can fail to see how persistently the same numbers are employed in similar connections. In order to make the way plain for what is to follow, it will be well for us to give you the generally-accepted significance of numbers, only reminding you at the same time that there is always room for some differences of interpretation, as it is not every Order that subscribes to the original formularies of the most ancient Spiritual Orders upon the earth. We would further remark, that these numbers have a definite place and value in nature, and that whether you turn your eyes to the starry heavens above your heads or to the flowery sward beneath your feet, you are constrained to allow that nature herself, or the power that maps her out, is versed in the kindred sciences of mathematics and geometry. Nature mathematizes and geometrizes at every step of her way. The number of stars in a system is fixed, the number of petals in a flower is fixed, and these perfect expressions of exact principles in geometry, go on from age to age, duplicating themselves, with no power to guide them other than that law, immutable and eternal, the law of nature which is the law of God.

Behind all phenomena, mind may be traced by those who have ability to discern it, but not by those who are so utterly engrossed in the senses that their spiritual perceptions are too dormant to be employed. The idea of a Divine Mind to-morrow will be far clearer than it is to-day, even as the doubt of to-day is healthier than the unreasoning credulity of yesterday. But doubt is only transitional: revolutions in popular sentiment are always accomplished by the demolition of much that is old and something that is beautiful; but revolutions and reactions are not permanent, uncertainty and doubt are not ultimate conditions of the human mind, and thus the progress of mankind has ever been through periods of sorrow, difficulty, doubt and strife, which have at length resulted in the establishment of kingdoms or republics, of greater harmony and justice than any which have been overthrown at the time of a political crisis or social inundation, which has dethroned despots but uplifted the mass of mankind.

You must have been forcibly struck, if you have ever attentively read the Apocalypse, with the remarkable recurrence of certain numbers always in similar connections. 7 is always applied to things divine; 12 and its multiples to a completed gathering, in which all states and conditions of life are represented; while 6 is the number of the Dragon, the Beast, False Prophet and Accuser, which from times immemorial has expressed its baneful power in all institutions founded upon selfishness and supported by oppression, injustice, tyranny and strife. The number 1, of course, signifies perfect and eternal unity; it may mean the essential primary or ultimate atom of life, whatever that may be, or it may mean the Eternal Spirit, or the perfect whole of God's Kingdom may be intended; but whenever and wherever introduced, it always signifies the sphere of life unbroken and undivided.

The Circle was the most ancient symbol of Deity and of the Soul itself, and must ever be the perfect symbol of unity, in heaven or on earth. All suns and worlds grow spherical as they advance towards perfection. The ultimate condition of the earth, will undoubtedly be perfect sphericity of form, and when it shall have attained to its ultimate estate of progress as a globe, then will it describe a perfect circle round the sun, and be itself perfect as a globe of equal land and water. All temperaments and temperatures will be blended into a harmonious whole; the race of man will be unitary, languages will have lost themselves in one perfect and expressive tongue, which all will speak and all will understand; while Science and Religion—the one employing the intellect chiefly, and the other making the more direct appeal to the emotions or affections—will traverse the beautified earth, hand in hand as a perfectly united pair, the one complementing the other, but with never a word or thought of discord or division between them.

The number 2 is, of course, expressive of duality. It divides the Circle into two equal halves, breaks the Sphere into two equal hemispheres, as justice, we told you in a previous lecture, was divisible into love and wisdom, and the Divine Spirit should be adored as our Father and our Mother, the infinite Two-in-one, even as the soul of man is also essentially dual; and yet duality and unity are in such perfect accord, that the one is dual and the two form a unit. The number 3 carries you just a step further outward from the Circle or centre, and as the Triangle perfectly breaks and interprets the Circle without detracting from its essential oneness, so the figure 3, in all masonic and ecclesiastical emblems, means not only fatherhood and motherhood, but offspring in addition. Thus Justice may be the one, sovereign, all-inclusive attribute of the Deity. Love may be the one hemisphere and Wisdom the other, so that love and wisdom form a compound when perfectly blended, and that compound is justice; love being one half of justice, while wisdom is the other half; and then when this perfect justice operates, it fills the universe with life and light and law, so that the Divine Word goes forth, the Logos is embodied, only you must ever bear in mind that prevailing notions of the Trinity are mistaken, because they separate the Child from the Holy Spirit, and call the Child the Son only. The Child and the Holy Spirit are one and the same, the offspring of Deity; and the offspring or proceeding influence of a unitary and yet dual parent, must necessarily be dual also. The Son and the Daughter must constitute the Child of God, while the sole-begotten of the Father and the Mother, must be the perfect number of all souls in the universe, who in their primal and ultimate estate must be all pure and immaculate as the soul of that great teacher, whom all Christendom adores as the brightness of God's glory and the express image of his person.

The personality of God can never be fully explained to human thought or understanding, by reason of man limiting the idea of personality to that which is circumscribed, and has definite size, form and strength. Perhaps individuality is a clearer and better word than personality, and conveys to the mind a clearer idea of persistent and unchanging unity and self-conscious identity. In man outward personality has no stability, only the soul which is the primal unit is immortal, and while no one has approached the soul through the avenues of any one of the five bodily senses, as the soul cannot be seen, heard, tasted, touched or smelt, and is therefore ignored by Materialism altogether, as it requires intuition or interior perception to ascertain that there is a soul, even as it requires an eye to discern colour, an ear to detect sound, nostrils to distinguish odours, a palate to appreciate flavour. and bodily sensation to know how objects feel, whether they be rough or smooth, hot or cold; and as it is easy to imagine the possession of four senses without the fifth, or even of only one without the other four, so it appears to us quite logical, in the absence of demonstrated proof of a spirit or a spiritual world, to accept it as not unlikely, that those who hold interior communion with the spirit world, are simply possessed of more than ordinary quickness of perception, in specified directions, or may have the use of some subtle, discriminating sense, called intuition, which transcends the bodily organs, but never denies what outward perception can positively reveal.

The mystery of God is no greater than that of man. To account for a universe without a Supreme Spirit, is far more difficult than to admit the existence from eternity of a self-conscious and all-controlling Will; and surely if atoms may be regarded as eternal, if motion may be thought to be eternal, you can logically proceed one step further and admit one more proposition. and that is, consciousness and will are eternal. If this admission be not made, than nature is all blank, chaotic, meaningless and void, and the order of the heavens and of the earth is the result of a blind force, to believe in which requires far more gullibility than to admit the existence of Deity.

But time warns us that, if we diverge in any measure from our subject, we shall have to finish our discourse without having explained, ever so slightly, those mysterious personages who figure so prominently in the book of Revelation, with which you will naturally expect us somewhat to deal. We must, therefore, hasten our explanations of numbers and their significance, and at once proceed to giving you, in the light of the values ascribed to numbers, the meanings we attach to the characters introduced upon the stage of this profound and glowing allegory.

We have finished our allusions to the Deity and to the Soul when we have passed beyond the number 3, for 1, signifying unity, 2, duality, and 3, trinity, exhaust the figures which are consecrated to the embodiment of the idea of God, and the first principle of nature. 4, which stands next in order, is, as you all know, indicative of the Square, and this is the basis of all equitable rule, of all true masonry, of all fellowship between men and nations, of all propagation of truth, or evangelization of the world. Upon the Square, the Great Egyptian Pyramid, and all minor pyramids, built later and after its pattern, repose. The Square is the base of the Triangle, and with its 4 corners, one directed to each separate point of the compass, eloquently describes the perfect thought of Universal Brotherhood. To act on the square is a common expression, signifying to deal fairly with each other. 5 signifies Government, or the hand of power, the active employment of that ability and intention which the square embodies. You have all heard of the five points of human fellowship in masonry, and to those who are Masons, it will be unnecessary, if they are at all indoctrinated into the mysteries of their craft, to do more than allude to this emblem, while to all who are not connected with any Secret Order, a further explanation of the symbol would be scarcely intelligible. 6 is the one number out of all, which distinctly indicates failure and incompleteness. It is the Number of the Beast, and of the Man of Sin. It is never mentioned in the Apocalypse, except in connection with the seeming triumph of ungodliness. Following next in order after the 5 of Government, it indicates government in which the spirit has no part, for 7 is the number of the Spirit, and of all spiritual things.

There are 7 golden candlesticks, 7 spirits of God, 7 lamps of fire burning before the throne, while you are constantly referred to 7 spiritual spheres beyond the earth, as signifying the completed number of the states through which all spirits on their road to perfect purity must pass. 7 days or epochs of creative power are mentioned in the Genesis. The seventh day must be the day of rest, and while Geology and Genesis apparently conflict, and in the letter Genesis is faulty, and so written that it suited the childish comprehension of the Hebrews, in a period of their history when they needed to be led and could not walk alone, still the institution of the Sabbath as an imperative necessity remains to-day, and will be needed until the time arrives when men and animals are alike so constantly, agreeably and yet no longer exhaustively employed, that all days will be Sabbaths, because all will be times of rest even though all are periods of ceaseless activity. True rest does not mean something synonymous with idleness, but when the faculties have been overstrained or too severely taxed, then a temporary cessation of active work is positively required, to fit the jaded form or mind for another encounter with the struggles of existence.

The French Revolutionists endeavoured to substitute one day in ten instead of one in seven, as a period of rest and respite both for man and beast; but the old Jewish legislators had probed more deeply than they into the needs of human nature, and one day in seven had to be restored as a period of rest, because the Sabbath is a hygienic, a sanitary, a physiological necessity, necessary for ox and ass, for horse and mule, as well as for son and daughter, man-servant and maid-servant; and when in olden days the Sabbath laws were most severe and were most unsparingly enforced, the wise Hebrew rulers sought to put into execution only such statutes and ordinances as contributed most effectually to the general maintenance of health and order. Their methods may sometimes have been unnecessarily severe, but times have changed since then, and we doubt very much whether the bungling politicians of the present day, could have devised better and wiser laws for the government of a people, most difficult to rule, had they been obliged to legislate in an Oriental, slave-holding country, for a people who were always prone to rebellion, and whose culture and opportunities were immensely inferior to those of modern nations, whether Jew or Gentile.

8 is always significant of good, and by many interpreters is considered as the Square raised to superior power, and therefore illustrates the two-fold idea of Brotherhood and of the Promulgation of Truth. 8 following upon 7, which signifies the spiritualization of mankind, and the attainment of perfection morally, coupled with enduring success, must have reference to such brotherhoods and methods as have for object the dissemination of spiritual knowledge; while 9 is never mentioned except with reference to angelic life, 9 choirs of angels being spoken of; but this sacred number never refers to mundane or external states of being.

The Number of the Beast is 6, and the three sixes in the entire number 666, allude to failure physically, intellectually and spiritually. Thus it is stated Kabalistically, when 666 is given as the Number of the Beast, that the powers of darkness shall not eventually triumph, though they reach to so elevated a condition, that they are apparently on the very verge of absolute conquest, but ere the moment of anticipated victory arrives the Beast is put to flight.

You have doubtless, all of you, been struck with the remarkable way in which the Beast, the Serpent, the Old Dragon and the Devil are identified. The Man of Sin, and the False Prophet, are mentioned as emissaries of the Beast, and seem to go before him, as John the Baptist prepares the way for Christ, and Elijah is said to come before the installation of the King of Glory, upon his throne of undivided power upon the earth. The dragon, serpent or beast is a very interesting subject of study, as he is identified with the devil, and hearing so much of the devil, as you all must if you are accustomed to Christian teaching, it may be interesting and profitable to enquire: Who or what is the Devil, and how best can we withstand his assaults and protect ourselves against his cunning?

Genesis says God created the heavens and the earth, all forms of vegetation, animal life and man. We are told he formed the greater and the lesser lights which shine in the firmanent above, but no hell, no devil did he create. But we are told God had made a serpent, and that serpent was more subtle than all the beasts of the field, and that serpent apparently walked upright and had the gift of speech, before he made, first Eve, and then Adam to fall into sin, and thus to forfeit paradise.

Now, a talking snake or walking serpent would be a curiosity, which would draw great crowds to a menagerie, and we are sure, if one could be found, it would be most eagerly sought after by the naturalists all over the world. Persons would even be willing to take long journeys in the interests of science, to minutely observe such a remarkable phenomenon. If there had been such a creature at Corinth in the days of Paul, surely it would have excited considerable attention, and been mentioned in contemporaneous history; but Paul tells the Corinthian Christians to beware lest the serpent which tempted Eve likewise tempt them.

What is this mysterious Serpent? It is a type of the sensual nature of man; its voice is heard in all lustful desires; the fruits of which it desires the race to partake are fruits which, like apples of Sodom, are fair to look upon, but turn to ashes in the mouth. Let every child be taught to flee from this seducing reptile, this disturber of man's peace, by holding the carnal appetites in check, and chaining the lusts of the flesh in bondage to reason and the soul. Never tell your children there is a devil outside of them, whom they need to fear; never picture the roaring lion, as the enemy of souls, seeking his prey, lurking in every corner to catch the unwary, as an external foe; but rather explain to all under your charge, that there are two natures in every human being; the one of the earth earthy, seeking to drag the spirit down to the level of the dust; the other pure, spiritual, holy, ever seeking to lift the animal nature into such union with itself that every material instinct obeys the mandate of the soul, and all material things become subservient to the sway of mind, the supremacy of Spirit.

The Serpent is evidently an ancient symbol of the material universe, and among olden philosophers it was customary to divide the universe into the Kingdom of Light and the Kingdom of Darkness: the Kingdom of Light being good, and under the dominion of Spirit; the Kingdom of Darkness being evil, and all Matter was considered evil by some philosophers. This doctrine of the goodness of Spirit and the vileness of Matter crept into the Christian Church in very early times, and was notably advocated by the Manichæans and others, who espoused a corrupt philosophy, which taught duality in quite another sense from that in which the purest and most enlightened philosophy inculcated this doctrine.

We have often told our hearers of the duality of the Soul, as something entirely different from the old Persian dualism, which tried to support the idea of rival deites, and taught of Ormuzd and Ahriman as co-equal gods; but it must be remembered that the Zendavesta declares that each of these divine persons had power to create only six gods each, and 6 is the number of the Beast, and never of the triumphant Spirit of Good. In order to divide 12, the symbol of completion, numerically speaking, into equal parts, you can only attribute failure to both contending parties; but should you grant perfection or find victory to one, allowing that its power attained the sevenfold degree, 5 would alone remain for the opposing party, and thus there would be no equal division. These old allegories, with their weird and fantastic illustrations, are all fraught with the deepest interior significance to those who have acquainted themselves with the modes adopted by the Ancients, to set forth the constant struggle incessantly waging between the powers of good and evil. But good only is eternal, primal.

absolute: good had no beginning and can have no end; evil, beginning in time, may cease to be.

Theodore Parker owed much of his success to his unfaltering faith in the essential goodness of human nature. He never looked upon any life as useless, or any condition of being as irreclaimably and absolutely bad. Thus he won the hearts as well as the ears of the multitude, and caused people to feel the truth and beauty of his philosophy, as well as to think upon what addressed itself to their intellects.

To say that there cannot be two Almighties is merely to assert a truism. How confident the author of the 139th psalm, must of been of this, when he exclaimed, "If I make my bed in hell, behold, Thou art there." Truly, that hell may have been but sheol, the grave, as the hell in which the soul of the just one was not left was only hades, or the place of departed spirits. But then there are no other hells ever mentioned in the Scripture than these two, the one, sheol, the grave for the body; the other, hades, the place where spirits yet unprepared for heaven must remain, until they are ready for the inheritance of the saints in light.

Milton sings of Lucifer, the star that fell from Heaven, and Milton became a Unitarian before he passed from earth. His own works, "Paradise Lost" and "Paradise Regained," so opened his eyes to the fallacy of the prevailing idolatry which divides the universe between God and the Devil, that he threw belief in the devil overboard, and was satisfied to trust in one only true Almighty Source of life, who can be best described in Lord Lyton's phrase, which he puts into the mouth of the Vril-ya,—The All-Good!

Astronomers may point to the asteroids between Mars and Jupiter, and imagine them to be the fragments of some disrupted orb, and there are those who have taught that the inhabitants of that lost planet are now embodied upon earth, and doing penance here for crimes committed on that other earth, which fell a prey to destruction because of the wickedness of its inhabitants. This idea has been prominently brought before the public of late, in a book entitled "Spiritual Manifestations," by Rev. Charles Beecher, a brother of the famous Brooklyn preacher, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher; and also in Allan Kardec's recently translated "Genesis." These views are considered purely visionary by many, and they are certainly of a highly speculative character, but whether right or wrong, they are an immense improvement on the old idea of a future eternity of evil, and the irreclaimability of those who have once forfeited their original paradisiacal estate of innocence.

We do not say that we fully endorse those views, but we do regard them as evidences of the progress of thought in these days, and find no fault with them on moral grounds, as their moral tendency is not objectionable; the moral tendency of every theory, which teaches the remedial nature of punishment, being upward in its tendency.

Certainly the real "Beast" or "Dragon" which we have to combat, is one we either make or encourage for ourselves, and the beast which to-day usurps the place of Deity in many quarters, even among highly-civilized and Christian peoples, is the Golden Calf, which Aaron made, symbol of that love of gold and worship of material power and state, which has caused the downfall of many an ancient people, and threatens to destroy all modern nations which feed this Beast in their midst to-day.

The Dragon, no doubt, originally signified Draco or Scorpio, the autumnal sign of the zodiac which heralded the on-coming of winter, supposed by the ignorant among the Ancients to be the season when spirits of darkness held empire over the earth. The Great Dragon, a mighty constellation or group of stars, was also greatly dreaded, and supposed to be the throne and seat of the powers of darkness, as the Pleiades were always described as the homes of the gods.

It is not extraordinary that people imagined day to be the work of God, and night the work of his Adversary. It is not wonderful that summer inspired men's hearts with the sense of the goodness of the Eternal, while winter suggested to their minds the thought of an avenging rival of the Infinite, who sought to frustrate his designs. Nor is it wonderful that Matter should have been considered evil and Spirit good, while the sensual nature of man is ever prone to sin and folly, and the spirit is ever urging the mind to resist the tempter.

Human nature on earth is ever poised between the powers of light and darkness, the forces of good and evil: but there can be neither positive evil nor positive darkness anywhere in the universe, as if one be absolute, infinite, and eternal, the other is not, for there can be only one Sovereign Deity: either God or Devil you may believe in, but you cannot believe consistently in both. Evil or the devil is for you the sum of whatsoever in the material world your spirit has not yet subdued or conquered. Everything in itself is good, but nothing is good relatively, when out of place, and the purpose of life is evidently not fulfilled until every material desire is completely under the dominion of the spirit.

When man is perfected on earth, then will every material propensity be legitimately employed; then will all that animal force, which now runs riot and makes such havoc in society, be reduced to order and employed in obedience to the wise dictates of the soul; then will men understand why they are on earth, and why they have been compelled to endure such manifold temptations, and in the final estate of man on earth will celestial life be expressed in material form; and if the earth is ever destroyed, unless it be by some catastrophe not in the ordinary course of planetary events, it will be with the earth as with the human body: the life will be transported elsewhere, and back again into the primal chaos or original cosmos will all the substances which now compose the earth return, until in unborn ages Spirit will again operate upon the slumbering ether, and bring into newness of being that matter or force, which ever it be, that only becomes invisible when mortal forms dissolve, and destruction seems to ensue to the eyes of man, not yet acquainted with the cause of those transformation scenes in nature, which seem to imply creation and destruction in the most absolute and arbitrary sense.

The Number of the Beast, 666, signifies the partial and apparent triumph of the power of darkness over man's physical, intellectual and spiritual nature. Before a great light breaks upon the world, how gross is the darkness which it dissipates! In the old-world centres of civilization and power, how black was the darkness which the dawn of a new era drove away! Religion was falsified and even became a sin; priests vied with each other in the perpetration of the most horrid crimes for selfish ends; faith was lost in doubt; the knowledge of immortality was lost in the darkness of an overwhelming scepticism, well nigh despair, while morals were at their lowest ebb, so that in cultured Athens, Rome and Ephesus, there were indeed beasts in the form of men who preyed upon their fellows, and perpetrated unblushing immorality, while they gloried in their superiority above the citizens of all other cities on the globe. Though a few were cultured, the many were in intellectual night, and those who possessed knowledge carefully veiled it from others, that they alone might fill honourable places, and trade upon the weakness of the ignorant, whom they purposely kept in darkness; while the neglect of sanitary laws reduced the bodily health of the people to disease, and called down upon the ungodly race what has been called the vengeance of heaven, in the shape of direst pestilence and plague.

Is there not a Beast at large in the civilized world of to-day? Are not vices being nurtured in the very cradle of modern culture? Are not the rich becoming richer and the poor poorer, under the dominion of those monopolies and governments which bend every appliance of modern genius to their own profligate and selfish ends? No country of the modern world is unstained with the Mark of the Beast. Either that mark is in the forehead or in the hand. It is in the foreheads of those whose expanded brows betoken intellectual might, unsoftened by the sweetness of love, and unmoved by the tender emotions of mercy for their less fortunate neighbours and compatriots. It is in the hands of those who do business usuriously, seeking to keep just inside the pale of civil law, while the moral law they utterly disregard.

Usury is one of the crying sins of the times. Money-lending is an abomination, as at present practised, for what is the present mode of transacting business on the market place or on 'Change, but a practical and well-considered scheme to fill the full yet the fuller, and send the hungry empty away? If one has money and needs no more to supply him with every comfort and luxury the heart can wish, he, because he has enough, can buy and sell to suit himself, can get things cheap and sell them to the poor as dearly as he pleases.

The ten kingdoms of the modern civilized world are even now, commercially, under the dominion of the Beast. It is predicted that no one shall be allowed to buy or sell unless he have received the mark of the beast. What is this but monopoly, as at present permitted by so-called Christian governments? The time has come when science has been perverted to overturn all hopes of immortality, and to devise means whereby men may oppress one another yet more cruelly, than when in barbaric times warfare was less deadly than the polished arts of war known to civilized people. The Beast has gained dominion in the Church, wherever an established religion has meant the establishment of a favoured few, in places of emolument and power, regardless of their qualification for office, which ought to be most sacred and important. What with the hunting clergyman, who preached other people's sermons and took scarcely any interest at all in the welfare of his parishioners, by no means an uncommon feature in the clerical life of England a short time ago, and the modern minister who looks upon the ministry only as a profession, and is never anything more than a hireling wanting to divide himself between God and Mammon, and never ready to give to God even half of his energies, thinking even a tithe of the heart is too much for the Eternal,—it is not surprising that the Beast in the Church has delivered many people over to unblushing infidelity.

The present condition of many professed ministers of the Gospel, is terrible to contemplate. They dare not express their honest doubts, they dare not give up the ministry and turn to other employment, because of the influence of friends and the salary so indispensable to the maintenance of their assumed position in society; while in America the state of things is not much better than in England, for though there is no established church, no revenues derived from Government, and all denominations are on an equality before the law, still, where pews are sold at auction to the highest bidder, and men must please the fancy of the wealthy in order to retain their lucrative, and, from worldly standpoints, most enviable positions, church patronage and the sale of livings have been equalled if not exceeded in immorality, in the iniquitous system which makes worldly prestige and power the measure by which religious enterprises are to be valued.

The Beast, or the Scarlet Woman of the Apocalypse, is not the Church of Rome nor the old Roman Empire. Babylon, the Beast, the Scarlet Woman, the Man of Sin, are all typical of conditions of society which belong to all nations and societies equally, in so far as tares and wheat grow together in every field, and righteousness and iniquity stand side by side throughout the whole civilized world. Turn out the Beast from your every Church and Chapel, turn it out of your every Spiritualistic or Secularistic Society, turn it out of Synagogue, Mosque, and Pagoda alike, and when the Beast goes, mercenariness and selfishness will have to be dethroned, yea, utterly exterminated. The Beast in politics is neither Conservative, Liberal, nor Radical especially. The Beast always votes for whatever candidate is the fancy of the hour, and sees that personal and exclusive privileges are not interfered with. Whatever Mr. Bradlaugh may be as a man or an Atheist, and however we may disagree with him in his religious views, we cannot honestly refrain from pointing to him as an impersonation of a new spiritual power, which intends to level class distinction, abolish perpetual pensions, and destroy those infamous rings which hold the working classes in worse than negro slavery, in many parts of England. Bradlaugh may not be the coming man, but he is one of his heralds. Bradlaugh's work is to pull down rather than to build up, but for the uprooting of tares he is peculiarly well qualified, while Disraeli was employed by the spirit of justice, in enfranchizing the Jews and liberalizing Conservatism; and Gladstone seems moved upon to stir up strife and lead to a hatred of warfare unparalleled in the annals of history. Bright is the prophetic soul, who sees beyond war to its abolition, and esteems it a crime to take human life unnecessarily. But the present war in Egypt, disastrous and humiliating though it be, is undoubtedly one of those conflicts which has long been predicted as incident to the passage of the earth from the dispensation now closing, to that emblematized by the King's Chamber, beyond the tortuous and difficult passage-way which divides that regal chamber from the Grand Gallery, in the Great Egyptian Pyramid.

It is an old statement and a very true one, that history repeats itself. Thus, whatever may have had 1800 years ago a literal application to the downfall of Rome and the dispersion of the Tribes of Israel, may equally refer to the present crisis through which the earth is passing. The very cholera, though a scourge, is a remedial agent. The beast of disease, the beast of tyranny, of monopoly, and of every form of evil, adopts a suicidal policy. Evil is self-destructive, and thus every Apocalypse must end with the coming of a New Jerusalem, new heavens (a new spiritual order) and a new earth (a new social state); and when the power of the Beast in modern lands to-day shall have attained to such proportions that its imposing magnitude leads all who are allied with it to expect a speedy and final victory, then will the number 666 appear significantly on its every banner, which, translated into English, means what Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin, meant in the days of Daniel, at Belshazzar's feast: Thou art weighed in the balances and found wanting. Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians.

And who shall the successor of the Beast be? Who shall reign, when the Beast is wounded unto death, but the Child with iron rod, who shall control all nations, whose mother is the Woman clothed with the Sun (emblem of perfect spiritual light and sanctified affection), the moon (symbol of all earthly desires) under her feet, and a crown of twelve stars (the completed glories of the mind, its twelve resplendent powers in full and harmonious exercise) upon her head.

This Child, who shall rule the earth, is an impersonation of Intellectual Power, conceived in pure affection, the might of knowledge universally disseminated, not under the dominion of avarice and lust, but as the child of pure benevolence, and truly enlightened affection for all mankind.)

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE OPENING OF THE SEALS.

TRUTH, from earth's foundations, verily, was sealed!
When the ancient Prophets only have revealed
Fragments of its glory, raylets of its light,
But its native splendour, in the heavens so bright,
Is beyond man's vision, far too bright for eyes
Trained to earthward gazing. All around you lies
A rich field of knowledge, wonders everywhere,
Could ye but discern them. But, what eye can dare
Gaze upon the glory of the noon-day sun?
It is all too brilliant: so, when day is done,
Lifting tired eyes heavenward, gazing at the stars,
Mortals ever welcome, through the misty bars,
Which conceal the heavens from the eye of man,
That mild, borrowed radiance, which, since earth began
To be fit for mortals, through the Queen of night,
Greets your straining vision, with a partial light.

One by one, the bright stars are to man made known;
One by one, the barriers are by man o'erthrown;
Nearer, ever nearer, to the perfect day,
Man is slowly treading, life's mysterious way.

John, alone on Patmos, saw an angel come
From that world of glory, which will be man's home,
When he's learned life's lessons, conquered all the clay,
Risen at length victorious into heavenly day.
One of th' ancient Prophets, was this herald true,
One who once was mortal, toiling as do you;
One who won the battle, and who wears the crown,
As ye all may wear it, when ye've earned renown.
John supposed this teacher was the Lord divine,
And would fain have worshipped at that spirit's shrine;
But the angel truly told him, man must bow
Unto God, Him only must ye serve; though now
Idols are uplifted, as in olden time,
And men worship mortals, thinking men divine;
Not rememb'ring homage must to God be given,
Who reveals himself to man, through the soul which comes from heaven.

When the Seals were opened by the angel strong,
And God's mighty purpose was revealed in song,
Sung by choiring angels, with their harps of gold,
John fell down awe-stricken, for to him was told
How fierce tribulation should to earth draw nigh,
Ere the Beast was vanquished, and the Lamb gained victory.

What means many a figure? asks the student now:
What is the Lamb's life-blood, sprinkled on each brow
Of God's chosen people? They whose names are found
In life's glorious record, where the true, renowned
In eternal story, though on earth in pain
They have cruelly suffered, crowns of glory gain.

Blood is truth celestial, and the Lamb within
Is that loving-kindness, which doth surely win
Purity's best record; they their God will see,
Whose lives are all kindness; true love is purity.

When the Seals are opened, and the Vials disclose
What men think is vengeance, God's wrath bringing woes
On a guilty people, is but wisdom, love,
Blended well together, in the heavens above.

Bright angels guide the elements, angels control the sea,
And Nature's forces are not blind, but, with vitality,
Born of the Spirit's presence, forever are they rife,
Not with the force which killeth, but brings from death to life.

The chaff may be consumed, alloy be purged from gold,
In crucibles of sorrow, the noblest hearts grow bold;
The epidemics raging, which now ye so much fear,
The pestilence, disaster, the wars ye think so near,
Are all but God's wise measures, of leading man at length,
To where, in golden ages, gentleness joined with strength,

Shall rule with rod of mercy, and yet as iron strong,
Shall be the sway of Spirit, when all the poets' song,
And all the prophets' vision, shall realized be,
In that new age immortal, when Truth gains victory!

BENEDICTION.

May the Spirit of Truth open your minds, so that every Seal of error, and darkness, and ignorance shall be shattered, and ye shall know the Truth, and the Truth shall make you free! AMEN.

XVII.

THE SPIRIT SPHERES ATTACHING TO THE EARTH,

AND THE MISSION OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM TO HUMANITY, AS AFFECTING ALL INSTITUTIONS AND CLASSES OF SOCIETY.

WHOEVER first suggested our speaking upon the theme announced for the present lecture, must have had a rather exalted opinion of the amount of information which can be condensed in a single lecture of an hour's duration. It is needless to say that time most peremptorily forbids our doing much more than skim the surface of a subject, or rather group of subjects, which affords matter for almost infinite consideration.

We are glad the questioner has limited his desires for knowledge, concerning the Spirit-world, to the planet earth and its environment, as the immediate influx of spiritual influence now felt by mankind, certainly does proceed from those states of spiritual being which are intimately connected with the earth itself, and indeed nearly all the communications of average interest received from the Spirit-world, reach you through such intermediary minds as, by reason of their proximity to your own mental states, can easily play upon your sensibilities, and conduct their thoughts through the channels of your brains. The law of sympathy, or, as it is sometimes called, affinity, is the one great and sovereign law which renders spiritual communion possible; and neither on earth nor in the Spirit-world, can there be any communion or intercourse between spirits, unless they are in some sense kindred minds.

You all know that sympathy, or spiritual affection or union, is not dependent upon external associations, and is not governed by laws relating to earthly consanguinity. The very fact of marriage with one who is not a member of your own family circle, and the possibility of loving your wife or husband more than your brother or sister, even more than your parents, is a proof that there are ties of spirit deeper than any unions of sense. In alluding to a true and happy marriage, we are saying nothing whatever concerning those unions which are for time only, and exclusively of the senses. We mention the true marriage union as the highest, closest, holiest and most enduring of all, and all other unions. true friendships and intimate acquaintanceships, which are consummated in oneness of mind and thought, these are all practical exemplifications of the sublime fact of spiritual relationship and lasting accord.

Upon the earth the spirit is perpetually hampered and fettered by purely physical limitations, and thus scarcely any one appears as he really is. Death is the great revelator and emancipator in all instances, it strips you completely of your assumed robes, which you are often compelled to wear in the transaction of earthly business; for is there not a disguising of the true character, which cannot properly be called deception or hypocrisy? Are there not veils which you are obliged to throw over your inmost feelings, lest you should wound and annoy those around you; and does it not happen frequently that perforce you must labour at uncongenial tasks, for you are dependent upon the labour of your own hands for the bread which sustains your bodily life?

Now, the great difference between material and spiritual life is this: on earth, while in the body, you have to be actuated constantly by purely material considerations. You must have shelter, food, clothing, and money with which to purchase these things. The labour market may be in such a condition that your talents are not recognised, and the work you can best perform is not in demand. Thus very often a poet works in a coal mine, a philosopher drives a coach, a born politician is a waiter at a hotel, while persons of scarcely any qualification for the offices they hold, are drawing large salaries, and filling responsible positions, because of personal or party influence unduly exerted in their favour. One of the most painful and distressing anomalies of earthly existence, is this crowding to the front of persons who have nothing but cheek and cunning to recommend them, while the noblest, the purest, and the most talented are in numberless instances kept in the background.

Were it not for disclosures from the spiritual side of life, life would not be worth living to, at least, half the population of the globe; and so strongly is this conclusion emphasized by the experiences of the race, that we find millions upon millions of Orientals protesting that they want no immortality. Consciousness after death is not what they desire, they prefer to contemplate annihilation of individuality, for in the cessation of conscious being can they alone find rest from the troubles and woes of existence.

This condition of mind is morbid and unhealthy, and is not in accordance with Oriental philosophy, at its highest and best. It is the pessimistic hope of those who have had no experiences calculated to make them optimists. Life to them has been one long, uninterrupted round of prosaic drudgery, toiling for material necessaries only, finding no enjoyment except in sleep or indolent repose. Possessed of constitutions not naturally robust, subject to the enervating influences of a trying and unhealthy climate, they very naturally desire no prolongation of life, as they understand it. The view they take of life is, perhaps, the only one they can take, as they have no spiritual insight into the life beyond, and their religion is so mystical in its allusions to the hereafter, that though it may satisfy a metaphysician, it offers no consolation to the ordinary toiler in life's vineyard, who from day to day is doomed to the same humdrum round of labour, in which he evinces no interest, and which, in the very nature of things, is not calculated to inspire him with a sense of the value or beauty of life.

Some persons are, phrenologically speaking, incapable of looking upon the bright side of nature or taking a hopeful view of affairs in general, unless radical changes, most difficult to accomplish, are effected in their mental development; while, so long as the spirit dwells within the body, the condition of the physical frame has a great deal to do with the feelings of the individual, on the mission and purpose of his existence. A sound mind needs a sound body, just as a good performer needs a good instrument on which to display his powers; and in order to so revolutionize society, that the world shall be as close a pattern of the higher spiritual spheres as possible, it is high time that workers in the spiritual vineyard endeavoured to afford better conditions for a brighter display of spiritual light, by improving, as far as they are able, the tools and instruments which the spirits have to use in their communications with mankind.

Up to a certain point Spiritualists and Secularists can and ought to work together. Secularism maintains the necessity of physical culture and mental improvement. Many Secularists are striving earnestly to better the moral as well as the intellectual and physical condition of those around them, and it is anything but spiritual or liberal-minded to refuse the right hand of fellowship to any honest toiler in the vineyard of reform. If there is to be a great spiritual awakening in all parts of the world, and that shortly, the abolition of slums and rookeries, the cleansing of filthy alleys, the sweeping away of dens of infection and infamy, the taking of sanitary precautions against disease, the study of physiology, and the equalization of mankind, that there be no longer unjust and fictitious distinctions claimed between race and race, class and class, or man and man,—all these are works in which persons of widely different religious views may unite; and setting aside all difference of opinion on other points, it should be the steadfast aim of all noble souls, intent upon benefiting mankind, to set about the work of the reconstruction of society, in accordance with the best methods they can devise, and aided by the highest inspirations they can receive.

Spiritualism is a revelation. The facts it reveals are great and most important discoveries; but Spiritualism does not create or invent the Spirit-world, or bring its denizens to earth from far-off realms in space, where they would for ever remain disconnected with the earth, were it not for the evocatory power of Spiritualists.

Mediumship does not call up spirits from the vasty deep, or summon them from distant heavens; though it is true there is a kind of mediumship which does possess a summoning and attractive power, but that mediumship is not confined to those who go into trances, hear mysterious sounds, or see spiritual visions. You may have no mediumistic power whatever, in the ordinary acceptance of the term, and yet be a greater medium, in every practical sense, than those whose clairvoyance, or any other acknowledged spiritual gift, is a household word wherever they are known; and it is to this intuitive, impressional mediumship that we wish to turn your especial attention, when dwelling for a few moments upon the invocatory power and nature of desire, and the ability of thought and will to hold communion with the unseen spheres.

Thought-reading is now the latest craze in fashionable circles. Almost every popular newspaper devotes a considerable amount of its space to discussing the pros and cons of the theory. Mental telegraphy is admitted by many of the greatest scientists of the age, who, while they will not compromise themselves with Agnostics by admitting Spiritualism, are quite prepared to avow their belief in some subtle means of thought transfer, which Cumberland, Bishop, and other travelling thought-readers and conjurors bring into prominence before the public. Of course, such men as Bishop, Cumberland, and others are acting very foolishly when they attempt to destroy the nation's faith in spiritual communion, by their clumsy feats of legerdemain. Even when some of their tricks are cleverly performed, they do not touch the borders of genuine spiritual manifestations, as there can be no proof or test of spirit-power unless there be a display of intelligence.

When these conjurors and pretended exposers of Spiritualism, undertake to counterfeit genuine spiritual phenomena, they render themselves ridiculous in the eyes of all who know anything of genuine Spiritualism. Mr. Cumberland pretends to show how spirits materialize. by putting glycerine and muslin on his face, and dressed in a white robe, with a lamp in his hand, imitates "John King." But let him, and all who endeavour to unmask their own ignorance on spiritual matters as he does, remember that numberless spiritual manifestations have stood the closest scrutiny of eminently-scientific and highly-qualified observers, who could not possibly have been taken in by so silly and clumsy a subterfuge; and when it is remembered that persons are satisfied only with something which appeals to their inner nature, when they have solid grounds for their confidence in spiritual communion, the evidence against the conjuror as an exposer of Spiritualism, becomes stronger and stronger with every fresh investigation, until at length he is forced to retire from the field, ignominiously defeated, or become himself a convert to Spiritualism, and explain to his audiences how his own performances have compelled him to relinquish his former untenable premises.

Thought-reading is the entering wedge, the partly-opened door, which leads to a knowledge of spiritual science. Mr. Labouchere, the Editor of Truth, and many other popular journalists, may as yet refuse to call themselves Spiritualists, but recent articles in their journals prove them to be considerably baffled in their endeavours to explain thought-reading. If it is not a trick, then what is it? If it is an evidence of the power of minds to communicate with each other without the aid of the ordinary senses, then it goes a long way to prove the communion of minds with one another independent of the physical organism.

Thought-readers are of two classes. One class may be said to be composed of adepts, the other of mediums. Adepts are really mediums, but they are persons of unusual strength of will, and though under the influence of spirits they are not controlled to the same extent that persons of weaker will are; thus there is a difference between them, as between mesmeric operator and subject, or psychologist and sensitive. No operator is so positive that he can be operated upon by no one, still he may be beyond the reach of the mental power of his audience and their surroundings; thus though under spirit control himself, he is controlled by beings of greater will power than those in attendance upon persons whom he can subject to his will.

Theosophists and Spiritualists make a great mistake in opposing each other. It is a palpable error to suppose that either Theosophy or Spiritualism may be true, but both cannot be. A great deal of nonsense is no doubt often given off by would-be mystics and occultists, concerning Himalayan Brothers, elementary spirits, dopple-gangers, shells, astral bodies, &c., &c., but there is a very considerable residuum of sound, common sense and practical knowledge in the Theosophist, and other periodicals and writings which treat of the occult sciences. These sciences are not the phantastic and ephemeral absurdities most persons ignorant of the real nature of Astrology and Alchemy imagine them to be, but even Theurgy, Palmistry, and all the curious so-called superstitions of mediæval times, were founded upon a knowledge of the hidden forces of nature, and gave expression to facts relative to spirit influence which comparatively few people, even to-day, are competent to deal with, much less to explain away.

Spiritual Science must be added to material science. The supra-material sciences are as natural as the material: Theology is as natural a science as Geology; and until the public at large is willing to consider the claims of Spiritual Science, as it deals with Astronomy or Botany, Spiritualism will never be fairly treated, and the invisible world will never be intelligently understood, as a natural, objective, substantial, real world, in which force there does duty for matter here; and force is only a higher and more potential condition of being than matter. Both force and matter are emanations from Spirit, and both force and matter are at length resolvable into Spirit; as Spirit, self-conscious, self-intelligent, and eternal, is the only primal, absolute, and ultimate existence or substance in the universe.

It is customary to speak of things as real or substantial, to the extent that they are discernible by the external faculties of man. In the Spirit-world what is visible on earth is invisible, and what is invisible on earth is there visible. Thus the lens is completely reversed, and to a spiritual body matter offers no resistance, just as to a material body neither force nor spirit offer resistance.

In a recent number of Morning Light, a Swedenborgian weekly, the editor, while admitting that we have said many things both useful and suggestive concerning correspondence and the work and illumination of Swedenborg, charges us with having unduly confounded the natural with the supernatural. We spoke of the Science of Correspondences as a natural science. The editor of Morning Light says it is not a natural science, but a divine or spiritual science; and to him all things spiritual are supernatural.

It is clear to any thinker, that a great deal of such quibbling is only verbal. We think all Swedenborgians are willing to allow that there is but one God, and that everything has been created and is being upheld by his divine power. Then, if there be but one God, and the earth and the physical body are parts of his work, why make a distinction without a difference, and assign part of the universe to one class of laws and another part to totally different laws? The law of God is the law of nature: there is but one law as there is but one God, and the sooner the oneness of the universe is admitted, and the oneness of the laws that govern it, the better both for science and religion, which will always be opposing instead of friendly and allied powers, so long as things spiritual and physical are spoken of as though one were divine and the other something quite the reverse.

No more favourite mode of dealing with death is extant in orthodox circles, than that which represents the "last great change" as one which completely and forever dissevers the spirit from all connection with the earth. And yet Jesus, whose resurrection according to Christianity brought immortal life to light, promised to be ever with his people, so that whenever two or three were gathered in his name, they might enjoy communion with his spirit. "Prepare to meet thy God!" is reiterated so constantly in connection with man's passage from earth to spirit-life, that people are all unconsciously accustoming themselves to the belief, that the future life is so entirely different from the present, that many deem it positively sacrilegious to speak of the Spirit-world except as some golden Rome or Heliopolis transferred to the unseen spheres, where Halleluiahs are to be shouted eternally by the redeemed in glory, ransomed through the blood of the lamb, from all pain and penalty forever.

This investment of the Spirit-world with such a degree of unnaturalness as to make it appear unreal and even uninviting to the majority of aspirants for immortality, is one of the most prolific sources of doubt and denial in the present day. The step from orthodoxy to infidelity is a very simple one. To give up the idea of a heaven, never more than vaguely realized, to lose faith in records and traditions, and to treat the testimony of the Ancients as a myth, is easy to many minds. Thus, from extreme orthodoxy to hopeless infidelity many pass without having realized that they have really given up much that was worth preserving. The heaven of orthodoxy is so deeply shadowed by its hell, that unbelief is a positive comfort to many deeply sympathetic natures. A God who cannot save all, cannot be Almighty; a God who will not if he can, is unworthy of our love; and the thought of spending an eternity with such a being, even though under his smile, is awful rather than satisfying to the deepest longings of the human heart.

Spiritualism has done what neither Theism, Unitarianism, nor Free-Religion could accomplish: it has effectually naturalized the Spirit-world, and has made countless human hearts rejoice in living realization of an immortality which is theirs here and now. Its phenomena appeal to the senses, while its philosophy satisfies the astutest intellect; and we need a combination of phenomena and philosophy, to reach different sections of mankind, and solve the great problem of man's nature and destiny, adequately to the comprehension of all.

We regret a tendency among Spiritualists to exalt one phase of spirit-communion above another. This tendency is no doubt natural, and is easily accounted for and explained, but it is not healthy, neither is it calculated to promote harmony or unity among common believers in the cardinal verities of the modern spiritual revelation. One person will visit London, and write to a newspaper underrating physical phenomena, and, perhaps, over-estimating the importance of philosophical addresses; another person speaks coldly, almost slightingly of what appeals to the intellect, and exaggerates the importance of sensuous demonstrations. All such comparisons are mischievous, invidious and unfair. They are, moreover, hasty and short-sighted, and do not evidence a well-balanced mind.

The needs of human nature are so varied, that all the different modes of spiritual operation now extant, are essential to the reaching of all classes of intellect, and the satisfaction of every type of enquirer. Rivalry, jealousy, these cursed tempters, are utterly out of place in a movement where all true workers help each other. Every honest medium helps every other honest medium, and those poor sensitives who are too weak to resist temptation, and so pliant that they echo the thoughts of all around them for the time being, instead of being held up to ridicule, execration and reproach, should be so kindly and tenderly dealt with, that they be induced not to err, or fall in future, as they have done in the past.

We have often heard and read the remark, that when a medium has once been caught in deception, he should be abandoned to the mercy of the cold world. Spiritualists should refuse him countenance, turn their backs upon him, show him the cold shoulder, write against him in the papers, and straightway commence vilifying him among all their acquaintances, and warning the public against him. How suicidal must such a policy be to the best interests of truth and rectitude! If you throw an easily-tempted sensitive upon the mercies of an unsympathetic world, and do nothing whatever to shelter, reform and uplift him, you are not destroying an evil, ridding society of a nuisance, or removing a stumbling-block or rock of offence out of your neighbour's way.

Unkindness never reforms, unmerciful punishment never uproots iniquity. The one you trample under foot remains the sinner he was: he is not strengthened or reformed by your cruelty and cowardice, but becomes an easier and easier prey to the wiles of those unprincipled hoaxers, who are ever ready to make use of tools for the accomplishment of their own unworthy ends. And is it to be wondered at, that when earth is constantly pouring into the Spirit-world troops of liars, thieves, adulterers and blacklegs, that these unreformed characters should still hang round their favourite haunts on earth; and as dwellers on the threshold, or earth-bound spirits, continue to infest those neighbourhoods and places of assembly where they perpetrated their crimes and follies while in the material form? Every infirmity, which is but an infirmity of the flesh, is overcome when the body dies, the weaknesses incident to an imperfect body, and the manifold temptations to which you are unwillingly exposed, are shaken off at the entrance to the immortal world. But desire is fulfilled, and wherever there is aspiration toward any state of existence, links of affinity bind you to that state, and you are, as Swedenborg has said, a denizen of hell, only, if you choose hell instead of heaven.

The visions of Swedenborg, and those of Dante, need not be called in question, because the Lutheran and Roman Catholic dogma of eternal punishment is set aside. Swedenborg was brought up a Lutheran, and Dante a Catholic. Their ideas of the everlasting perpetuity of evil were modified by spiritual revelation, but not overcome, as there are states of existence beyond the grave which temporarily answer to every mortal conception of the hereafter. The sensualist finds his harem in the invisible world, and as the Koran states, the places filled on earth by women are there filled by paradisiacal angels. Mohammed was a seer, but he saw those heavens which only answer to human avarice and lust. He dreamed a voluptuous dream which chorded well with the voluptuousness of the Orientals among whom he dwelt, and to whom his religion most forcibly appealed. The heaven of Mohammed, however, becomes a hell eventually, for those who go out from earth with no higher aspirations than those which, if fulfilled, will gratify the senses, find that at length all libertinism cloys upon the spirit, and satiety not satisfaction is the ultimate of sordid dreams of animal enjoyment.

The sensualist may hover round the earth, and still engage in midnight revelry and song. Troops of spirits, who on earth led dissipated lives, may be witnessed by clairvoyants in every haunt of gaiety and dissipation. There are their worlds, their spheres are within the atmosphere, on earth. If they have not intentionally wronged their fellows, then they are numbered among the frivolous and vain, and while their lives are most woefully empty and unsatisfactory to the higher nature, they are not in torment, neither do they experience that loneliness and depression which those must undergo whose selfishness has been such that they have never bestowed a thought except upon themselves and their own advancement.

Would that the misers and egotists of the earth could see what we have seen of the darker side of spirit life! Such revelations would surely lead them to repent of their follies ere it is too late, and sow, while here on earth, something better than wretched tares for their reaping at the harvest hour of mortal dissolution. But those who live entirely on the plane of the senses, are so steeled against warnings of every kind, that should visions ever so startling be shown to them, they would dismiss them from their minds as quickly as possible, refusing to accept the teaching they conveyed. We have known many who have had countless spiritual experiences, and have attributed them all to ill health or over-excitement, and have taken ardent spirits and sleeping-draughts, and all kinds of physic, to prevent a recurrence of those unwelcome disturbers of their peace. Among those who determinately refuse to give heed to messengers from the unseen world, no matter how vividly they make their presence known, are to be found the nineteenth-century brethren of a modern Dives, to whom it would be useless to offer a revelation, as they would not repent though one rose from the dead.

There seems reluctance to send a messenger, on the part of Abraham, in the story of Dives and Lazarus, but a close analysis of the allegory will let us see that all that its author intended to convey, was the existence of states of mind to which spiritual truths could only make a useless appeal, and because of the fruitlessness of the task it was not undertaken. The mistake is only in supposing that the task would be eternally fruitless, whereas the condition of a spirit or mortal at any given time when he may be interviewed, is no just criterion of the state he will be in, say a century, or even a year from now.

The Hindoos, who said there were fourteen spiritual spheres, of which the earth was one, correctly located the earth-bound sphere within the atmosphere of the earth itself; though, if they inferred that there were seven degrees of spiritual existence below the earth, they were astray in their calculations, so far as human spirits are concerned; for there is no retrogression in nature, and no spirit really deteriorates when passed from the body, though apparent deterioration may result from the inability of a spirit to withstand new temptations, by which he has been hitherto untried.

Spiritualism may apparently prove the deterioration of some minds in the hereafter, but in all cases where deterioration seems evident, one of two explanations will serve to show how baseless may be the assumption. There are many on earth who live outwardly respectable but hypocritical lives. They pass current in society as virtuous, but their virtue consists in nothing more than conformity to certain external requirements of a superficial state of society; polished manners, a smooth tongue, a little easy, affected charity, some degree of attention paid to religious observances, and the world caresses you with its sweetest smile. You may be a caluminator or detractor if you will, you may blacken reputations without mercy, you may amass wealth in ways that will bear no honest investigation, but so long as you keep within the bounds of the letter of human law, you are free from censure, and are indeed accounted a most exemplary member of society.

Now, in spirit life, everything goes by motive, intention, desire, thought, will; these are the realities which go to make up character; and by interior standards are you judged in the hereafter. Some one may have been badly born, scarcely educated at all, allowed to grow up like a weed without any culture. When a child he may have been surrounded with a whole host of adverse circumstances, and the power of evil pitted against his feeble strength, may have been so overpoweringly great, that it was impossible for him to withstand the power of so great temptations. He may have striven a million times to resist; he may have succeeded over and over again, but the world only knows when he has fallen. It chronicles his failures, it makes capital out of his mistakes, it holds up its hands in holy horror when the name of so great a culprit is mentioned, and yet if those who pride themselves on the easy, negative, automatic fashionable "virtue" they think so praiseworthy, had been subjected to a hundreth part of the temptation their "fallen" brother has endured, they would have sunk unmentionably lower than he, in the pit of degradation.

Your young men and women, who have never been away from home, and have known nothing of the world's seductions, are in no position to offer contrasts to those who have fallen into sin, when exposed to temptations the mere names of which the carefully-nurtured and vigilantly-protected may have never heard. It is for no man to judge his brother, and if there be one vice more hateful in the eyes of angels than another, it is that spiritual pride which so often goes before the deepest and most disgraceful falls.

In the Spirit-world every circumstance of earthly life is taken into account. When the old Egyptians graphically painted the scene in the Judgment Hall, before Osiris, they were not at all astray in their conception of the true spiritual judgment, when they weighed the actions of the departed from earth, in scales adjusted with accurate nicety. But after all, the acts are not so important as the motives, and yet from pure motives, pure acts must ever spring, so the outward and inner life must to some extent correspond, but as all have not equal light, and many sin in ignorance, the command is lawful—Judge not that ye be not judged.

We have never yet come across any one who was healthy, who enjoyed idleness, and we are certain no healthy child likes to be doing nothing. No picture of heaven can be more disheartening than that which paints it as a world of monotonous ease and listless indolence. The incessant music of heaven must be a figure of the incessant motion and activity of those who are in heaven. True music is harmony, and the perfect harmony of life within and without must ever constitute the bliss of the celestial world.

Many persons seem to think that Spirit Spheres are arbitrarily located around the earth, within a certain radius of its circumference, and though there are earth-bound spirits who are thus confined, spirit spheres, properly speaking, are strictly individual. Spirits travel in their spheres. If their spheres are bright and comfortable, then, wherever they may be, they are in happiness and peace. If their inward condition is dark and doleful, then can they rest nowhere; and should they dwell where others are in bliss, the contrast to their own condition would but add misery to their already pitiable state.

Take, for a moment, the condition of a man on earth, who owns a thousand acres of ground, possesses a stately mansion, superbly furnished and decorated; has horses and carriages at his command, and, in a word, everything the eye or ear or any of the outward senses can desire. He may be afflicted with some distressing malady, which baffles the skill of the ablest physician. He may have some secret sorrow pressing upon him, he may possess a churlish and unhappy nature, which forbids him to enjoy. Of what use are all his fair fields to him? Can his money make him happy? He who wears a diadem, surrounded by every sign of prosperity, may be far more wretched than the beggar on the roadside, who sleeps on a door-step or in a hay-loft, and dreams of angels, to wake refreshed for another day's wearisome search for bread, with an eye open to the beauties of all around him.

No place or rank can make happiness. Could mortals enter heaven through the intercession of Christ, or Mary and the Saints; could Peter be induced to open the gate of heaven, and let the suppliants in, they would not know heaven from hell when they got there, unless they developed heavenly-mindedness while passing through the gate.

Christ went to paradise, to hell, to prison all at once. He went among the dark and wretched sufferers in the earth-bound sphere, who needed his preaching and his sympathy. Could he be unhappy on a holy mission of self-denying love? Could he be thinking of the darkness and the gloom, while divine light was welling up within him, and shedding its celestial refulgence an all around? The glow-worm is never in the dark; it carries its own light with it. If your heaven be within, if your happiness depends upon what you yourself are, and not upon where you are, then you travel in heaven, and heaven travels in you, and your constant enjoyment springs from the fact of your shedding brightness wherever you go; so that if your mission be among prisoners and the distressed, you are not partakers of their misery, while you are lighteners of their woe. You are perfectly happy, just so soon as you are perfectly absorbed in works of benefaction. When the spirit really awakes to a true sense of its condition, it sees around it the results of its own labours, and for every tear that it has caused, it must needs shed one; while for every joy it has conferred, it must needs feel within itself an answering echo of pure content.

We have now just a minute in which to express our views upon the true relations of Spiritualism to all existing Institutions. That there will be a coming Religion, and a coming Church, we do not doubt; but Spiritualism, as a sectarian movement, we are convinced will never prosper, if the advocates of sectarian Spiritualism desire simply to add another to the numberless divisions into which the religious world is already unhappily divided.

Oahspe, the new bible, is one out of many endeavours on the part of the Spirit-world to effect a reconciliation between sectarian spirits, as well as among sectarian mortals. That singular compilation is the work of intelligences who now have gravitated to a common centre, from the many restrictive Oriental heavens, which for a while hold spirits estranged from each other in rival parties, as sects and parties create and perpetuate estrangments upon earth. There are Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, Mohammedan, Parsee, Confucian, Zoroastrian and numberless other heavens near the earth, and the influx from these upon receptive minds tends to build up those earthly institutions, which are counterparts of those invisible spheres. With the advancement and liberalization of the spirits forming those societies in the Spirit-world, they blend into common fellowship and become organized into communities of kindred souls, where, seeing truth from a higher standpoint than that of any of these sectaries, they comingle till they become universal in their sympathies and regard.

When Spiritualism shall have swept away the dark accumulations of error and bigotry from the Churches and Colleges of earth, then will come a day when all schools will blend in amicable union. Some may prefer the plainness of the Quaker Meeting-house, others the sumptuousness of St. Peter's at Rome: but, eventually, every Temple of Religion, of Art, of Philosophy, of Science, will become a SPIRITUAL TEMPLE, and Spiritualism will be the agent employed by the Angel-world, in bringing about that much-needed and longed-for reconciliation, which will at length make all Religions, Languages, and Peoples one.

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

THE Prophet bards of every clime
Have sung of a Golden Age;
The Prophets have seen in a glorious dream
The time, when the earth, grown sage
Through her lengthened discipline of strife,
Of pain, and weary woe,
Shall lay her weapons of war aside,
And peacefully forward go.

In the Golden Age shall the lion and lamb
Lie down together and feed,
While the little child shall guide them both,
And together shall sweetly lead
The strongest and gentlest, the brave and weak,
Till the nations shall bliss have found,
When old Tubal Cain makes them swords no more,
But plough-shares o'er all earth's bound.

From the far-off distance of buried years—
From the cities of those plains,
Where now but the rubbish and arid sand
Mark the seat of those old remains—
There cometh a voice, for the stones cry out,
And make mention of days gone by,
When both hemispheres were alive at once,
With a light that has seemed to die.

From old Egypt, now wasted with wars and years;
From that mystic Hindostan,
Where the sacred city, Benares, remains
As a mark of primæval man;
From Persia, Chaldæa, where buried lie
The Soothsayer's mystic arts,
And the Magian's power to foretell events
By the pulsing of heavenly darts;
From the buried cities of Greece and Rome;
From Columbia's distant clime,
Where buried beneath the wigwams rude,
Of the Indian tribes, do chime
The mystic bells of a far-off year,
When Atlantic waters were rolling clear,
Engirdling an island of vast extent,
Whose treasures to East and West were sent;—
Come mingled voices, with clearest tone,
Saying—The Past did most truly own
All your modern knowledge, and might, and power:
'Twill deliver it up at no distant hour.

Are not the nations, with one accord,
Preparing for fatal war?
Is not your own land, even now, engaged
In conflict with realms afar?
Are ye not on the verge of a struggle fierce,
In which evil will surely die?
For the hand of Justice uplifted is,
To redeem from tyranny.

Ye may sigh o'er those Nihilistic waves,
Which sweep o'er Europa's sod;
Ye may tremble awhile 'neath the pestilence,
Which seems as the frown of God;
But the thunders and lightnings clear the air,
Volcanoes they ease the earth,
And diseases and sorrows, and deadly wars,
But make way for sweet Freedom's birth.

The earth is in travail, and cries in her pain,
Her deliverance draweth nigh;
And where now are the corpses of fallen slain,
Will peaceful homes, by-and-by,
Rise, marking the spots where the warriors fell;
Men shall point to them soon, and say:
Lo! there, through the horror and din of war,
God made for new light a way.

In the Golden Age, which is coming apace,
Shall men to make war forget;
They shall all be brothers, and form one race,
For all peoples will become yet
One concrete Nation, wherein shall live
The Roman, the Greek, the Jew,
The Anglo-Saxon, and every race,
In the Race which shall earth renew.

Lay aside your weapons, O men of strife!
And learn to control by will,—
By the power of mind, and by love's mild grace;
Then higher up life's steep hill
Will ye mount together, as brother's all,
And the Golden Age ye will see,
When forgetting your quarrels ye work as one,
For Light, Truth, and Liberty!

BENEDICTION.

May the Light of Truth supernal, made manifest in Love, so infill your minds with an appreciation of true Equity, that working for each other's weal, with pure hearts and intelligent minds, ye may hasten the Golden Age, and do God's Will on earth, even as it is done in Heaven. AMEN.

XVIII.

THE LOST CONTINENT, ATLANTIS; AND THE CIVILIZATION OF THE PRE-HISTORIC WORLD.

HERODOTUS, who is popularly styled the Father of History, may indeed be the first great historian who has attempted a systematic and consecutive history of the post-diluvian world; but the history of antediluvian times is still shrouded in such deep gloom, and invested with such transcendent mystery, that very few, until quite recently, have attempted to tell the story of the world before the great and well nigh universal deluge, reference to which will be found in the histories and mythologies of all peoples.

You are probably all of you aware that the Bible is by no means the most ancient record in existence, and it does not profess to deal in any way particularly with all the differing races or varying sections of mankind. The first chapter of Genesis is a prologue, and the prophet Malachi, an epilogue to the Old Testament, while the Law and the Prophets, and the history of Israel's wars and kings, all deal exclusively with one nation (the Jewish), only telling of other peoples as their history collides with that of Israel. Every nation has its own record, and while records may dispute the palm for antiquity with one another, it is almost universally conceded by students, that the Hebrew bible is not anything like so ancient as the Vedas and other records of the far Orient.

The first chapter of Genesis may or may not be interpreted in accordance with modern facts in astronomy or geology, according as the interpreter construes the narrative. It is in its letter so vague, and deals so entirely in generalities, that nothing can be said to be plainly taught therein, beyond the general declarations that all things were created by God, and that the lower forms of life preceded the higher in their order of appearance on the earth, while man came last of all.)

Surely no one can have read this introduction to the Pentateuch, without remarking upon the saying, God made man in his own image, male and female. The simultaneity of the creation of man and woman must strike every reader very forcibly who pays any heed to what he reads, while the following chapter localizes an Asiatic paradise, as the birthplace of one peculiar and distinct race of human beings, the original progenitors of the House of Israel. With Adam the Adamic race had birth, and this race, distinct from all others, was forbidden to mingle with any other peoples. When Cain slew Abel, and wandered far from home, he found the earth peopled in those parts to which he journeyed, and these, other inhabitants than the descendants of Adam, were undoubtedly the offspring of those men and women, numbers and place of abode not supplied by Genesis, whom God created on the sixth day, mentioned in chapter one.

We merely call attention to these biblical statements, because there are not a few among our hearers who are much interested in the case of Genesis v. Geology, and a lecture we recently delivered in this hall, on "Evolution and Involution," called forth many comments, not only from those who heard it, but from persons across the water, who had only seen mention made of it in a few paragraphs in a London newspaper. The editor of the "Banner of Light" (Boston, U.S.A.) commented in his columns upon those paragraphs, and went so far as to say, probably they were erroneously reported, because the statement was made that Genesis and Geology were not irreconcilable. He pointed to the fact of their being two distinct accounts of creation in the first two chapters of Genesis, and styled one the Elohistic and the other the Jehovistic account. Bishop Colenso thought these accounts gave evidence of a double authorship, and that opinion is shared by many students to-day.

It is not our intention to enter into any controversy in this discourse on the authenticity of the first book of Moses, neither shall we at any time tell people to read Genesis if they wish to become acquainted with the facts of geology, or any of the natural sciences, for the Bible is no scientific textbook. Still, there is a moderate and common-sense view of the Bible, which, unfortunately, is not taken by the majority of Bible interpreters of the present day, and that is, that though the Bible came into existence in a purely natural manner, as did all other books, it was impossible in the days when it was written for any book to be produced except by the learned, or those who were singularly inspired. The Bible is the result of ancient scholarship and inspiration. It is emphatically a Jewish history written from a Jewish standpoint, chronicling those events which influenced the national life of Israel, and leaving the history of other nations alone, when that history did not run in parallel lines with that of Israel. We think we may fairly assert that the wise men of old, the most learned among the rabbins, for instance, never denied the existence of these scientific facts, known to the Egyptians and embodied in their architecture, but they did not attempt to reveal them to the people under their charge, who, for the most part, were quite unready to receive them. For a curious and interesting dissertation on the Adamic race and its origin, we refer you to the pages of a work, entitled "Genesis," by Allan Kardec, recently translated into English, and obtainable of any dealer in spiritualistic literature in England or abroad. But we must not dwell any longer upon this introduction to our subject, or we shall never be able, if we allow these considerations to divert us, to say anything we wish to say on this occasion, upon that wonderful centre of ancient learning, which fell a prey to the destructive force of the waters about 12,000 years from the present time.

A few years since, Ignatius Donnelly, of Minnesota, U.S.A., published a work of thrilling interest, entitled "Atlantis," in which he undertakes to prove that that mysterious island, mentioned by Plato as having lain in the midst of the Atlantic waters, beyond the pillars of Hercules, at the entrance to the Mediterranean Sea, was not a mere fancy of mythology, but a veritable solid reality, as much so as is the Australia of to-day.

What we have already remarked concerning a plurality of races, and all human beings not having sprung from one common forefather, Adam having been the forefather of one race only, is amply borne out by the facts of physiology, which go very far to prove this position beyond question, among students of the natural history of man. The Negro, for instance, with his thick features and woolly hair, has not only these peculiarities to distinguish him. He has a cuticle under the skin, which makes him a negro. Children born from other races, who have not intermingled with negroes, will never have this cuticle, no matter how long they may sojourn in the tropics, or how dark their offspring may become through exposure to the climate. The Malay and the Caucasian are evidently distinct races of mankind, and though they may blend in the future, and all races may at length become one, a common race, to inhabit all the earth, is rather a prediction for the future than a history of the past. But a study of races is fast leading the student to conclude, that there was a closer bond between the eastern and western hemispheres, in very ancient days, than has ever been imagined until very recently, except by a few such remarkable men as Solon, Plato and others, whose knowledge of ancient history and of the occult sciences led them to conclusions based upon actual facts with reference to the past of man on earth, which were impossible to the multitude, whose knowledge and means of obtaining information were necessarily far more limited.

Before the destruction of the Alexandrian library, under the Turks, there existed in Egypt, at Alexandria, a collection of MSS., probably the finest the world has ever known, and in these books, accessible only to the learned, intelligible only to the very few, was contained the history of the earth from the earliest times; and the history of Egypt not only 6,000 or 7,000 years ago, which is now being unearthed by modern students, but the history of Egypt contemporaneous with that of Atlantis, pre-historic America, pre-historic Australia, and pre-historic South Africa and parts of Asia.

We must now refer you to a fact in the history of the earth, viz., a change in its polar axis, gradually brought about through long periods of time, and reaching a culmination at the close of every grand cycle of over 25,000 years. These vast periods of time, during which mighty changes and upheavals are outwrought, were computed by the Ancients with the same accuracy as that which attends your determining the length of the solar year, which you know to be between 365 and 366 days. The grand year of the Pleiades occupies nearly 26,000 years of earthly time, during which the sun accomplishes its journey through the twelve zodiacal signs. During this vast period, the sun's rays strike the earth vertically at different degrees of latitude, and while there is always an equator, and while there are always poles, and these poles are each 90 degrees from the equator, and while the equatorial line is always the centre of the earth, and that spot upon the earth's surface where day and night are of equal length all the year round, the equator changes place, though so slowly as be imperceptible to all save special observers.

During half the cycle, the south pole advances and the north pole retreats; during the other half, the south pole retreats and the north advances. At the present time the north pole is slowly, but surely, creeping toward you, while the south pole is retreating. The equator is travelling southward, and, therefore, in northern latitudes the climate is steadily becoming more and more inhospitable. Certain sciolists deny this. They had better save their own reputations for scientific knowledge, by accounting for facts now transpiring which prove the truthfulness of this theory, before they deny the only natural and rational explanation of phenomena transpiring under the eyes of every one, by refusing to admit the truthfulness of any theory not sufficiently small to be included in their theories, which stand them in the stead of fact.

No one looking at a map of the world, can fail to be struck with the immense preponderance of land north of the equator, and of water south of it; and no one can see the name "Greenland" applied to a desolate patch of country in the northern part of North America, without wishing to know the origin of the misnomer. Greenland was once a fertile country; while all the northern part of Asia, now called Siberia, was once a fruitful and hospitable region. The Persian records, the Zendavesta, inform you that once there was an earthly paradise, where now there are but fields of ice, and that the tradition of a forfeited earthly paradise in Asia, owes its historical value to this circumstance. Certain it is that in the northern hemisphere the climate of many lands once salubrious, is now becoming more and more inhospitable, while the heat is becoming more tempered in southern latitudes, and this because of the changing aspect of the earth to the sun.

As it would require a discourse of considerable length to fully explain this problem in science, and we have no time to deal with it now, we must refer you to the studies of specialists in this direction for further information; contenting ourselves for the present, with giving you a vague outline of the world as it was prior to the culmination of that last grand cycle of time, which must have culminated fully 11,000 years ago, the present era now closing being the fifth dispensation in the present grand cycle of time, the new era now commencing being the sixth epoch, and that during which one-half the world will attain to a civilization matchless in its importance and results.

The new era now commencing marks that period which will give to the northern half of the globe, a power and supremacy unknown save to the most privileged among the the Ancients, who were however not the recipients of the boons of culture and inspiration on so large a scale as the Anglo-Saxon and allied nations will be during the coming age, which will witness in the eastern and western hemispheres conjointly, an attainment far transcending aught that you anticipate, unless you give credence to Homeric tales, and stories of Arabian enchanters, who have filled the brain of age and youth alike with glowing pictures of a distant past, in which gods and goddesses mingled freely among mortals, and the occult sciences were something more than idle dreams or fanciful imaginings.

The modern world still believes in a golden age departed, while it also looks for one to come. Milton was not a Calvinist when he wrote his matchless verse, and sang of earthly paradises long since destroyed. Tinctured with the Puritanism which filled the very air he breathed, he doubtless was, but he echoed Hesiod and Homer, he pictured the constant strivings of deities and devils, and personified the forces of regeneration and decay in his inspired songs. To him "Paradise Lost" was a sad truth, but "Paradise Regained" was the yet truer dream. Like all great poets he was a thorough optimist, and was sorrowful and astonished at the pessimism of the world, which criticised his verse but could not understand his prophecies. The critics admired his story of a lost Eden, and greatly preferred it to his glowing prophecy of a future golden age. He lived more in the past than in the future when he wrote the "Paradise Lost," he lived in the future when he wrote his "Paradise Regained"; and he loved it best, as all true poets must, for he is not a poet but a misanthrope who sees only death. The true poet sees beyond death to the New Jerusalem, and across the Jordan, which, whelming all earthly treasures, traces, capped with living light, the glorious summits of the mountains of the Celestial City.

There is something inexpressibly sad in gazing upon a ruin, if you must feel that all the life and beauty which once woke it into birth, have gone out into the rayless night of an eternal oblivion. A buried city rising up from among piles of rubbish, the accumulations of centuries, is sad beyond comparison, if you cannot realize the truth of immortality. But when the very air around you is peopled with the impalpable forms of the departed,—when you can wander through the desolated halls and ruined temples, where once art, science, and religion adorned themselves in their most beautiful array, and summoned multitudes from far and near to witness their imperial triumphs; and wandering, musing upon these dead and gone glories, talk with the emancipated spirits of those who once woke those solitudes into every conceivable form of loveliness and grace,—you are no more despondent, for you realize in the ethereal hosts around you the victor spirits who, having done with earth embodiments, are now rejoicing in diviner worlds, reaping the fruits of their former labours, and gazing fondly on the ruined school-houses where once they gained their education; but knowing all the while that they shall each one be rebuilt, and employed by future generations for the advancement of spirits then requiring education like unto that which these ascended ones have long since gained. They can admire the dignity and utility of that law which, while it ordains the destruction of naught, makes provision that all things serve some useful end, so that when they are no longer needed in some particular form they have once assumed, they are thrust back again into that void or chaos, whence they sprang in former ages to serve the needs of Spirit. there to lie seemingly dormant and useless, but all the while undergoing marvellous transformations, until they shall be called back again to witness new scenes of labour on the part of mind, and be in some yet undreamed-of age the very tools wherewith immortal spirits, awhile embodied in material clay, shall develop those latent energies, which only conflict with lower phases of existence can ever adequately express.

The old Jewish Sabbatic law, as it bore on the question of land, is a striking illustration in minor degree of that great law of nature which renders certain lands peculiarly fruitful for a period, and then compels them to lie waste for needed purposes of recuperation through rest. The sabbath was intended not to flatter God, but to benefit his children. The land was to be cultivated six years, and then lie fallow during the seventh, that it might again be fertilized and bear all that was needed to support life, and keep the nation in a continued condition of active prosperity.

Over-production is always the precursor of want and distress. Poor wages, little work, and general dissatisfaction always follow in the train of an overstepment of the law of prudence in matters pertaining to labour. Work yourselves incessantly without rest, year in and year out, and you disease your bodies till they are unfit for further exertion, or you paralyze your brains and end your days in a madhouse, or as a drivelling idiot, harmless, indeed, but utterly incapable of enjoying any of the blessings which would have accrued to you had you taken a less feverish and more common-sense view of life, and the number of hours that should rightfully be devoted either to physical or mental labour.

Not only does man need periodic rest, but all sentient creatures need it, and they suffer accutely when deprived of it; and not only do all living creatures need it, but the earth itself needs it, for whenever a land has been peculiarly prolific, and has been the scene of unparalleled achievements, the time surely comes when it becomes unfit any longer to bear the strain of such high pressure, and enters upon a state of senility, and ultimately apparent death. Having passed its meridian, it begins slowly yet surely to decline the hill which it once ascended.

But what is one's loss is another's gain. When the sun shines brightest in England, through the long summer days, the winter reigns at the Antipodes. When it is high noon in one hemisphere it is midnight in another. There is never a withdrawal of light and heat from one portion of the globe, without a conference of the same upon other sections of the world. It is always summer somewhere, and it is a beautiful thought, entertained by many optimistic philosophers, and in no sense disputed by the facts revealed by strictest physical research, that every summer is in some sense more beautiful than its predecessor, that with every succeeding year the world becomes more widely adapted to human life in its highest forms, and that the ultimation of the world will most probably be something far different from the catastrophe predicted by theology. For instead of a final conflagration, while yet it is inhabited, the hope of the true philosopher, founded upon reason, observation, intuition, and spiritual revelation alike, is that the time will come when every form of life will be perfected on earth, every noxious and ravenous form of life outgrown, and where now the deadly upas tree sheds its fatal shade, the healthful fruit will hang ripe and rich on the bending boughs of the trees, which will then be in its place. Where now nations are embroiled in perpetual conflict peace will reign supreme, and where now life is felt a burden almost too heavy to be borne, want, wretchedness and despair will have taken their final flight, and the earth will have reached its meridian splendour, and bask in the noonday-glory of its long-promised golden day.

The world is still young. It is only a growing child; it is still in its adolescent period; and has not yet settled itself to enjoy a maturity of peace and prosperity, of which there is ever promise and indication in the nature of the earth itself, despite the wailings of the pessimism which to-day is possible because optimism is true, rather than from any other reason. The general cry of to-day is: the world is getting hopelessly bad; things are going from bad to worse; immoralities and crimes are on the increase; and we shall soon be hurried into perdition. The storm-clouds of God's righteous anger are gathering thick about our heads, and unless we instantly repent we shall all miserably perish. Such lamentation as this shows nothing more than a quickened conscience, a yearning for something higher than is yet attained; while the voice of conscience ever spurs us on to nobler achievements, by making us discontented with our present, leading us out of evil by impressing upon our minds the hideousness and danger of all evil courses.

England is not now what Atlantis was in the palmiest days of her most brilliant and glorious career. She is not in specific directions even what Greece and Rome, Egypt and India, were in their brightest and now far-distant days. But we seriously doubt if there ever was a time in the history of the earth, no matter how old the computations of geologists may cause it to appear, when there was a prospect of so rich a harvest of literature, science, religion and the arts as there is in the modern Europe and the modern America, with which you are all more or less familiar.

No student of ancient history can fail to see in the significant signs of these present times, a nearing recapitulation of events which transpired in the dim distance of pre-historic ages. North of the Equator is now the scene of the greatest mental and physical achievements of the race, while there are colonies of English-speaking people at Cape Colony, in Australia and Australasia. Still, the population increases slowly there in proportion to the increase here, and progress towards the cultivation of the entire ground, nominally possessed by the descendants of European races, is still very slow.

Formerly Australia was joined on to the southern parts of Africa, and the island of Atlantis was the bridge between the two hemispheres, so that by means of Atlantis a constant system of communication was kept up between Asia, Africa and the southern part of Europe on the one hand, and the American continent on the other. The northern part of the modern world was, in the days of Atlantis, buried beneath the waves as the waters now cover Atlantis and many a land and fruitful island connected with her, prior to the time of her being swallowed by the ocean when Atlantis sank. Then northern climes arose from their long sleep beneath the waves, for whenever one part of the world becomes a prey to the waters, other lands are released, for the sea never encroaches in one place without receding in another, or recedes somewhere without encroaching somewhere else. But the days will come when the earth has reached the zenith of its perfection, when literally as well as figuratively there will be no more sea, i.e., there will no longer be vast continents of water acompanied by vast deserts of sand elsewhere. Land and water will be equally divided. Land will all be watered and therefore all fruitful, while the waters will be broken up into many rivers and inland seas, lakes, brooks, and running streams; and the ocean, which is only a barrier between land and land, will disappear.

It is computed that now the waters cover about two-thirds of the surface of the globe. Tradition says once they covered all the land, and dry land appeared so soon as the waters subsided. They will continue to subside more and more, until they occupy only one-half the territory of the earth; and in that day, when land and water are equally divided on the globe, both hemispheres will be civilized and prosperous together, and from pole to pole the earth will not contain one barren or unfruitful spot, neither will it sustain a single poisonous plant, noxious reptile, savage beast, nor brutal man.

Whenever a section of the earth attains to its temporary zenith, that section of the world is the scene of a perfect state of society, so far as perfection can obtain on earth, and it is undoubtedly from this perfection of old-world centres of prosperity, that the poets and philosophers, the fanciful historians and compilers of mythologies, have gathered the data from which they have been enabled to erect that stupendous pile of mythologic lore, which is to-day the wonder and the pride of the student of classics, the poets and the great thinkers of every ancient clime and period.

As you have no doubt all heard of Plato's faith in Atlantis, though comparatively few have probably read his story of that mysterious land, it may not be uninteresting to this audience if we briefly summarize the information we have gathered from various sources, Platonic and other, concerning the physical, social, political and religious condition of that far-famed and highly-blest land.

Atlantis, as we have already told you, lay between the shores of the eastern and western world, from which it was divided by narrow and easily-navigable waters; the art of navigation being very ancient, and the Atlantians being well versed not only in this but indeed in all the arts and sciences, ignorantly supposed to be modern, when they are so ancient no scholar can determine when they originated; and so great a man as the Astronomer Royal of Scotland (Professor Piazzi Smyth) supposes them to have originated in very early times, by direct revelation from heaven to Melchisedek, or whoever may have been the mystic architect and designer of the Great Egyptian Pyramid. But if the Great Pyramid was not erected till 2,170 B.C., it is comparatively speaking a new building, and all that can with any show of reason be assumed concerning the date of its erection is, that it could not possibly have been later than that time. The astronomical reasons for assigning that date as the time of its completion, can also be brought forward in support of its erection at a much earlier time, and many who do not take the real antediluvian world into consideration at all, refer that celebrated pile, justly called a miracle in stone, to 3,500 or 3,700 B.C.

But recent excavations in Central America have led to disclosures concerning the monumental remains there, which led to the publication in a London paper some years ago, the fact of there having been discovered at Pueblo, in New Mexico, a pyramid of much larger dimensions than that of Gizeh, in Egypt; the Mexican pyramid covering over forty acres of ground, while the Egyptian structure covers not more than about thirteen-and-a-half. The Mexican pyramid, scholars decided, must have been in existence fully 7,000 years, and how much longer no one seems prepared to decide. The realm of discovery in the Western world is even richer for future generations than in the East, as it marks a period in history completely ignored by Herodotus, and all historians since his time, and opens up a marvellous field of exploration to all who care to enquire systematically into the origin and blending of races, religions and languages.

Some very strong reasons for belief in the reality of Atlantis, we will now adduce, before giving you, as the climax of our recital, a brief sketch of the internal condition of Atlantis, and the state of her people spiritually as well as materially.

We have already noted the mythologic argument; and allow us here a word concerning myths. They are invariably fanciful histories, as well as speculations, concerning the contending forces of good and ill. Astronomical myths are very frequently alluded to at present, and many if not all which can be legitimately included in the astronomical category, had for their object the preservation and transmission of astronomical facts, which were kept secrets among the learned. Socrates drew down upon him the ire of the Athenian monopolists, when he endeavoured to unveil the Mythos, as Galileo, Bruno, Copernicus, Columbus and many others drew down upon them the anathemas of Christian bigots, because they dispelled the Ptolemaic illusion which kept the masses in ignorance, though there never was a time when secret Orders, possessing knowledge on these subjects, did not exist.

Historical myths are of another class, but not of a widely differing one, for in order to veil yet more carefully the esoteric meaning from the "vulgar," and preserve it for the initiated only, astronomical facts were fancifully represented, and thrown round the heroes and heroines of antiquity, when they were made to pose as gods and goddesses in the temples and traditions of the classic lands. All the nations whose territory borders upon the Hellenic seas, are peculiarly rich in mythologic lore, and a modern examination of this goes very far to prove the fact of there being personal histories behind these wild, fantastic tales. The gods and goddesses of old were not always spirits who communed with seers and sybils in the mystic shades and mountain fastnesses of the classic world. They were quite as often the great and mighty potentates and priests, the prophets, seers, and judges of a by-gone age, around whose memories countless legends had gathered, as Strauss, and Kant, and other German authors of the life of Christ, say that through the centuries since his time, there has been a gradual development of mythology around Jesus as a centre.

The celebrated myth, Prometheus, is now considered by many savans to be a fanciful biography of Pythagoras, the celebrated sage of Samos, and so mystic has become the record of the life of this great man, that it is quite as difficult to clearly prove his personal existence to-day, as it is to prove that of Jesus of Nazareth, simply by reference to contemporaneous history. If the mythical personages around whose names such weird, awful, and beautiful legends have gathered, were really the personal dwellers on some long-lost island, the princes in some great monarchies, long since defunct, the presidents of some glorious republics, after which the modern world can only, as yet, feebly copy,—how easy it is to read between the lines the history of the career of religious ideas, and see how intimately associated with Theism, and how subordinate to it, has been that universal tendency to a belief in divine incarnations, and all the countless divinities of Polytheistic systems; while above all, in solitary grandeur, as one superb mountain towering over every neighbouring hillock, and making them appear but ant-hills by its side, has been the sublime and unquenchable faith in one only Supreme Being, whom all nations have adored even though afar off, and have in some manner worshipped, even though, ofttimes, very ignorantly.

Paul at Ephesus, seeing an altar to the Unknown God, and saying to the citizens—"Whom ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you," reminded these so-called Pagans that their own poets had always taught them of one Deity, infinitely beyond all lesser lords, whose offspring we all are.

Judaism, rigidly monotheistic though it is and ever has been, has never denied that there are many gods, but only one, Jehovah, to whom all gods must bow. These gods of the nations David did not ignore. He mentions them constantly in his Psalms, but he styles that idolatry, which gives to the creature the homage due to the Eternal only, and denounces the setting up of idols in the temple dedicated to the only Infinite and Holy One, whose name is Jahveh, he who ever was, now is, and ever will be.

A review of Ignatius Donnelly's work, which we mentioned with approval at the outset of our lecture, furnishes the reading public with the following facts concerning Atlantis, which are extremely interesting and especially pertinent to our subject. A reviewer, mentioning the fact of Egyptian navigators being sent out in the reign of Pharaoh Necho, to explore the seas surrounding Africa, tells of their having, after sailing for some considerable distance, found the sun north of them. They were doubted in their day, as all discoverers ever were and always will be by the ignorant, for ignorance engenders doubt, and nothing but knowledge can supplant it, unless it be unreasoning belief, blind gullibility, than which doubt is far preferable. To-day these men, who found the sun north of them when journeying southward from Egypt, can only be looked upon as discoverers who antedated Vasco de Gama, the reputed finder of the Cape of Good Hope. This man was a discoverer relatively. The knowledge of the Cape of Good Hope was lost to the people with whom he mingled, but we very much doubt whether either he or Vespucci or Columbus were not in possession of some secret history of the olden world, not accessible to the multitude, when they set forth on their long and perilous voyages in ill-manned ships, to find those mystic lands which lay beyond the devil-occupied seas, where superstition, ignorance and priestcraft had invented devils to act as scare-crows to drive off inquiring minds from the fields of corn and fruit, which the ecclesiastics preferred to claim as theirs and theirs only.

The fact of the existence of Atlantis as a centre of civilization, and a great seat of commerce between the eastern and western hemispheres, can alone satisfactorily account for the wonderful resemblance between the extant traces of antique civilizations on both sides of the world. It will, moreover, unveil the mystery of the Mound Builders, those mysterious people to whom science has paid of late no inconsiderable amount of attention. It will explain the origin of the hieroglyphics in the far-famed cave of Elephanta, and will throw an immense amount of light upon the origin of the North American Indians, as well as upon that of the Aborigines of Australia.

The American Indians are by no means the debased people many think them to be. Those who know them truly can never call them rude barbarians. Of late they have decreased in numbers and increased in barbarity, and why? but because the American Government, that of the United States, has treated them meanly and dishonourably. They are called by every harsh name, because they fight with spears and tomahawks against the cruel aggressors, who, calling themselves civilized and Christian, think it no shame to destroy mercilessly the Indian's wigwam, and thrust him forth without food or shelter to die by the wayside, while the march of civilization tramples him under its iron heel, and calls such brutality and injustice the way of God and the march of progress. The Canadian Government, which has been far kinder and juster to the Indians than has been that of the United States, has avowedly had much less trouble with them. The true, manly, independent Yankee, a lover of freedom and a respecter of the rights of others, would never oppress the Indian. The kinsmen of Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Longfellow, Emerson, Parker, and a host of worthies time forbids us to mention now, are always protesting against atrocities committed by stronger peoples to subject weaker races to themselves, and then exterminate them. The enlightened, liberal, loyal American Press has never sanctioned outrages or any depredation committed upon the Indian reservations; but the mere money-grubber, the mere fortune-hunter has ever boasted of his superiority to the race on whose every right he has mercilessly trampled, and pointed to those whom he has cruelly oppressed, as being unfit to live. Such barbarians are they, because they would not lie down and be crushed out of existence without making a desperate effort to defend themselves and those they held most dear.

Many Indian tribes are characterized by their intelligence, refinement, and spirituality; notably on the Pacific slope are there tribes of Indians who boast an illustrious pedigree, and are the direct descendants of once powerful races, whose territory embraced Mexico, Peru, and indeed all the region now called the Central American territory. These races were in constant communion with the Eastern world, by means of Atlantis, and the very striking resmblance, existing palpably to all archæologists, between the remains of Oriental and Occidental civilizations of days gone by, prove beyond a peradventure, that there must have been a bond of union between the "old and new" worlds, such as Atlantis could only have afforded.

The traditions of the Indians are in many instances evidences that they were once in communion with Egypt and other Oriental climes. You may say in their faith in a Great Spirit, and in the conscious existence of the human spirit after the death of the body, and in rewards and punishments in the hereafter, they simply share with all tribes who can boast any civilization at all. But the religious resemblance by no means ends with these fundamental generalities. Many striking resemblances can be traced, in instances so eminently particular, that identity of origin is very powerfully established. For instance, Volney says, "In the Greeks of Homer I find the customs, discourses and manners of the Iroquois, Delawares and Miamis" (Indian tribes). He futher says, the tragedies of Sophocles and Euripides paint almost literally the sentiments of the red men (Indians) respecting "necessity, fatality, the miseries of the human life, and the rigours of blind destiny."

The Oneidas (another tribe of Indians) claim descent from a stone, and did not the Greeks trace their origin to the stones of Deucalion? The snake locks of Medusa are represented in the snake locks of an ancient hero of the Iroquois. The translation of men to heaven bodily is a feature of the American Indian as well as of the Hindoo races. Longfellow tells us of "Hiawatha" rising to heaven and vanishing from sight, amidst sweet music. These admissions prove no doubt more than orthodox Jews or Christians wish to see proved, for while they point to a far-off origin of Indian and Atlantian, Greek and Hindoo Myths, they treat the Old and New Testaments as only two out of an immense collection of records, all couched in similar language, and all expressive of the oneness of symbolism common to the pre-historic as well as to the classic world.

If time permitted we would gladly pursue our theme much further, as we hope to do in subsequent discourses at no distant date, but though we have said but little on this fascinating branch of our subject, we venture to believe we have said enough to let you see that the story of Atlantis is founded on something far more solid than the phantasmagoria which many persons consider stands as a wild and fanciful legend, in the stead of any actual historic fact.

Another class of evidences are purely physical, and to these we can now allude but for a moment; but we should not be doing anything like justice to our theme did we fail to appeal to the ocean itself, to confirm the assertions of Solon, Plato, and the ancient seers at large, who wrote so eloquently and instructively of this strange, buried land.

Deep-sea soundings, recently made by ships of various nations, conspicuous among which were the British ship, "Challenger," and the U.S. vessel, "Dolphin," have gone very far to sustain our conclusions, by discovering in the bed of the ocean, immense deposits of lava and volcanic debris, extending over thousands of miles of what evidently once was land. The peaks of the Azores are exactly in the spot where Plato located Atlantis, and Solon, who had travelled in Egypt, and possessed himself of much information while there, soon grew into perfect accord with the learned there, that popular histories only touched upon very recent events compared with those which were amply chronicled in Egypt in Solon's day.

Solon's opinion was, that 9,000 years had elapsed then since the sinking of Atlantis, and Solon lived about 2,300 years ago. Add these numbers, and you have something over 11,000 years. We have already referred you to the duration of the Grand Cycle, as a period extending between 25,000 and 26,000 years, and have told you that this period is divided into 12 almost equal portions, called eras, ages, or dispensations, each one occupying about 2,150 years or thereabouts. We are now just at the dawn of the sixth division of the present Cycle, thus, multiplying 2,150 by 5, we get 10,750 years, and allowing for the fact that numbers in these cases have only an approximate accuracy, we find the testimony of the Grecian sages agreeing perfectly with the events of to-day, spiritually interpreted.

How account for the story of a universal deluge, without giving heed to the story of Atlantis? Noah's flood, of 4,000 years ago, was a very local matter, while every record called sacred on the earth, from those of Hermes and the Vedas to those of Scandinavia, all contain a narrative of a universal flood. This tradition of the deluge is scientifically explained by that revelation which the bed of the sea is now making to the world, concerning the once populous and fruitful lands it now covers, while, east and west, stones are literally crying out in the revelations given to all who study them, by those marvellous monumental remains which contain histories, far more glowing and imperishably written, of nations long since gone out of earthly existence, than are to be found in any parchment scrolls or printed records.

In closing we can only add, that Lord Lytton's "Coming Race" can well be read as a reminiscence of the past, as well as a dream and prophecy of the future. Time was when the powerful Atlantian race was as glorious as Lytton's Vril-ya. Aerial navigation, the use of wings as mechanical appendages, were among their triumphs relating to the comforts and amenities of civilized life, while during the later and most glorious portion of their career, they had outgrown warfare, and had triumphed over those innumerable stumbling-blocks in the way of a nation's progress, which are yet perplexing the statesmen of every land beneath the sun.

Their religion was a simple confidence in the All-Good. Their rites and ceremonies were those from which the magnificent conceptions and glowing imagery of the early Egyptians sprang. They were the originators of those Schools of the Prophets, of which the Ancients speak so much, while having attained to an almost inconceivable spiritual altitude, their spiritual faculties became so alive to the realities of the realm of spirit, that their land was verily the abode of gods. Theirs was the original of Arcadia, Olympia, Hesperides, and every charming resort of divinities pictured to you in Homeric verse and Platonic philosophy. Spirit communion, purified from sensuous dross and devoted to pure and benevolent ends, revealed to them the certainties of life immortal; while education was the substitute for punishment, moral suasion and intellectual might were in the stead of carnal weapons of defence, while their land, charmingly situated, perfectly watered, thoroughly under cultivation, yielding every fruit of the earth man could desire, in rich profusion; surrounded by easily-navigable seas, across which access to other lands was constant, conspired to render the Atlantians the favoured race, because the most moral, intellectual and healthful. Disease, poverty, crime and painful death became almost outgrown, ere the hour drew nigh for the land to become the ocean's prey, and having flowered out into such luxuriant beauty, to decline suddenly when its inhabitants were prepared to quit the earth, and their spirits to be transported to another planet. A few were saved from the fate which overtook their land. These mingled with the life of both hemispheres, some escaping to America, and some to Asia.

When, in 2,000 years from now, the belt of civilization again puts a girdle round the earth, in more than name or pretence, a greater race, a larger one, covering wider territory than the Atlantian, will have been formed, and the new millennium will be more glorious than the Golden Age, so deeply mourned, so soon to be recovered and transcended, when the paradise to be gained will far transcend in glory the paradise the old world lost.

IMPROMPTU POEM.

THE REAL AND THE IDEAL.

SURELY, things IDEAL after all are REAL!
And things the most Ideal are the most Real,
Because the Soul discovers the Ideal,
And purblind sense deals with the earthly Real.
The poor, worn body, in th' embrace of death,—
This, mortals ever seem to think the Real;
The happy Spirit, fled from scenes of dust,
To them is only fancy, the Ideal!

The Artists' paint a glorious sunrise,
A lovely sunset, showing all the scene

Where earth and heaven meet in sweet accord,
As though estrangement they had never seen.
The colours, true to life, which greet his eye,
He puts upon the canvas in his joy;
The splendours all around him he reveals,
And men declare 'tis but Ideal employ!

The Poet sings a song of fadeless love,
Undying fealty to a loving heart,
And tells a tale of constancy divine,
In which no shade of doubt can bear a part.
The real writer says, It is not true;
The prosy reader says, Can never be;
Such deep devotion for such loyal love,
Say men, the world of mortals ne'er can see.

The Christ of Gospels, and of painter's art,
Who loses life and all the world counts dear,
To save his brethren from sin's bitter fruit,
Is but a myth, for surely none so clear,
So free from stain, so noble and so great,
Could ever dwell upon the shores of time:
Men cannot see, that what is great and best,
Is true forever, e'en on earthly clime.

The sputtering candle, and the broken mug,
The ragged urchin gamb'ling in the street;
The haggard face, the listless indolence,
Which every passer-by must often meet;
The fish, the worm, the fire, the grate, the cat,—
These things are true to nature, they are Real;
But, verily, the commonplace of life
Is not so real as the great Ideal.

These little things, these phantoms of an hour,
Will be unreal to-morrow, fled and gone;
While all the visions of the starry night,
The Artist saw, will still be shimmering on;
The Poet's love, the true historic Christ,
Will be alive when baubles are no more,
And every high ambition of the soul,
Will live and triumph when all earth is o'er.

That is the Real which shall longest live,
The Ideal world is the most real far;
The sun, the moon, the mountains towering high,
The peaceful valleys, and each blazing star,
High hopes, pure loves, deep sentiments most wise,
Ardent ambitions, and the Eternal State,
Man's immortality,—these will remain;
Though all things petty soon shall meet their fate,
And be dissolved in elemental strife,
All that is great, and beautiful, and true,
Must live and reign, co-eval with its God,
And every day appear in some sweet fashion new,

Though seemingly it dies; for what is death
But that transition which doth free the soul,
And let the ideal nature freely fly,
Until the Spirit doth all earth control.

O Poet! Artist! Singer! Sculptor! Scribe!
Though men deride ye for your loftiest dreams;
Go, tell us more of Heaven's immortal dower;
Go, tell the world how great to you it seems,
This mystic universe of stars and suns.
And while the world, in market-place and stall,
Will barter chattels for a mite of bread,
Go ye, and summon angels, men, to all
Proclaim the fact, while ages roll along,
The Ideal world doth the most Real be,
Because it is the region of that Cause,
But whose effects on earth the noblest see.
Go, tell the world that every ardent hope,
And every dream of truth and love remains
A living entity, when earth is dead;
And that we live for aye in God's domains!

BENEDICTION.

May the sublimities, the Eternal Realities, of the Immortal World, so vividly impress the likeness of themselves upon your every mind, that, in the pursuit of what is truly Real, ye realize the blessedness of the Ideal, even the fulness of Life and Joy Immortal! AMEN.

FINIS.

University of Connecticut
Libraries

Colville, W. J.
Mediumship

BF
1261
.C658
1918

MEDIUMSHIP

ITS NATURE, LAWS, DANGERS AND ADVANTAGES

W. J. COLVILLE

FOREWORD BY
CORA L. V. RICHMOND

THE AUSTIN PUBLISHING COMPANY,
LOS ANGELES, CAL., U. S. A.
MARCH 1918

DALE NEWS, Inc.
Lily Dale, N. Y. (U. S. A.)

MEDIUMSHIP

Its Nature, Laws, Dangers and Advantages

By

W. J. COLVILLE

THE AUSTIN PUBLISHING CO.,
Los Angeles, Cal., U. S. A.
March, 1918

Copyright 1918, by
B. F. AUSTIN

FOREWORD

By Cora L. V. Richmond.

"The effloresence of his being blooms
On earth, blooms splendidly; like May he came
Scattering rich flowers o'er glens and fields
And jagged peaks and solitudes; he sped
Like a clear streamlet o'er its rocky bed,
That by no torture can be hushed to sleep
But pours its music, hastening to the deep."

Priority of acquaintance with and friendship for the one whose earthly name heads this article prompted the writer to send this brief sketch to the magazine whose readers have read so many of his valuable articles, and doubtless many of whom have listened to his inspired utterances. I say his earthly name. Only those endowed with rare spiritual insight can know the larger name by which he is known to spiritual beings. All can know, who so desire and are sufficiently unfolded in spirit, the path of light that he left upon the earth to guide them unto higher and nobler views of life, and unto knowledge of the Truths of the Spirit, his legacy of writings and teachings.

It was during my stay of three years (1872-1875) in Great Britain, that I was invited to deliver mid-week lectures in Brighton, England (as I was holding Sunday services in London). My host urged me to remain another day after my meetings had taken place, as some thing very extraordinary had occurred. A young lad had attended my lecture the night previous and heard the inspiration of the guides. Two or three of his boy friends had accompanied him, and after the lecture they chaffed him for being so absorbed in what he had heard. Finally one of them said in a bantering manner: "If this trance speaking lady is true, why don't you go into a trance and speak and make poems?" Young Colville did go into a trance and spoke and "made poems" much to the surprise and utmost terror of his companions. My host had heard of this and urged me to stay and hear and see this lad (then in his 15th year). I saw and heard him and said then: "The world will hear from him at no distant day; he will speak in many lands."

In 1877 he came to America. I was glad to introduce him to friends in Boston, New York and Washington, and to the summer camp meetings just being started. No introductions were needed after the first hearing, and he had more calls than even he could respond to. A few times he spoke to my congregation in Chicago, for a month or two during my absence. Although speakers rarely meet in their work, we were some times engaged for the same week or so at the camp and summer assemblies. There was always the great appreciation and sympathy between us and our work together was pleasing and harmonious.

He was apparently frail of body and sensitively strung like a musical instrument, but the tense nervous and mental activity (the prodigious brain power) kept him ever busy, busy, busy. The learning, erudition and depth of thought of this young lad, "still in his 'teens," was another of those "knotty problems" that Spiritualism has presented to a critical world to solve. Science has failed to find any other solution than that claimed by the Spirit-world. (Sir Oliver Lodge being the most recent of more than two scores of eminent scientists to proclaim his knowledge of a future life and spirit communion.)

Mr. Colville's work, his urgent nature requiring constant work, led him into many fields of thought, among those who were inquiring into many subjects (all included in Spiritualism). He saw the good that was in them and fearlessly rejected anything not perceived to be true.

Back and forth between England and America, and to far Australia went our indefatigable worker. I often called him a "Spiritual Shuttle," and what golden threads he wove into the dull warp of human life, replete with home, animated with the best that is in the world and is to come. This broadmindedness and versatility led many to say: "He has left Spiritualism for Theosophy; for Christian Science; for New Thought." Not so. He saw that they had come into existence on the open door that Spiritualism had revealed (many times borrowing its truths) and he could correct many of their errors by seeing and appreciating their truths.

He never "settled down" to a regular congregation, although working many times for a long period in one city. He preferred being a "free lance," following "the call" wherever it seemed best, whenever he was needed.

His quaint sense of humor proved a real "safety valve"—a reaction and recreation from the tenseness of so much work on such deep and profound subjects. This quaint humor we enjoyed when he was at our home and we always joined in his talk, using the fanciful names he bestowed on others and on himself. Music was his chief source of rest and recreation, and he frequently went to Catholic churches to hear the music, leading a few fearful ones to whisper "Jesuitical influence"? Never fear, his nature was too fine—his life too exalted, and his inspirers too wise and far seeing!

He was true to his calling and in his life, absteminous almost to asceticism.

When not under the influence of his inspirers he was child like and as I have said had a quaint sense of humor that was a real protection to him—for one cannot talk on deep subjects continually, even when followed home from a lecture by some listener who wanted some passage explained or further elaborated.

"No other like Colville;" certainly not. Each has his or her place that no one else can fill—and his chosen work was his life. It is in the world and its radiance will be a pathway of light for those to follow who have seen and heard and understood, or who may hereafter understand his teachings.

The following poem and symbolic name was given him by my poetic inspirer (Ouina), in the year 1877. How well it shows the chosen work of his life, and his adaptation to that work the reader can judge.

We follow him in spirit to the new-found state and rejoice in the larger life and light, light, light.

TRUTH'S EVANGEL

Poem and symbolic name given to
W. J. COLVILLE,
by the poetic inspirer of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond (Ouina) in the year 1877.

Sensitive as the harp that's swung
By Aeolus in the summer breeze,
When all the forests are o'er hung
With verdure of entwining trees.
Fond of the flowers of the field
And garden—all things fair and bright—
Each can to thee rare pleasure yield,
All nature gladdens thy young sight.
I see thee not "amid the throng"

Of those who seek for worldly power;
Thy spirit will attune its song
To other themes: the Soul's blest dower.
Thou has been chosen in thy youth
To help to bear the message forth
Of Life Immortal,—the living Truth
From realms above to those on Earth.
Music can soothe thee; and its power
Will aid and strengthen on thy way;
Will charm in any weary hour
Thy spirit by its potent sway.
From out their Realm of Light and Love
The spirit messages appear
And ever on thy being move
To teach of truth's new dawning year.
In many lands; far o'er the sea,
And in thy homeland this blest word
Of Life Immortal, thou shalt be
The bearer of Truth's stainless sword.

—From "Reason."

MEDIUMSHIP

LESSON I.

ITS NATURE, LAWS, ADVANTAGES AND DANGERS

The question of mediumship is a very wide one and one, moreover, which permits of an immense variety of definitions and interpretations. In its simplest and most obvious form, the word only signifies susceptibility to various influences, both seen and unseen, of which non-mediumistic, or non-sensitive persons, remain permanently unconscious on account of their temperamental lack of necessary sensitiveness. As a transparent substance like glass is a medium thru which light and heat pass readily, while an opaque substance like brick or wood does not permit of their so ready passage; we may decide that in a typically mediumistic organism there is a refinement approximating transparency which renders the medium—otherwise termed a sensitive or psychic—susceptible. The utter spontaneity with which many phases of mediumship manifest themselves has led many investigators of psychic phenomena to reasonably affirm that mediumship must be much more of a natural gift or endowment than a result of intentional cultivation of any special faculties. A wise middle ground can surely be taken between extreme positions, and, while admitting, indeed definitely teaching, that mediumship is essentially due to special untutored inborn sensitiveness, it is possible to assist, to a large extent, by judicious culture in the regulation of spontaneous susceptibility to outside influences.

Since the dawn of the era of what is definitely termed Modern Psychology, much controversy has arisen over the sources whence the intelligence emanates, usually attributed to mediumship in general. The theory of two minds, objective and subjective, started by Thomson Jay Hudson when he published his widely circulated treatise, "The Law of Psychic Phenomena," led many enquirers into psychic problems during the closing years of the Nineteenth century to seriously dispute the old Spiritualistic ground which had successfully resisted innumerable attacks made upon it from various sources since 1848. For a time the two minds' theory threatened to alienate many thinkers from the accepted Spiritualistic position, but further anthropological researches have served to reconcile seemingly opposing views by demonstrating that the one theory by no means overturns the other.

To the simple Spiritualist, who attributes all psychic manifestations directly and unquestionably to the agency of so-called "departed spirits the idea that we can communicate with each other telepathically, and that many communications received in a psychical manner come from our incarnate, not from our excarnate friends, led to not unnatural consternation and many have been the vigorous attempts made to justify the Spiritualistic view from the dreaded incursions of the telepathic theory. But we are now beginning to formulate psychological statements of so widely inclusive a character that, among reasonable and learned students, controversy on this score seems virtually at an end. The literature of learned societies engaged in Psychical Research has abundantly proved that there is ample and ever increasing evidence in proof of telepathy or mental telegraphy, and this rapidly accumulating evidence proves that we are now in possession of powers and faculties which we often employ unconsciously, but which we can learn to consciously direct, thereby lifting us out of the class of the controlled into that of self-determining co-operators in the work of mental intercommunication. Simply spontaneous mediumship is intensely interesting and instructive, and wherever it appears it should be respectfully regarded and diligently studied; but tho genuine and valuable, it presents drawbacks as well as advantages, on account of the liability of controlled mediums to rest content with being simply receptacles of information from extraneous sources and therefore neglecting their own self-culture.

Genuine mediumship manifests itself in the form of susceptibility to mental influx from incarnate or discarnate entities, knowingly or unknowingly on the part of the medium. In all the phases commonly termed Physical, some material objects are employed in the production of results. Inspirational speaking and writing may be classed as entirely mental, while so-called automatic writing may be termed psycho-physical. Such literary productions as "Letters from Julia," by W. T. Stead, and "Letters From a Living Dead Man," by Elsa Barker, may fairly be regarded as results of mental mediumship supplemented by physical mediumship in some degree, for in both those notable instances the medium was avowedly influenced in both a mental and a physical manner by the communicating intelligence, and was perfectly willing that the communication should be made thru his or her manual agency. The much vaunted and greatly exaggerated dangers of mediumship are by no means confined to what generally bears the name of mediumship. The principal dangers, whenever and wherever they exist, proceed from a lamentable lack of self-assertion in general. Weak willed and weak minded persons, who have apparently hardly any will or mind of their own, are in a state of chronic susceptibility to whatever influence may predominate in their immediate surroundings; therefore, whether they are confessedly or apparently mediumistic or not, they are perpetually swayed by wills and minds other than their own and, consequently, at all times liable to be led in any direction, whichever way the prevailing psychic wind is blowing. In the case of definitely mediumistic children we need only to provide them with the healthiest possible surroundings on all planes, moral, mental and physical. Instead of blindly rebuking them or hysterically attributing their eccentricities to disease or something else uncanny, it is necessary that they should be treated as delicate plants requiring special nurture, and most of all protection against inclement psychic influences. This is a general statement usually applicable to all extremely sensitive children, but there are exceptional cases where mediumistic children are unusually proof against susceptibility to undesirable influences in general, on account of their being constantly surrounded and protected by a powerful band of spiritual guardians who effectively shield them from all liability to common accidents and sickness. When a singularly sensitive child displays no disposition whatsoever to weakness or abnormality, but gives evidence of possessing some unusual gift, such a child may well be regarded as a modern seer or sybil and deserves to be honored as highly as were the seers and sybils of Greece in the palmiest days of Grecian culture and supremacy.

Mediumship when healthy and useful displays itself in a perfectly orderly manner, not in any weird display of terrifying or merely mystifying phenomena. When unwelcome disturbances occur, either mentally or physically, they should be handled firmly and fearlessly, but never should any violent protest be made against a phenomenon even tho it be of a most unwelcome character, because all anger, fear, and other disorderly emotions serve invariably to increase the disturbances we seek to quell. No arbitrary classification of unseen influences into two great groups called Good and Evil can stand the test of reasonable scrutiny, for no matter whether the communicating intelligences are incarnate or excarnate, they are simply human entities on one or other of the many human levels with which we are all frequently brought into contact. Highly susceptible persons, of both sexes and of all ages and all conditions, are influenced largely by the psychical containment of their immediate environment; it therefore often happens that the influencing agent is not so much one particular individual who may be definitely seeking to make a communication, as a sphere of influence composed of many entities, and of the effluence proceeding from them. These are two distinct senses in which the word Sphere can be rightfully employed, viz: (1) a company of affinitizing individuals, and (2) the emanations proceeding both consciously and unconsciously from such a company. An atmosphere or photosphere surrounds every individual, and, according to its nature, it attracts and repels. There is much more truth than many people have yet come to perecive in the universally proclaimed doctrine of universal affinity and attraction. What we most need is to learn how to make intelligent use of the perpetual operation of this undeviating law of affinity and attraction so as to draw to us and hold to us only such influences as we deem welcome and find beneficial.

The regulation of mediumship is the great need among Spiritualists, and among all who seek to pursue a line of experimental investigation in the ample fields covered by the general phrase, Psychical Research. The first great lesson for a student to learn is that we are not compelled to yield to any influence, but we are privileged to enjoy spiritual intercommunion at our discretion. We do not deny or condemn telegraphic and telephonic intercourse between individuals and communities because we know that it needs intelligent regulation and is liable to abuse. No denunciation of natural powers and gifts will ever do good, but must ever prove grossly fettering and misleading. Scientific research cannot be intimidated by scarecrows, but it is legitimate to hoist signals and frankly point out where difficulties and dangers lie, not for the unwise and unworthy purpose of preventing navigation; but for the sole purpose of assisting navigators to avoid rocks and whirlpools, and so, men can steer their vessels, that in time of tempest they may not be submitted to shipwreck.

Mediumship is a fact in human experience and, as we are growing generally more and more sensitive, we shall find it continually on the increase. The student's task is a plain and honorable one, and one which must prove of immense general utility, viz: to face the psychic problem fearlessly and with noble resolution to turn all experiences to account for the general as well as for private weal. Cultivate and exercise all available faculties with the single end in view of extracting from all experience the boon of added knowledge, and all knowledge can be rendered serviceable for human progress.

LESSON II.

Nature of Mediumship

So much has frequently been written and uttered regarding the supposedly unnatural or supernatural character of all that stands out as distinctly psychical, that it seems necessary to work to counteract many false impressions widely afloat concerning the real nature of those gifts and endowments which have long been classified as, not only unusual or extraordinary, but as actually beyond or outside of the ordinary course of natural procedure. Words change their meaning, not only from century to century, but in much shorter periods of time; therefore, it has occurred that within the past few years a great revolution in terminology has been effected, especially with regard to all matters pertaining to the once called "supernatural," which is now often designated "supernormal" instead, a tentative word which scarcely conveys the idea we are now seeking to elucidate.

In that excellent and highly instructive treatise by William Howitt, "A History of the Supernatural In All Climes and Ages," published in Philadelphia in 1865, the learned author used language in common use in his day, but he gave to the old theological word "supernatural" a far wider and much more rational interpretation than it had commonly received.

If that now largely discarded term is still employed, it must be made to mean that which pertains to the higher planes of nature rather than that which is really above nature, for we cannot presume to say how far nature and natural law may extend, therefore, it is the height of presumptuous folly to dogmatize concerning what may lie outside the realms of nature, which are immeasurably wider than common knowledge may suppose.

All that may fairly be classed as Spiritual Mediumship was formerly attributed, quite unwarrantably, either directly to Divine or else to diabolical agency; no middle ground being perceived between the possibility of direct intercourse with Heaven on the one hand and the Inferno on the other. Now the words Supernal and Infernal are in themselves easily accounted for, each being purely relative, as they only signify above and below the particular estate which is our present normal, i.e., average or accustomed condition.

If we receive a communication from a higher plane of intelligence than one on which we usually function mentally or morally, it comes to us from a "heaven," and if we get in touch with a lower plane of mentality and morality than one on which we usually consciously dwell, we may be said to receive influx from a "hell," employing language as used by Swedenborg.

There are many ingenious theories invented and industriously promulgated to explain away the simple facts of mediumship, but these curious substitute theories are far less rational and far more difficult to comprehend than the simple Spiritualistic and Telepathic interpretations which, when taken together, account reasonably for practically all the phenomena of an unusual character with which we are likely to be accosted.

The words most frequently employed to designate mediumistic experiences suggest nothing apart from an extension of well-known faculties. Clairvoyance means clear vision or extended vision. Clairaudience signifies clear or extended hearing. Clairsentience means clear or extended feeling. Psychometry is a word derived from psyche and metron, or metre, and meaning a method of measuring psychically or coming into conscious contact with what Professor William Denton called, "the Soul of Things," a title he gave to a fine work in three volumes, recording his extended investigations along this fascinating line of psychical research.

In the early days of the history of Modern Spiritualism very much was said about Mesmerism, and the familiar terms "operator" and "subject" were constantly employed by writers on mediumship when they sought to define the methods whereby "spirit control" was effected. The old word "control" is still far too much to the front in Spiritualistic circles, and it has given rise to a vast amount of opposition to mediumship on the part of fair-minded and intelligent persons who are by no means averse to the idea of spirit-communion, but who rightfully object to the thought of one individual being actually under the dominion of another.

The now popular word Hypnotism has largely supplanted Mesmerism, chiefly because people are not properly called Mesmerists unless they follow the doctrines and practices of Anton Mesmer, from whose name the word Mesmerism was derived as clearly as Lutheranism came from Martin Luther.

Hypnotism is often closely associated with Mediumship, though not always correctly; and hypnotism itself is a word of wide and varied meaning, though its simplest and most obvious meaning is sleep-producing from hypnos, sleep.

Trance Mediumship is a familiar term and is often applied to states in which a sensitive person is said to be unconscious, though actual unconsciousness is impossible to define. We can be conscious on several distinct planes of consciousness; we are therefore conscious elsewhere and otherwise than commonly, when in some unusual condition, but unconsciousness is inconceivable and no one has ever attempted clearly to define it, except by using the word in a sense entirely relative.

Trance speaking was one of the earliest and most convincing phases of mediumship which drew and held the attention of multitudes of eager listeners in the middle of the 19th century, at a time when modern prophets and prophetesses were springing up everywhere and speaking as some power beyond their own volition gave them extraordinary utterance. It is recorded of the world-famous Cora L. V.

Richmond, that, when she was a little girl (Cora Scott), about twelve years of age, a school slate she was handling became mysteriously covered with writing and that she often passed into a trance condition and gave voice to statements and language far beyond her training and her years. During her long career as a platform orator this highly gifted woman has stood up vigorously for "trance mediumship," persistently declaring that her "guides" have spoken through her and that it has been they, not she, to whom the marvelous eloquence which has poured through her lips should be attributed. Without questioning any of the facts in such cases we deem it important to note that there was always willingness to yield to spirit-influence in such instances, therefore no evidence has been furnished tending to suggest that the medium was in any way coerced by extraneous intelligence, though at first her mediumship was entirely spontaneous and unexpected.

In the case of members of the family of the distinguished Judge Edmonds and other notable personages who figured prominently in the middle of the last century, the same general attitude toward those who are now often termed "invisible helpers" was continuously taken, and while there have undoubtedly been many cases of actual "control" of an uninvited and unwelcome character, these instances belong in a catalogue of abnormal experience and can be treated under the head of Obsessions, which are concomitants of mental and physical disorder not to be classed with any legitimate phase of mediumship. As tares and wheat may be found growing side by side in every field, it should cause no surprise that mediumistic gardens are no exceptions to the general experience. It is, however, a matter of concern that we should all put forth our best endeavors to encourage only the growth of wholesome fruits and thereby discourage and discountenance the perpetuation of those abortive phases of mediumship, which being only derangements, should be treated as the pathological symptoms of a subject which is itself includable within a study of legitimate psychology. That mediumistic persons are exceptionally sensitive to various influences, both seen and unseen, is indubitably the case; but sensitiveness can be so handled and directed as to be made always a blessing, and therefore never a disadvantage. Highly sensitive children are often natural clairvoyants, clairaudients and psychometers, and while often they do not succeed well at school and seem incapable of profiting by ordinary modes of instruction, they are found to absorb a vast amount of knowledge in a psychical manner when placed in a refined and educative mental atmosphere.

Spiritual co-operation is a phrase which well expresses an idea of intercommunication between affinitizing minds, and if such language is generally employed it will go far to put an end to savage and ignorant attacks on mediumship made by persons who, having heard only of "control," at once take up cudgels against what they feel must of necessity be a drawback to the cultivation of proper individuality.

Mrs. Emma Harding Britten and many other highly gifted inspirational orators of a past generation of Spiritualists always loudly proclaimed that they were guided, prompted, inspired and advised by their spiritual directors and inspirers, but never forced to act in accordance with the wishes of those intelligences. Indeed, in the two famous books "Art Magic," and "Ghost Land," a very strong protest was uttered against blind yielding to unseen influences without the exercise of one's own judgment regarding right and wrong and the dangers of weak surrender to hypnotic influence was clearly demonstrated.

It may be fairly contended that no entity incarnate or excarnate can ever have the right to compel submission, unless it be in cases where some one is about to commit a grievous crime upon another, in which case the exercise of forcible restraint over the wrong-doer would not be for the purpose of curtailing his individual liberty, but solely for the sake of protecting the freedom of another against unwarrantable assault.

The idolatry of spirits which has sometimes been displayed,—far more in the past than at present,—grew manifestly out of a misconception regarding the real nature and status of the individuals on the psychic plane with whom we were holding intercourse. If people believe that when they are not assailed by devils they are in direct communion with divinely appointed messengers,—angels of a race vastly superior to the human,—it follows naturally that implicit confidence should be placed in the advice given, and unquestioning obedience rendered to the givers; but after this misconception has been dispelled and we have come to know that our spirit-friends are of our own veritable kith and kin we do not yield them blind homage, nor do we cry "avaunt" when we become conscious of their approach.

To maintain a just balance between all extremes it is necessary for a sensitive to treat all unseen influences exactly as we ought to treat our fellow beings when we meet them in ordinary external intercourse.

Much stress is often laid upon the alleged impossibility of discriminating with regard to unseen influences, while we can see the persons who approach us physically, and therefore it is argued, we can be on our guard against undesirable familiars. This line of argument is so pitiably shallow and unconvincing when fairly analyzed that we dismiss it with a curt rebuke immediately we use our reason respecting our relations with men and women in the flesh in the course of ordinary social and business intercourse.

We all know that forgers and all manner of swindlers fatten upon the lack of psychic perception or intuitive discernment which characterizes their unsuspecting victims. No one would deliberately cash a forged check, knowing it to be such; no one would invest in an utterly worthless proposition, knowing it to be valueless. How then, does it happen that so many persons are daily duped by sleek promoters of worthless enterprises and how is it that counterfeit money is exchanged for genuine currency of the realm? All the successful forgers and deceivers of all kinds are physically visible; they, indeed, take pains to draw great attention oftentimes to their personal attractiveness, and in consequence of the favorable impression they make externally, they succeed in plying their nefarious trade.

The only remedy for the present wide-spread liability to deception is a wise cultivation of psychical discernment (the discerning of spirits, mentioned among other spiritual gifts in the 12th chapter of the 1st epistle to the Corinthians). Blind persons are frequently able to discriminate regarding character much better than persons with good bodily eyesight; that is because the blind are extremely sensitive and trust to intuition far more than do their seeing comrades. Feeling is a word of immensely far-reaching import, for we feel all over our bodies while our other four senses,—sight, hearing, taste and smell, are confined to special organs. We often hear sensitives say that they "sense" certain things. This is rather a vague and yet it is a highly expressive saying, for it means literally that they feel, all over at once, and without specifying detailed sensations they can only tell us that they have become aware that things are so, and they know not just how to describe the avenues through which this information has reached their consciousness. To become thus highly aware of facts not detectable through common outward channels, one requires to live a somewhat secluded life, not necessarily in a material, but certainly in a mental sense. To retire into a secluded sanctuary means mystically to withdraw one's attention from exterior objects and concentrate attention upon a selected theme for meditation, regardless of environment. It is usually much more easy to thus withdraw attention inward when we are in quiet and congenial surroundings, but as circumstances are not always entirely controllable we need to have recourse to inward methods which border upon those practices which are often classed as Yoga by persons who delight in employing Oriental terminology. Sensitive persons usually require more quietude than ordinary, and most of all should we insist that mediumship should be cultivated and exercised, as far as possible, in healthful and beautiful surroundings.

Miscellaneous developing circles in dark stuffy apartments are detrimental to health in all directions. Natural darkness is not objectionable, for the night is as good as the day and there is a calm restfulness after sunset which is often highly conducive to psychic culture. Pure air and cleanliness in every direction are essential to the best results. Sufficient simple wholesome food and sufficient light comfortable clothing are requisite, but all heavy food and superfluous apparel should be rigorously eschewed.

For private exercise of mediumship any undisturbed atmosphere may suffice, indoors or out of doors, wherever the sensitive feels comfortable, and to make oneself comfortable is very important, for the best results are never forthcoming when a sense of discomfort obtains.

As differing temperaments are benefited by different special conditions, much must necessarily be left to individual experience for decision, but certain broad general rules can be laid down which it is always well to follow.

LESSON III.

Mediumship and Self-Unfoldment

So many erroneous statements are often made to the effect that no one can be a medium and at the some time a well developed individual, that we deem it necessary to give utterance to our most positive views and most definite knowledge on this highly important topic. Normal mediumship is used in this lesson to signify an exercise of mediumistic ability knowingly and willingly without any constraint or yielding of one's sovereign right to decide what use shall be made of one's organism or any portion of it.

Among singularly well developed individuals, who not only permitted but encouraged mediumistic experiences, the famous journalist William Thomas Stead stood forth conspicuously as a bright and shining intellectual and moral light. Mr. Stead's well known experiences with inspirational and sometimes seemingly automatic writing are too well known to need any elaborate description, for his two extremely popular manuals, "Letters from Julia," and "How I Know That the Dead Return," have been circulated by hundreds of thousands of copies all over the world. It is the attitude of the man thru whose hand the communications were written which led to the publication of those treatises which now chiefly concerns us.

Far from being a common type of simple sensitive, viz: a yielding character easily influenced and readily impressed from almost any quarter, the founder of "The Review of Reviews" was a singularly determined and self-reliant man; one who would steadfastly adhere thru thick and thin to his convictions, regardless of any amount of opposition or persecution which might be hurled against him. So strong was he in his unqualifying adhesion to positions he had taken that he underwent imprisonment as well as ostracism, gladly and gloried in suffering for conviction's sake.

A man of such stalwart calibre is certainly no weakling, deficient in individuality, a mere subject of extraneous influences; on the contrary he demonstrates to a highly uncommon degree the power resident in human nature to exercise an immense amount of mental and moral freedom in the face of violent opposition. When such an individual develops and exercises mediumship we may rest assured that whatever is accomplished thru his organism occurs with his full consent and, indeed, positively at his desire. In all free contracts there must be two equally free parties, and in the event of normal mediumship this invariable rule is conspicuously demonstrated, for there is mutual desire and unity of purpose between the seen and unseen parties to the mediumistic transaction.

"Julia," or some other friend who has passed to the unseen side of life, wishes to convey a message to a mutual friend and requests Mr. Stead to allow her the temporary use of one of his hands for the purpose.

Without the slightest attempt at coercion she requests a privilege and it is granted at the will of the owner of the hand lent for the occasion. Thus are the communications made or the messages transmitted. When a friend still in the flesh desires to be accorded a similar privilege, that is granted on precisely the same conditions; it therefore follows that the one making use of the medium's hand is no more desirous of using it than the medium is willing that such use should be made of it.

In the case of trance and inspirational speaking, when a medium's vocal organs are brought specially into play, the mutual relation between guide and medium are just the same, for there must be a mutual understanding between the unseen inspirer and the individual thru whose lips the oration, poem, or aught else is voiced. To call all mediumistic processes disorderly and destructive is but to display gross ignorance and blind prejudice, and it is indeed far more repressive of a right exercise of individual liberty to be submissive to the arbitrary dogmatism of anonymous dictators, who write books intended to scare the timid, than to allow our friends, whether incarnate or excarnate, to make some use of our organism when they and we are mutually agreed. But while taking a strong determined attitude in favor of normal voluntary mediumship we take an equally strong position againts all coercive methods, and we cannot conscientiously endorse the pernicious habit sometimes indulged by sensitives of laying everything they say and do to outside influences, when it is necessary for their own self-culture that they should take upon themselves a reasonable share of responsibility for whatever takes place thru their instrumentality.

Three words: Normal, Abnormal, Supernormal, are frequently used to describe three distinct varieties of mediumistic experiences. By normal is usually meant simply the ordinary or usual, tho the word normal properly includes all that is healthy. Abnormal conditions are states of disorder or disease. But tho such is the right use of language, it was for a long time the bad etymological practice of many investigators to characterize all unusual phenomena as abnormal. This misuse of a word on the part of many distinguished authors and speakers of a past generation led inevitably to false views of clairvoyance, clairaudience, etc., on the part of the general public, so much so that even in Spiritualistic circles, where mediumship was extolled and efforts made to encourage its further development, we often heard of abnormal states when conditions were referred to which are now generally described as supernormal in the proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research and other scientific publications dealing with psychical phenomena. Supernormal is a very much better word than abnormal to use in such connections, but even that needs explanation, just as supernatural requires to be intelligently explained or else discarded. Normal is too wide a word, and so is natural, to be relegated exclusively to some easily prescribed domain. That which appears supernormal, and even supernatural, from a lower vantage ground is seen to be entirely normal and perfectly natural from a higher and wider viewpoint. The "astral realm," about which we hear and read much in these days, is fairly describable as a much larger realm than the generally accepted physical. It need not be thought about as immaterial or supermaterial, but only as composed of finer grades of substance than those which make impressions upon ordinary physical senses. We can readily conceive of at least four distinct grades of substances present at the same time in the same place, interpenetrating each the other. Ether is said to be universally present and is never wholly convertible into gas, liquid or solid; therefore, we can readily picture to ourselves the contemporary presence of three or even four distinct grades of substance.

Take the familiar illustration of a piece of sponge in a bowl of water soaked thru with the water. Sponge is in water and water in sponge at the same instant. Sponge is termed a solid, and water a fluid substance. But we can easily picture the presence of ether, finer and subtler than either sponge or water, present in both, while both are dwelling in its embrace. Ether must pervade the water which pervades the sponge, while the sponge is contained in the water which is in turn contained in the ether.

We may be conscious not only of two but surely of three worlds, or planes of consciousness, co-existently and as we consider different varieties and degrees of mediumship we shall readily see that mediumistic experiences can be scientifically and philosophically accounted for in a manner so simple and altogether natural as to disarm prejudice among all fair-minded investigators.

Charles Kellogg, produces sounds in twelve octaves. It is said that the ordinary human ear cannot hear all of these tones, which are only different rates of etheric vibration; but delicate apparatus can register many more sounds than the average ear can detect.

Mr. Kellogg has trained his vocal chords to produce, and his ears to hear far more sounds than ordinary by living for several years on an average of nine months out of every twelve close to the heart of nature, on terms of friendly intimacy with birds, beasts and reptiles, and by subsisting upon a strictly vegetarian diet, which is unmistakably conducive to rendering the physical organism more open to delicate impressions than when a body is built up of flesh largely sustained by animal food. For the healthy and profitable exercise of mediumship it is imperatively necessary that the medium should be in a thoroughly normal condition mentally and physically, for while abnormality does not prevent or destroy mediumship it perverts it to the extent of rendering it fitful and unreliable. Very many are the errors properly attributable to illness of mind and body which lead to misleading results and often to suspicion of trickery being laid at an innocent medium's door. We are often apt to think only of the mental conditions necessary to secure the best results, and while these are of primary importance it is not safe to ignore physical aspects of harmony, for mind and body are far more intimately interlocked and their reaction is far closer than many students of psychic phenomena know or believe. The physique is, indeed, the most external of our bodies and therefore the furthest away from the centre of conscious activity, but it is thru this body that intelligence on the material plane must be ultimately expressed, consequently it is of high moment that the physical structure should be kept clean and wholesome in all respects. For even should the physical body be regarded merely as a window or a lampglass, very much must depend upon the integrity and cleanliness of such an outer instrument when we are considering the revelation of light or general clearness of vision which can be ours in the most external world where mediumship is finally ultimated. Breathing exercises when regular and rhythmical can be profitably employed, though it is not always necessary to teach regular breathing, because healthy children breathe correctly from natural impulse. Whenever improper habits have been formed it is necessary to break them up, and systematic breathing in accordance with the simple natural plan of breathing, first thru one nostril and then thru the other at regular intervals, will be found extremely useful in inducing and restoring normality.

So very much is constantly being said concerning "harmonious conditions" that one is inclined to ask what constitutes these desirable conditions, and seldom is any sufficient answer given. Certain general rules can easily be laid down, but to be truly practical these rules must take different temperaments into consideration, for above all else it is essential that the state of a sensitive should be entirely comfortable, or the best results are never forthcoming. Reasonable investigation can never require that humiliating tests be applied to a sensitive, for any mental disturbance renders the annoyed sensitive nervously upset and therefore in some measure "out of condition." Public demonstrations of physical or test mediumship are usually far less than thoroughly conclusive on account of the extreme difficulty of securing necessary conditions; still enough may be demonstrated to awaken keen interest and induce investigators to pursue their investigations much further in more private places.

The Home Circle is a valuable institution whenever rightly conducted, but we must guard against inviting or requesting any person to join it who does not wish to do so or who is not in full accord with the dominant motive for its existence. The best time for seeking mediumistic development is whenever no business cares or domestic duties are pressing, and when the mind is able to give itself unreservedly to the work in hand.

As night is the negative portion of the twenty-four hours which constitute a day, it often happens that after sunset is the most favorable time for enjoying conscious contact with the spiritual realms. This is not because our spiritual helpers are more able to approach us during darkness than when sunlight is brightly illuminating the rooms we occupy, but because of our greater receptivity during the negative period of our day.

Sleep is generally more readily induced at night than in the brightest hours of day, but this rule is not invariable, for it sometimes happens that persons enjoy their profoundest slumber at midday when active duties compel them to earn their living thru the night. It is the reposeful frame of mind which one enjoys which contributes most to all truly desirable varieties of mediumistic experience, and it cannot be possible to enter fully into a welcome trance and thereby withdraw consciousness from the external place, while any duties pertaining to the outer side of life are demanding our attention. Though the word Trance almost invariably suggests unconsciousness to the untutored mind, this erroneous employment of the word by no means agrees with the best ancient usage. The 10th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles contains a narrative of Peter at Joppa passing into a state of exaltation termed trance, which carried with it greatly extended vision.

The main incidents in this remarkable and singularly beautiful Bible story accord exactly with many similar experiences of modern seers, for it is indeed true that time and place are negligible factors where spiritual revelations are concerned; the only vital matter being the interior condition of the seer.

It is said that Peter was hungry before passing into the trance condition and that he entered it while food was in course of preparation. Lack of our usual quantity of food often aids interior vision, because a clogged body is always an impediment.

Reasonable abstinence is helpful on the path of orderly psychical development, but no fasting which injures or impoverishes the body can ever be an aid to genuine development.

Mental aberrations are often mistaken for illuminations and against this fatal blunder we need to carefully guard; but it is not likely that any disturbance of a serious character can occur when we keep our minds and bodies in a state of harmony. The widest spread delusion we encounter among sensitive persons, not well balanced is that of believing that because we have ignorantly and blindly submitted to undesirable influences in times past we are therefore compelled to go on thus submitting. This is the crux of the situation when cases of actual or alleged obsession have to be dealt with, and such cases are never found apart from some physical as well as mental or psychical disturbance. It is always a moot question whether psychical discord occasions physical distemper or whether physical disease produces psychical derangement.

To answer that question fully would require much greater knowledge of the intimate connection between mind and body than is commonly possessed, but we shall always find derangement of mind and body co-existent.

In the 18th century that famous American physician, Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia, declared that the influence of mind over body was very great, and he added that no one had been able to entirely estimate that greatness. Though the words were uttered considerably more than a century ago, they remain true to this moment; it is surely, then, the part of wisdom to do all in our power to keep mental and physical conditions strong and pure together and, without attempting to dogmatise upon disputed questions in psychology, treat the human individual as in all cases practically a unit. There may be three or even seven distinct planes on which the ego operates, concerning which deep students of Occult Science may speak confidently, but if that be so it still remains that these planes are so vitally interdependent and interpenetrating that the benefit of one contributes to the blessing of all and the injury of one to the handicap of all in some degree more or less remote or intimate.

To attempt to develop psychically in discordant or unclean surroundings is distinctly detrimental to health in all directions. Pure air, simple agreeable food, appropriate and comfortable raiment, sufficient bodily exercises and, as far as possible, a life free from corroding care and distressful anxiety, must be maintained as a rule of conduct if we are to reap substantial benefits through mediumship and avoid the dangers into which ignorance and negligence often plunge the unwary.

The famous Magic Staff of Andrew Jackson Davis," in all circumstances keep an even mind," is an injunction we must insist on heeding whatever difficulties beset our upward pathway.

LESSON IV.

Mediumship Compared with Hypnotism and Mesmerism.

From the very commencement of the modern Spiritualistic Movement in 1848 many persons, some friendly and others hostile to Spiritualism, have harped upon the resemblance between Mediumship and Mesmerism, and in recent years many have been the books and pamphlets published warning readers against cultivating or even allowing mediumship on account of the dangers of Hypnotism with which all phases of Mediumship are ignorantly identified by unknowing but extremely pretentious authors. Mesmerism is distinctly the cult of Anton Mesmer, a man who advocated the use of animal magnetism for the cure of disease, and who understood much concerning the manner in which one person can physically impress and influence another. The doctrines taught and the methods employed by Mesmer can easily be ascertained, as the biographies of that famous man are numerous. Without agreeing in all particulars with Mesmeric ideas and practices, the well-known Theosophical author, A. P. Sinnett, long ago published "The Rationale of Mesmerism," which gives an excellent account of the uses to which Mesmer's methods have often been put. Colonel Henry Steele Olcott, president-founder of the Theosophical Society organized in New York City November, 1875, employed mesmeric methods in his work of healing in which he was often eminently successful, especially in India, where the native populations are far more generally susceptible to psychic treatment than are average Europeans or Americans.

Mesmerism being properly a sectarian or denominational term applicable by right only to Mesmer's avowed followers, it has fallen into considerable disuse, and the wider and far more scientific term, Hypnotism, has widely supplanted it. Derived from the Greek word "hypnos," meaning sleep, the title of Hypnotist means sleep-inducer; therefore, if we use language correctly, we shall speak of hypnotic processes only when we intentionally refer to such as produce sleep either intentionally or unintentionally on the part of the hypnotizer or the hypnotized. A hypnotist is simply a person who acknowledges, and in some degree advocates, hypnotic practices; a hypnotizer is one who knowingly or unknowingly induces sleep in others; self-hypnotizing is a process of inducing sleep in oneself at will. Dr. Baker Fahnestock of Philadelphia wrote a very interesting and important book, entitled "Statuvelism," a good many years ago, in which he explained how it was possible to induce a state of superiority to suffering in oneself and in others without passing into any peculiar or seemingly unconscious state. There is indeed a wide difference between submitting blindly to the mental operations of a mesmeric operator or a medical or other hypnotist and choosing in perfect mental freedom to co-operate with some friend in or out of the flesh, between whom and oneself there exists a close tie of intellectual and moral sympathy. The old term "operator" and "subject" were always to some extent misleading, tho when rightly understood they serve fairly well to designate the relation actually subsisting in many instances between a doctor and a patient, especially when the former employs "suggestion" largely as a therapeutic agent. The stage hypnotist is usually an unscientific person who relies upon stage tricks and bombastic mannerisms to produce effects upon a company of spectators who often are in search more of amusement than edification. In cases where a man of powerful will and engaging personality succeeds in bringing several other persons under his influence during the course of a popular entertainment, we have to consider several factors which also enter into the production of certain common results in Spiritualistic seances. There is supposedly some agreement entered into beforehand between the performing mesmerist or hypnotist and the "subjects" who appear on the stage, and go thru their paces in obedience to the directions of the stage manager pro tem. That imposing personage generally speaks in a confident, authoritative tone, waves his hands in a somewhat hysterical manner and does several other "stunts," all of which have a tendency to impress the hired assistants who have engaged with the performer-in-chief to do his bidding to the utmost of their ability for a pecuniary consideration, and also to interest and mystify the spectators. When volunteers are called for, as they often are, it is usually found that those who actually carry out the suggestions of the dictator are either singularly impressionable persons who are unconsciously mediumistic in high degree, or persons of much more decided individuality who wish the experiments to prove successful and who, therefore, mentally aid the operator by vountary compliance with his suggestions. It is really the case that the most nearly perfect subjects are divisible into two extreme opposite classes, (1) persons whose sensitiveness to extraneous influences of all sorts is far greater than the average, and (2) persons whose individuality is so much more pronounced than the ordinary that whenever they resolve to assist at an experiment they greatly facilitate it.

Thomson Jay Hudson, in his famous book, "The Law of Psychic Phenomena," in the section devoted to Hypnotism throws a vast amount of much-needed light on this entire problem, for he contends that it is a flagrant error in the popular mind to believe that we are at the mercy of hypnotists and all manner of uncanny influences in such a way as to rob us of all genuine individuality. If practically all persons in a certain social or individual condition were evenly developed—as they decidedly are not at present—it would be a very easy task to insist upon the general accuracy of Hudson's position, which is undoubtedly, in the main, sound; but we cannot afford to overlook the often disconcerting fact that the great variety in development, which we encounter at every turn in all definitely designable groups of humanity, compels us to admit, no matter how reluctantly, that there are victims of unrighteous hypnotism in our midst, and some of these may be subjects of unseen operators. Demoniacal possession cannot be flippantly dismissed as merely an ancient superstition sometimes recrudescent in the present century; for tho it is harped upon far too much in many quarters it has to be reckoned with in many mental cases where usual methods of treatment prove persistently ineffectual. There is but one remedy for this sad condition in which unbalanced sensitiveness may be found, and that is to help them to the utmost of our ability to assert themselves as they have never asserted themselves before, and here comes in the place for right mental treatment which is the only genuine and effective antidote to the pliant mental condition which renders its victims creatures of unwelcome influences. Without discriminating clearly between voluntary and involuntary subjectivity one cannot discuss this intricate matter with any degree of clearness, for it naturally follows that highly individualized persons will yield to whatever pleases them at their own discretion, regardless of opinions entertained by others. We may be indiscreet and do many things which we regret afterward thru ignorance and obstinacy and still have no just complaint against our partners in unwise acts, seeing that we and they were mutually responsible.

It is recorded of Andrew Jackson Davis that he was mesmerized by William Fishbough, an upright, intelligent gentleman, previous to his attaining that "superior condition" which made possible the production of those marvelous volumes which constitute the Davis library. In many instances a similar process has paved the way for spiritual enlightenment in greater or less degree; but it was not mental subjugation, but liberation, which was brought about in those remarkable and edifying instances. It is always wrong to seek to coerce another's will, for such a process cannot be harmonized with the Golden Rule which teaches us to do to others only what we are willing that others should do to us, and no one is willing to be coerced. If a patient goes to a physician who employs hypnotic methods and requests hypnotic treatment it is but rational to decide that the applicant is carrying out his own wishes in receiving the kind of treatment for which he has applied and for which he is willing to pay. In like manner, when persons form or join Developing Circles of their own accord and express a fervent desire to develop some phase of mediumship they are acting on their own responsibility. Caution and discretion are needed to steer clear of snares and pitfalls in all directions as we journey thru life, but we need feel no more dread of the unseen than of the seen. Indeed, we are in greater danger, when unduly susceptible to outward charms, from the physically visible than from any unseen operations, because what meets the outward eye and ear, and generally fascinates the bodily senses, makes a far stronger appeal to the average undeveloped man or woman than does any influence exerted on a subtler plane of nature. The reason for this is that a very sensuous person is very slightly developed on any inner plane, and therefore not sufficiently sensitive to respond greatly to influences working on interior planes. All who practice suggestive healing find that dense persons whose mental faculties are dormant find difficulty in comprehending psychic activities. They are consequently great sticklers for definitely material modes of treatment, while the sensitive nature which readily responds to silent, and even to absent, treatment, marks a stage in human evolution far beyond that of the respectable boor or even of the everyday person who sees and feels little of anything which does not clearly manifest on the lowest or most exterior plane of matter. Many dense and ignorant persons are credulous and easily frightened; therefore they can easily be made to dread hypnotic and other influences; but it is taking a contemptibly mean advantage of ignorance and credulity to play upon the fears of the illiterate and the timid. Scientific hypnotism, like honorable mediumship, invites the closest examination on the part of fair-minded investigators, and we feel that we have a right to insist that no one should allow himself to believe that any influence can exert any hold over him without his own consent. Illustrations could easily be given in multitudes showing how it often comes to pass that hypnotic influences are exerted and yielded to, without our having to admit that anything has occurred to shake our confidence in the salutary doctrine of human free agency, tho it stands to reason that freedom, tho determinable as to quality, is highly variable in quantity in different persons and in the same persons at different stages of their development.

As the theater has presented many a version of George du Maurier's "Swengali" as a typical hypnotist, and the same author's famous "Trilby" as a typical hypnotized sensitive, it may be well to analyze that story, which, tho not strictly scientific, is nevertheless by no means devoid of scientific elements. "Trilby" is a French laundress who aspires to sing in public and desires nothing so much as to meet some one who can help her to shine on the lyric stage. "Swengali" promises to bring out her voice and make her a "star," and he fulfils his promise thru hypnotic agency. Such an incident by no means upsets the theory that the "subject" was willing to yield to the influence of the "operator," but it proves that so great was the desire of the girl to accomplish a desired end that even tho the road to it was not entirely to her taste —for "Swengali" was not an altogether agreeable person—the attainment of the goal was, in her opinion, worth all it cost to reach it.

It is absurdly puerile to complain against any means with which we voluntarily comply when we set out to attain certain much-loved ends. Again we insist that the methods may be undesirable and some of the results pernicious, but that admission should only be taken as an admonition to exercise caution and look well over the ground before yielding—if we ever yield—to any outside influence. The higher and better way than the hypnotic method is the open daylight path of Spiritual co-operation. That is the great, broad highway up which we can all profitably travel, and to that road, and to that road only, do we purposefully direct the steps of our inquiring students.

LESSON V.

Mediumship and Human Freedom

From all that we have advanced in the four foregoing lessons the student will have gathered that the twofold object of this series of instructions is to explain as far as possible the nature of mediumship and to offer practical advice concerning its regulation. Regulation is not repression or suppression, therefore there is no kinship between the attitude taken in these lessons and hysterical protests against mediumship per se, as though it were a dangerous something tending to destroy individuality and therefore to be condemned in toto. There is but one complete method of regulating any experiences to which we are naturally liable and that is by so developing our self-conscious individuality that we allow nothing to invade our atmospheric belt or auric circle without our definite consent.

The great difference between voluntary and involuntary mediumship borders closely upon a distinction often drawn between mediumship and adeptship and to that topic we now draw particular attention. All students of psychic phenomena know that any phenomenon may proceed from one or the other of two opposite causes, i. e., either in response to the desire and expectation of one who experiences a result, or to the surprise, and sometimes also to the dismay of the percipient or recipient of such phenomenon. As the terms "operator" and "subject" are commonly used in mesmeric and hypnotic connections, so "sender" and "receiver" on the one side, and "operator" and "percipient" or "recipient" on the other hand, are rightfully employed in cases where definite psychic experiments are being purposefully and successfully conducted.

However much a "subject" may desire to be influenced by an "operator" we cannot entirely eliminate the matter of domination on the one side and subjection on the other; but when we consider two or more perfectly willing co-experimenters, who are indeed fellow students, there is no such idea tenable as that of one controlling and the other submitting to domination. The persistence with which many Spiritualists insist upon clinging to the questionable and often objectionable word "control" is very largely due to the fact that rational spiritual philosophy has not made sufficient inroads into their consciousness to compel them to see that we are really only employing a telepathic method of communication between kindred entities when one is incarnate and the other discarnate as much as when both are still inhabiting the flesh. Far from regarding evidences of telepathy or mental telegraphy as disconcerting to the rational Spiritualists, or calculated to throw doubt upon spirit-communion, we insist that all these mental phenomena which prove inter-communication between affinitizing minds here and now on earth, throw great and much needed light on the constitution of the surviving entity.

The good and useful word "survival" is one now happily much in use and it conveys a correct shade of meaning without ambiguity. To survive is to continue to live, neither more nor less than that simple widely-inclusive idea is suggested by the expression; then it necessarily must follow that if we continue to live in a post mortem state we must be living in that condition at present though clothed upon with a physical sheath which is laid aside at time of mortal dissolution.

Whenever this clear idea is adequately grasped all superstitious dread of spirit-communion vanishes, and with it all foolish idolatry of the so-called "departed," who cannot have departed in reality if they are still in communion with us and continuing to live their life of thought and feeling which constitutes them the particular individuals they are.

Mediumship is ridiculously misinterpreted in nuerous instances and though on the 31st day of March, 1915, the 67th anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism was widely celebrated,—therefore nearer 70 than 60 years have passed since the "Rochester Knockings" heralded the commencement of a stupendous world-wide revelation of the actual condition of the psychic realm contiguous to our ordinary physical existence, and indeed interpretating it,—there are still to be found multitudes of superficial questioners raising the silly old question why their spirit-friends do not approach them directly, but use the organism of some strange person through which to deliver messages to the loved ones yet inhabiting terrestrial bodies, and the yet more foolish query why the spirits do not come to their immediate friends directly instead of going to mediums. The answer to the first question is that different degrees of sensitiveness determine susceptibility to psychic influx and regulate degrees of perception of physical objects and presences. The reply to the second question is that it is in itself unanswerable, because logically unaskable, seeing that clairvoyants invariably settle the matter before hand by saying, "I see such and such influences with you," or words to that effect.

Our spirit friends are not drawn to mediums with whom we and they are alike unacquainted; they are attracted to us, but it takes a sufficiently sensitive organism to see or feel their presence or to hear any sounds they may produce upon the psychic atmosphere. Gross ignorance is manifested by reasoning enquirers, therefore instruction in the laws governing mediumship is a pressing requirement of our times. Often and often we hear a scathing objection made to the moral defects of a medium, and many fastidious persons seriously dislike the idea that their friends should approach them through a supposedly unworthy channel. Up to a certain point we can sympathize with this fastidiousness, but it soon melts away on fair examination, for whenever our friends communicate with us through anyone we are present in the place where the communication is made, and it is almost certain that we and not the medium have attracted the spirit. If we can deliberately go into the presence of a person of doubtful character and ask for a message from a spirit-friend, we should certainly not be surprised or cynical because our desires are so far met that one whom we seek to hear from endeavors to respond to our request.

Clairvoyance does not necessitate any actual fellowship between the seer and the individual seen and described any more than we need to postulate sympathy in thought and feeling between ourselves and all the persons and objects we observe upon a highway.

When clairsentience is the gateway through which information is received we need not suppose that there is any true affinity between the psychometer and the influences detected unless the feeling on the part of the percipient is specially agreeable, which is undoubtedly an evidence of some measure of interior accord. It is frequently at the earnest desire of both medium and sitter that a certain influence should manifest, and in such an instance conditions are usually highly favorable. Let it once be clearly and practically understood that fervent desire and confident expectation are the two great gates through which all revelations are vouchsafed, and we shall have less and less need to depend upon mediumistic channels beyond the limits of our own superphysical faculties; but unless these faculties are developed and exercised sufficiently to make us independent of extraneous aid, we must depend to a considerable extent upon our more sensitive neighbors. Mediumship can be both a bane and a blessing, and it is usually a combination of both, because of its spasmodic and unregulated character. There are two distinct kinds of mediumship broadly separable which are too often unseparated in our esteem, viz., a kind of useful observativeness,—which adds to our general knowledge and can always be made to serve some useful end,—and a much more intimate association with entities and influences observed. There is no danger whatever in the increase of observational sensitiveness, for that only extends our knowledge; but susceptibility to influences in an emotional manner is often fraught with danger to imperfectly individualized persons. A familiar illustration based on everyday experience should suffice to show clearly the actual difference between these two sorts of sensitiveness. A person possessed of unusually keen sight or hearing must of necessity see or hear more than the average. This extension of sight and hearing should be made use of, but never permitted to dominate its possessor. No suffering results from extended power to observe and hear, but only from allowing ourself to be emotionally affected by what one sees and hears. We know full well how often it is said that very sensitive musicians suffer greatly from musical discords which less sensitive hearers fail to detect, and that they also keenly enjoy delicate and intricate harmonies which ordinary listeners fail to hear. This is undeniably true in fact, but it need not continue to be anyone's experience on the painful side, though it may continue, and constantly increase, on the delightful side. If we exercise will power and mental discrimination in the regulation of all our various faculties we shall soon discover that ability and necessity are far more identical.

We can listen attentively to whatever pleases us and drink in such melodies as carry charm, but because we have the capacity for listening equally to discords, and partaking of the vibrations which annoy us, we are by no means compelled to do so. Ability to drink tea accompanies ability to swallow any other liquid, but multitudes of total abstainers from alcohol in all its forms drink tea freely, and rarely refuse a cupful when it is offered to them, but though they have equal capacity for drinking wine and brandy, and they may often dine at tables where those beverages are consumed by fellow diners, they simply do not partake of those stimulants. In like manner we can know of the existence of psychic presences and mingle with any sort of company and still remain immune from participation in any other emotional experiences than such as we elect to favor.

The first necessary exercise along the road of mastery over undue susceptibility to psychic influences is the practice of ripid concentration of attention at some point where our affections or our intellectual interests may be exclusively centered. Say that a number of different sounds are hearable at a certain time in a certain place and we desire to listen attentively to only one of those many sounds. We must not make an effort to shut out any of the others, but quietly and resolutely affirm our ability to confine attention exclusively to the sound selected. At first other sounds may remain audible, but as we persist in confining attention to one sound only, we shall find that all the others grow fainter and fainter until they have become wholly negligible. Should we then desire to select another sound and neglect to listen to the first one chosen, we can attend to the second as exclusively as we did to the first, and in like manner, if we please, select sound after sound until we have proved conclusively that we are able to use our faculty of hearing entirely at discretion.

When this excellent practice is frequently and successfully carried out on the common outer plane of our experience we can utilize the method to great advantage in the field of clairaudience, and thereby escape annoyance from physical distractions while listening attentively to some sound pertaining to the psychic region or astral plane on which our clairaudience is exercised. Precisely the same experiments can be conducted with tasting, touching and smelling. We can select a flavor, an odor, or a texture for examination and so concentrate upon one only at a given time that no matter how many others may be co-present we pay no attention to them.

These exercises develop self-control in mental regions and are of priceless benefit in all departments of activity, in social and business life as well as in the field of expressly psychic exploration.

We all properly desire to turn our sensitiveness to good account if we acknowledge it and cultivate it, and it stands to reason in commercial life, as well as everywhere else, increased perceptiveness must prove an extremely valuable asset whenever it is properly regulated. To develop and exercise sensitiveness deliberately with some useful end in view is surely rational and praiseworthy, and such a course of procedure is the only effectual cure for that distressing unbalanced sensitiveness which ill-informed persons are apt to think is the whole of mediumship. We cannot exercise power in psychic fields unless we exercise self-regulation in the ordinary conduct of external life, therefore the exercises in concentration we advocate, and lay much stress upon, serve equally in cases where students are specially mediumistic and where they are not; for they invariably increase self-reliance and general efficiency by helping progress along the upward path toward eventual adepthood.

It has seemed to many investigators who have not learned of the rational luminous way, that they must either abandon all interest in mediumship and turn their backs on psychic development altogether, or else submit to agonizing experiences fraught with injury alike to mind and body. To rescue these victims of misconception should be the happy work of truly enlightened sensitives. It may safety be affirmed that so far as we are practically concerned we can, if we resolutely will, determine exactly the class of influences with which we psychically consort, for it is always thought and affection, never exterior conditions, which regulates mental and spiritual consociation. We may often be in the actual outward presence of much that is in no way related with us inwardly, and we can wisely make use of such trying experience to strengthen our characters by refusing to be annoyed by otherwise annoying influences. As in the life of a great city all sorts of sights and sounds are inevitable in the present perturbed condition of society,—but we can learn to surround ourselves with an auric sanctuary and pay no heed to surrounding perturbations,—so by an analagous act on the purely psychic plane we can grow unaffectable by discordant influences and then begin the still higher mediumistic ministry of guiding and healing others.

LESSON VI.

A Study in Psychometry.

Tho many useful words are constantly employed to designate distinctive psychic gifts and faculties, the word Psychometry, employed by Professor William Denton, Joseph Rodes Buchanan and other well-known anthropologists of the 19th century, seems more widely inclusive and intelligently expressive than almost any other. Its only adequate equivalent in our immediate vocabulary is Clairsentience or clearfeeling. We often hear a sensitive person exclaim, "I sense so and so," and beyond that rather hazy statement we do not seem able to readily proceed. This reminds us of many a person's unsatisfactory "Oh, because," a phrase used far more frequently by women than by men, and often attributed to a woman's supposed intuition enabling her to feel in a general "altogether" way much that she cannot clearly analyze. Here we strike the primal difference between synthesis and analysis; between an inclusive perception of things in mass or bulk and a particular discriminative appreciation of details included in that bulk or mass.

A "sensitive" or "psychic" or "medium";—we can use whichever of these three titles we prefer without conveying more than one idea,—grasps in some more or less mysterious manner the fact that an object or a person possesses certain definite attributes and qualities without the perceiver having arrived at that conclusion by any rational process of examination and deduction.

Psychometers are measurers of psychic influences and detectors of influences too subtle to be discerned or apprehended by persons of only ordinary susceptibilities. Professors Denton and Buchanan, and many other able scientific men who have investigated the psychic faculty displayed by highly sensitive men, women and children thru a long series of varied experiments, have collected abundant evidence to convince all but the stupidily sceptical that this faculty they have termed psychometric is one possessed by far more persons than we commonly suppose, and it is on its lower level a faculty possessed in high degree by bloodhounds and other sagacious animals often employed for detective purposes.

We need to discriminate unmistakably between a merely animal sensitiveness, which is sub-human and pertains only to the animal side of human nature, and a definitely human and deliberately cultivated and exercised faculty which marks a high degree of human progress; but as the greater contains the lesser and the higher includes the lower, the remarkable sagacity of a fine dog may also prove a valuable human asset. The main distinction which always needs to be kept steadily in mind between animal and human susceptibility to psychical impressions is that the former are instinctive and therefore involuntary, while the latter are the result of definite determination to acknowledge and utilize an indwelling ability. We all know that multitudes of men and women live constantly on a plane of consciousness very little removed above the animal, and that many of these unsophisticated persons are good and useful sensitives and can be employed to excellent advantage in Psychical Research work, and it is from the ranks of these that responsible mediums are perpetually recruited. A good natural psychometer who works only instinctively is a valuable find for scientific explorers of the psychical domain, but as such a person is likely to be too easily influenced by the minds of experimenters who have definite views of their own in many instances (tho not in all cases), we find that most records of psychometric revelations are probably less valuable than they would have been had the investigators been completely unbiased in any direction.

It is probably much easier for an animal and also for a simple-minded child, to be unaffected by forethought and prejudice than for any thoughtful child of school age or for any normal man and woman to be thus unaffected, until we reach a stage approaching adepthood, which is a condition resulting from persistent cultivation of super-ordinary powers of observation by means of definite self-regulative processes.

The natural impulsive sensitive who exercises a dog-like psychometric faculty is very often correct and therefore furnishes abundant evidence of the utility as well as of the reality of the psychometric faculty; but a danger arises in the case of human beings as a result of their mixing their own fancies and unwarranted speculations with their unpremeditated impressions, and in cases where a determined experimenter is conducting experiments with such a sensitive it follows frequently that the sensitive, who is thoroughly genuine, reflects the opinions of the investigator with whom she is working to such an extent that thought-transference pure and simple is the true explanation of the impressions given forth by the psychometer. When experiments are made with dogs the case is usually different, because when sensitive animals are employed as detectives, some article belonging to the missing person is presented to the dog who sniffs the article and then follows a mysterious trail apparently using a remarkably keen sense of smell. Everyone gives forth a characteristic emanation at all times involuntarily and of necessity as a result of temperament and condition, and whenever an animal or a person is endowed with keener perception of this than ordinary, psychometry is demonstrable.

We hear of "first impressions" and their frequent accuracy. The cause of their correctness is that they are generally far more simple and instinctive than any deductions we may draw from careful observation, but no mere impression can equal the profundity of genuine intuition, which includes all the elements in accurate impressions and much besides. To prove the psychometric faculty is not located like sight or hearing in a single pair of organs, but is distributed over the entire body, the article should be handled but not looked at, as the sense of sight usually interferes with that of simple feeling. The psychometer absorbs information by a process of psychic suction, therefore it matters little (if at all) whether the article to be delineated is placed in the hand, on the forehead, at the back of the head, under the feet or on the chest, for delineations are possible with any of these five positions.

Other positions also have been selected for the placing of an article to be examined psychically and equally good results have followed. (2) It is imperative that a psychometer should have no desire to arrive at any special conclusion for any purpose whatever. This condition is difficult to fully meet when a sensitive is employed by an experimenter who strongly wishes an event to turn out in a certain way, or who entertains strong secret beliefs that an article has had a certain history or is the property of an owner possessed of certain definite qualities and peculiarities. These hampering presuppositions entertained by investigators militate greatly against lucidity, and they are utterly unscientific, tho difficult to entirely avoid. The scientific attitude in the face of every projected investigation is one of pure agnosticism and surely it stands to reason that if we feel certain we already know the facts in a case, we are not consciously in need of further information, tho it is often extremely gratifying to be assured that we are right and to have our deductions confirmed by witnesses. (3) Whenever a psychometric experiment is conducted deliberately the sensitive should be temporarily at rest from all other engagements. A free mind is essential to complete concentration, and without that prime requisite to success, results are apt to be confused and confusing.

The theory of psychometry explains many a mystery otherwise insoluble and it interprets rationally numerous cases of healing thru contact with magnetized and consecrated articles which would remain darkly mysterious were it not for the light shed by psychometry. Dr. J. R. Buchanan was so enthusiastic that he declared the cultivation of this faculty heralded the dawn of a new era in civilization, and so it does if it is developed intelligently and impartially along noble lines.

Graphology is by no means despicable, for it can be proved that caligraphy throws some light on character; but a moment's thought should suffice to convince us all that handwriting is easily imitated by expert forgers, and there is surely an immensely wide difference in character between a forger and an upright man whose writing is imitated successfully for deceptive ends. The distinction between the standpoint of a graphologist and that of a psychometer is one of the widest thinkable opposition, because the former depends avowedly upon a result of mechanical action (writing) which can be learned and copied, and the latter relies solely upon internal evidences with which outward actions have nothing to do.

It must be self-evident that if external acts like writing could not be successfully imitated, forgeries could not succeed; therefore, while we admit, for it can frequently be proved, that handwriting betrays character to some considerable extent,—especially when one writes carelessly, bestowing no thought on the mechanical procedure—still the only infallible proof of character is to be found in those subtle and inevitable emanations which proceed spontaneously from us as the direct result of our interior condition. Discrimination is frequently necessary to decide between chronic and immediate conditions. The first impression received by a keenly sensitive psychometer results from the actual condition of the person whose hand is taken when there is personal contact, but as there is only temporary agitation, inducing the symptoms of nervous irritability or hasty temper, this impression soon wears off and the next impression penetrates far more deeply into the more permanent state of the person undergoing psychic investigation.

When an article of clothing, or anything constantly carried about the person and used very frequently, like a pocket knife, a locket, or a watch, is used for delineative purposes, a sensitive will probably get a correct first impression because such an article has become permeated with the psycho-physical exudations of its owner and wearer, and general conditions are absorbed and retained to a far greater extent than results of transient emotions, unless such be extremely vivid and enter very deeply into the emotional life of the one experiencing them. Psychometry serves also for discovering the inner atmosphere of rooms and entire buildings.

Whenever a sensitive feels a distinctive aversion to a place or an intense distaste for the society of a person, these warnings should be heeded, but it is necessary to point out clearly in a lesson that personal aversion by no means necessarily reflects discredit on the object of aversion; it only proves incompatibility of temperament or lack of mutual adaptability of place or person. In the case of rooms or buildings ,the magnetism of places is as unmistakable as that of individuals, and this is due to human associations far more than to climatic and other extraneous causes. Every place and person has its own peculiar atmosphere and photosphere, and on the astral atmosphere which serves as a palimpset; everything is inscribed which takes place in the edifice or affects the emotional life of the man or animal. Psychometry is more than clairvoyance or clairaudience, and more than both combined, because it is all-inclusive. It cannot be properly termed an additional sense, or the intensification of any one of our five senses, tho touch seems more nearly related to it than any of the other four. A psychometer gets at the root of the five senses and deals with the palm of the psychic hand, so to speak, out of which the five digits proceed.

All readers of hands know that the palms reveal more than the fingers; but each digit has a tale to tell peculiarly its own. A psychometer by getting at the root of the senses can ascertain more than can possibly be discovered by employing the senses separately and severally, therefore, psychometry when highly cultivated reveals all that phrenology, physiognomy and chirology can reveal, and more also. In saying this we do not intend in any way to slight or deprecate the work of phrenologists, physiognomists and chirologists; we only mean to insist that as we become increasingly sensitive to interior suggestions we shall have less and less occasion to depend as hitherto upon those imperfect opportunities afforded us for making examinations limited by the testimony of the outward senses.

To exercise psychometry perfectly one has to become wondrously freed from ordinary anxieties and from all prevailing tendencies to be influenced by appearances, for no sooner do we begin to take account of external symptoms than we transfer attention from within to without and thus become muddled in an endeavor to collect evidence from two opposite directions at the same moment. Perfect mental serenity and complete disregard of appearances is the sine qua non when seeking to perfect ourselves as psychometers. To the extent that we attain to that amazing degree of freedom from the pressure of extraneous influences, but no further, can we lucidly and reliably exercise our genuinely psychical possibilities.

LESSON VII.

Healing Mediumship—Its Nature and Rightful Exercise.

Among the many phases of mediumship constantly enumerated there can be none so wide-reaching in beneficent results as the ministry of healing.

In the early days of the career of Modern Spiritualism, this important subject occupied a very prominent place in the esteem of Spiritualists; but after awhile the incessant clamor for sensational phenomena took such wide possession of the minds of multitudes that were ensued an era of sensationalism during which the work of healing was relegated to the background and doubtful manifestations occupied the stage to such an extent that tricksters multiplied, who assumed to possess mediumistic gifts of the most amazing nature, and many humiliating experiences followed. During that critical and storm-tossed period in the history of Spiritualism the movement known as Christian Science arose, and many other movements came to the front, more or less similar to that inaugurated by Mrs. Eddy, which attracted wide attention on account of the stress laid on healing as a matter of central and supreme importance.

Many defections from the ranks of Spiritualists occurred in consequence of these causes, and the Spiritualistic movement sustained a temporary setback, for no cause can truly flourish if it allows the most practical and beneficent feature of its ministry to fall into comparitive oblivion. Healing Mediumship never faded entirely out; there were always psychics operating both in public and in private who demonstrated the power of the spirit to vanquish ailments both of mind and body; but only in rare instances have Spiritualists in recent years brought healing mediumship to the front as it was brought in the days of the famous healer, Newton, a record of whose marvellous work is preserved in a book entitled, "The Modern Bethesda," published many years ago in New York.

This marvellous healer always claimed to be a medium, and he declared from first to last that the power of the spirit working thru him derived directly from the operation of his "guides," who, when on earth, were active in the same sort of ministry, and unhesitatingly declared that there were no accounts of healing contained in any ancient Scripture which might not be duplicated in the present day. In this contention he was clearly logical and right, and his own stupendous work abundantly sustained his claim.

It may well be asked, however, whether it is not an error to attribute the gift of healing to the action of individual human spirits, seeing that the power that heals may be rightly regarded as an indwelling spiritual force possessable by every human being and therefore exercisable by any one who acknowledges it faithfully, without having recourse to any extraneous individuals. This subject deserves careful consideration and cannot be lightly dismissed as it is a theme of great importance. We may fairly take an intelligible middle ground, between extreme positions by calling attention to that law of spiritual co-operation which is incessantly in action whether we know it or know it not.

Nothing can be more self-evident than that the law of human existence necessitates inter action between human entities. We are not born without parents, nor do we live and thrive as we grow up as isolated entities. All our joys and sorrows, banes and blessings are interactive, so that much of the health of one is the boon of all and the sickness of one is a menace to all. Every sanitary regulation is based on this admission and, without accepting this proposition, no one could feel justified in prescribing any regulations for public conduct. Now, while it sounds well to say that we as individuals are sufficient unto ourselves,—or if we are religiously inclined, to boast of our dependence solely on Deity,—we do not find that the facts of our existence bear out these claims at all fully, for no matter what our creed or school of thought and practice may be, we all give evidence that we are far more interdependent than independent. It is impossible to point to a single denomination of peculiar people who claim that their dependence is entirely upon the Divine Spirit working directly thru them, without noticing that they have healers and teachers among them and that they make a great deal of special ministrations of specially appointed or selected persons. All sorts of explanations may be offered to account for this seeming inconsistency, but it nevertheless obtains, and nowhere more prominently than among Christian Scientists who repudiate healing mediumship and claim that it is only thru acknowledgment of truth, and trust in its potency to produce perfectly healthy results in the body of one who trusts in its efficiency unfalteringly, that healing can be accomplished.

The practitioner is always a medium in one sense if not in another, and it is not difficult to realize how probable it is, in many instances, that some afflicted person is helped by an unseen instead of by a physically visible helper. When we have entirely got away from the lingering superstition that our comrades who have passed from mortal sight have been removed from the field of human activity we shall not regard mediumistic experiences as radically different from ordinary occurrences of like nature between persons all now enrobed in flesh. Absent healing, a topic now discussed widely among all interested in mental therapeutics or psycho-therapy, throws unlimited light upon the problem of healing mediumship and so far simplifies the subject as to render it immediately intelligible. Spiritualists of a generation or two ago usually spoke and acted as tho they could derive help from those commonly called "departed," but not from each other still on earth. Many mental scientists have insisted, and done much to prove, that we can help each other mentally here and now in a psychic manner, but they have ignored,—and in some cases even undertaken to deny,—that we can receive equal help from those who have "shuffled off this mortal coil." A wise position, commending itself to a rapidly increasing number of open-minded thinkers, is that we can and do give and receive benefit in both of these seemingly distinct, but in reality closely identified relationships. A true healer must always be an educator, for unless a patient is taught something concerning the law of health which must be observed after an ailment has been conquered, a relapse is very likely to ensue. It is precisely at this point that a distinction must be clearly drawn between a competent healer and one who is simply a magnetizer. Far too much stress has often been laid upon "animal magnetism" among persons who have claimed to be "healing mediums,"and for that reason spiritual healing was largely overlooked by Spiritualists at a time when Christian Scientists and others were making strenuous efforts to convince the public that this much over-estimated animal magnetism was a source of danger, not of benefit to humanity. Much of the controversy is now practically over because general enlightenment regarding healing processes is far more extensive than it was even a few years ago; but there is still much need for a clear discrimination between the impartation of personal magnetism and the direct operation of spiritual force, utilizing the personality of a medium in the conveyance of healing potency from the higher spiritual realms, for the relief of the afflicted. It stands to reason that if animal magnetism is the prime requisite for healing, all confidence in spiritual intelligence may be largely discounted, for in that case a healthy physique, and probably some idea of how to manipulate the body, would constitute the essential qualifications of a competent healer. That animal magnetism has its proper place and use we gladly admit, and we could never think of using so disagreeable a phrase as "malicious animal magnetism" unless it were proved that a magnetizer was actuated by malicious intent and sought to employ some method of magnetizing to accomplish a nefarious end. When good-natured persons make passes over sick persons with the hope of relieving them from suffering, no thought of malice can possibly enter in, and it is indeed often true that benevolent unseen helpers co-operate with these magnetizers and enable them to accomplish much greater good than would otherwise be achievable. It is on account of this fact that physical manipulation has become so greatly intermingled with genuine spiritual healing, and it must be remembered that a physical performance such as "making passes" over the body does not prevent spiritual healing from taking place, tho in frequent instances the power of the spirit is more convincingly displayed when there is no admixture of physical manipulation. It is easy to understand that a strong healthy man or woman possessed of a superabundance of physical vitality should be able to impart some of this surplus by laying on of hands, and it is equally easy to comprehend how a benevolent band of spiritual entities, purposefully working to heal the sick, should co-operate with such well-meaning magnetizer who is very likely a good physical medium, knowingly or unknowingly.

But giving all credit that is due to physical methods of a rational order, we can readily see how extremely limited must be the field of action of all healers who depend exclusively upon physical contact with their patients. Owing to a desire to greatly enlarge the field of beneficent activity, recourse has often been had to the magnetizing of paper, linen, flannel, etc., and sending these magnetized articles to sufferers at a distance from the home of the magnetizer. There has arisen the claim that such things afford links not only between healer and patient in the strictly physical sense, but also in a definitely psychical manner, and in addition to the general theory of psychometry has been established the statement that healing spirits employ these magnetized articles as means of connection between themselves and the invalids who are often greatly helped by employing these peculiar agencies. It is impossible to deny that these methods are very ancient, and equally impossible to prove them valueless; however, they are not so necessary in all cases as some persons have supposed. In the New Testament many references are made (especially in the Acts of the Apostles) to practices in vogue in the earliest Christian century, which were by no means original with Christianity. Among the most conspicuous of these is the story of articles of wearing apparel taken from the body of apostles and placed on sick people for the purpose of their recovery. This usage carries us back to Greece and Egypt, and reminds us of the practices of the Therapeutae from whom we derive our much-employed word therapeutics. That there is a very close connection between ancient and modern healing methods cannot be questioned by students of healing ministries thru a period of at least 3000 years, and as spirit-communion is a fact in Nature and cannot be confined to any special clime or race, it reasonably follows that healing mediumship has been practiced consciously and unconsciously all over the world and in all ages. The fact that one may be ignorant of spiritual collaboration by no means disproves its reality. It is at this point that Spiritualists often display less intelligent appreciation of an existing situation than might be rightfully expected of avowed students of the philosophy of psychical intercommunication. It is not so much what we believe as what we love; not so much what we know as what we desire to accomplish, that links us with unseen helpers; it therefore follows that clairvoyant testimony is often given to spiritual co-operation which may take place without any knowledge on the part of the healer who intellectually disowns it because it has never been proved to his satisfaction.

Many physicians are kind-hearted men and women who seek to do their utmost to relieve the distress of all who apply to them for aid. Many of these doctors are entirely agnostic in their thought so far as spiritual agencies are concerned, and they say frankly that they know nothing about spiritual helpers in the work of their profession. We can readily accept their asservations at face value; but ignorance on the mundane side does not imply equal ignorance on the psychical side of our existence, and it is never true that simple ignorance of the spirit world proves lack of co-operation therewith. We will take a typical example: A doctor who is mediumistic, but knows it not, is doing his or her utmost to overcome a painful or obstinate ailment in a patient who is also more sensitive than he knows. All that appears on the outer plane is that two persons are together in the relation of healer and patient, but a clairvoyant may see others also, because the spirit-associates of both doctor and patient are interesting themselves in the case and doing their utmost to help in the good work attempted. It often happens that persons are helped in mysterious ways that they cannot adequately explain by reference to any or all of the knowledge at their outward disposal. In such instances we hear vaguely of the operation of "the healing force in Nature," but no intelligible explanation is forthcoming as to the nature of that healing energy nor of the method of its operation. It is acknowledged to exist and operate, but it remains mysterious. We often hear of "suggestion," an extremely comprehensive word often adorned with many prefixes, such as "auto," "heter," etc., but to employ academic terminology is not to explain any vital process adequately, for at the utmost such use of language can only provoke desire for fuller information on the part of an enquiring public. Suggestion is not an end in itself, but it is a powerful means to an end in many instances, and it has its place in healing mediumship indubitably. The healing medium may be (and often is) an illiterate person, sometimes even an untutored child, but that makes no difference from a spiritual standpoint, because only sensitiveness of organization, and freedom from psychical obstructions, is necessary to the expression of any phase of mediumship. The question becomes rather more difficult to handle when prescriptions are given purporting to emanate from "Indian Guides," who have figured very largely among healing mediums in America, on account of medical legislation ruling that no one must practice medicine without a license. Spiritualists have often fought against medical monopoly on the ground of its unconstitutional character and many patients have testified gratefully to their rescuance from painful maladies thru the good offices of mediumistic persons who have been arrested for daring to do good to their suffering neighbors without bowing before the Moloch of medical tyranny. But even should it be found illegal to prescribe herb tea unless one is the proud possessor of a diploma or certificate from some acknowledged medical college, the work of the spiritual healer cannot be interrupted by any legislation whatever, for it can be carried forward silently or thru the agency of music, and in numerous other ways into which the practice of medicine and surgery does not and cannot enter. It is feasible to insist that no one should administer drugs or perform operations without having become duly qualified, but happily, healing mediumship does not consist in giving drugs, or in using surgical instruments, for it is an efficient substitute for those often barbarous practices. When a bone is fractured or a joint dislocated, a competent surgeon is the proper person to correct the misplacement or repair the damage, no matter whether that qualified anatomist has graduated from a special school or not; but in the multitude of nervous cases which are now prevalent healing mediumship often proves an all-efficient panacea after medical treatment has been weighed in the balance of bitter experiences and found lamentably wanting.

The old question in Macbeth: "Can'st thou minister to a mind diseased?" may well be put to the healing medium, and it is often answered fully in the affirmative. Shakespeare told us of a good doctor declaring that in this each one must minister to himself, and such is indeed true, but just as a physician may administer medicine; but the patient must take it,—and the same with advice if it is to prove of any service,—so in the field of psychic healing there is much for a patient to do in changing the current of his own thoughts and treading henceforth along a new mental pathway marked out by the competent and kindly healer.

It is never denied, so far as we know, in any medical or other circles, that many deep-seated and long-standing disorders are undeniably traced to some "rooted sorrow" which no drug or scalpel can remove. It is often only thru the ministrations of mediumship that this grief can be assuaged, and therefore without any reference to magnetic passes, or aught else external, mediumistic persons may minister in ways unique and competent. Bereavement is frequently followed by a general lowering of the tone of vitality in the bereaved person, and the sorrow occasioned by an actual physical dissolution is greatly augmented by the dense materialism of relatives and friends and the odious unsanitary habit of "going into mourning." A dense veil of sorrow encompasses the grief-stricken sufferer, which no magnetism and no medicine can dissolve. It certainly sometimes happens that a little strength is given by a vigorous manipulator and sleep is sometimes induced by mental suggestion; but despite this alleviation of distress, the root of the matter remains untouched in the case of keenly sensitive and tenderly affectionate natures. Persons of somewhat callous feeling and usually exuberant temperament may "get over" bereavements easily and quickly, but the tender-hearted and less buoyant suffer immensely and oftener grieve more in silence than aloud. It is this silent brooding sorrow that undermines health and eventually breaks down a constitution beyond recovery. The healing medium, in consequence of mediumship, can and often does so far alleviate this pitiful distress as to restore the sufferer from grief to health and buoyancy; indeed numerous are the cases which have been so successfully dealt with spiritually that a new lease of life has actually been taken and the person helped has gone forward to the enjoyment of a fuller, happier and far more useful life than he or she was capable of living before the affliction came, which was turned into a blessing thru spiritual ministrations.

Healing mediumship is no rival of anything else; it is an infusive and diffusive influence working thru all honorable and useful agencies. A healing medium need not be a person exclusively devoted to a special work apart from common industries, for very often the most successful healing is accomplished thru very ordinary channels.

As music is extremely popular, and it is now brought within the reach of almost everyone, we deem it of great importance to insist that lovers of music who can also display some renditional ability should consecrate their beautiful gift more largely to the direct work of healing than has yet been widely attempted. Mechanical music may answer well enough for simple entertainment and even a victrola may be pressed into healing service by a discriminating selector of records who purposefully choses certain selections because of their helpful vibratory suggestiveness. But it is the human voice in song, even more than in speech, which can become a powerful healing agent, for thru this medium the inner breath (prana) can be conveyed thru the instrumentality of outer breathing and it is pranic energy which vitalizes and tranquilizes as nothing external ever can. As our unseen helpers are ever ready to co-operate with us in every benevolent undertaking, we never need to invoke kindly spiritual beings as tho it were difficult to get in touch with them, as tho they needed persuading to lend us their kindly and efficient aid; for they are ever ready and always within call. It is by quiet confidence, coupled with sincere desire to be of real service, that we mingle our aspirations with the intentions of the hosts of light, and as we grow more and more nearly universal in our desire and determination to bless humanity we shall become increasingly aware of the law of spiritual co-operation and acknowledge our true fellowship relation with those in spiritual spheres whose special mission it is to lead incarnate humanity out of the paths of error, and its consequent suffering, along the highway of health and peace, which is the road of righteousness.

LESSON VIII.

The Law and Gift of Prophecy—Its Nature And Exercise

Among the nine gifts of the Spirit enumerated in the 12th chapter of the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians we find Prophecy extolled above all others. In the 14th chapter of the same epistle the apostolic writer gives his reason for thus exalting prophecy when he declares that it edifies the entire Holy Assembly. The Church referred to so frequently in the New Testament is unquestionably a spiritually federated company of enlightened individuals who form a mystical corporation called the Body of Christ, in which all the members are united by a bond of common fellowship, pursuing the same high ideals and unitedly conscious of their work as world-enlighteners. Among these variously illumined men, women and children, various gifts and endowments are displayed, all emanating from the same Divine Source, called the One Spirit.

None of these qualifications could be dispensed with, for all are necessary to the upbuilding of the entire Spiritual community and the proper discharge of the manifold functions of such an organization. But tho all are necessary to the completeness of the organism, which is a perfect Human Body consisting of members and organs, each fulfilling an appointed end of predetermined service, and no member can rightfully despise another, all being honorable and useful, still the rank of Prophet is in a sense higher than that of any other type or member. We know full well that we can sustain physical existence personally, and do fairly efficient work along many lines, tho deprived of such serviceable members as hands and feet and even of eyes, but brain and heart are indispensable to continued existence, and if these organs were removed it could not be easy to replace them by artificial substitutes, even tho surgery were to make such extraordinary progress as to introduce artificial heart and brain, which now appears highly improbable. A sense of relative importance is never inconsistent with due appreciation of every part of our complex human mechanism. In like manner we are justified in esteeming some spiritual gifts or endowments as more nearly indispensable to human welfare than are others.

But if Prophecy be placed in so exalted a position as to tower above all other gifts in an illumined fellowship, we ought to clearly understand what this Prophecy is and what are the special functions of a true prophet or prophetess. Seership is the other name of prophecy, therefore seers and seeresses are the same as prophets and prophetesses. There are at least four distinct kinds of vision, or four attitudes of vision, two of which are common to ordinary persons at all times and everywhere, and two of which are specially characteristic of those who exercise the gift or power of prophecy. Our two common everyday visual attitudes are, as we well know, looking outward and looking backward; for we all exercise the faculty of exterior observation more or less perfectly, and we all employ memory in some greater or lesser measure. The prophet is one who turns his gaze inward rather than outward and forward instead of backward, thereby becoming possessed of kinds of information to which non-prophetic persons are perforce strangers.

To the four attitudes of vision already enumerated and described we may well add a fifth, viz, looking upward and looking downward. The ordinary person may be said to usually look in three directions—outward, backward and downward. The prophet also looks in three directions—inward, forward and upward. "I will lift up my eyes to the hills whence cometh my help," is figuratively and literally suggestive of the prophetic attitude, for we do, in every sense, derive far more inspiration and enlightenment by upward than by downward gazing. The prophets are also spoken of as retiring into quiet and retired places.

"In the mount" is a Biblical phrase descriptive of the position of Moses at a time when he received the plan for the erection of the Temple of Solomon, which typifies a truly federated humanity. Elijah enters into a cave or cleft of a rock and in serene retirement from the outer world receives information concerning spiritual realities otherwise unattainable. The great prophets or prophetesses of ancient Israel, like their early Christian successors, were all accustomed, according to the narratives in our possession, to betake themselves to sequestered places and there listen to a Voice heard only in silence.

It is not incorrect to identify bards or poets with prophets, for almost all the finest and most illuminating prophetic utterances extant are practically poetry. Not necessarily do prophets prophecy in rhyme or in stately blank verse, but they employ similitudes which are as true for all periods as for the particular time when the words are spoken.

Edwin Markham, himself a noble poet, pays sublime tribute to the great messages which the world's inspired and inspiring bards have given to all ages, and these heroic poets have proved prophets always in the fullest meaning of the term. We are all familiar with Robert Browning's splendid line in Abt Vogler, " 'Tis We Musicians Know." By the word musician in that connection he unquestionably implies poet-prophets, who may indeed be gracefully styled "sweet singers in Israel."

To the vulgar mind a prophet is a curious somewhat uncanny person who doles out more or less vague and terrifying predictions of disasters about to befall communities and individuals. The amount of pessimistic rubbish mistaken for prophecy is enough to justify unenlightened persons when they sneer at prophecy altogether and point to the masses of unfulfilled predictions which have caused mischievous dread in the minds of numerous timid and credulous individuals. If such prophets were only placed in popular esteem where they rightfully belong in the Frog Ministry (vide Rev. XVI), their gruesome utterances would not cause the needless alarm and mental suffering they often occasion, but there seems to be a fixed tendency in many perverted minds to credit as true, or at least as highly probable, whatever is calamitous, and from that unreasonable cause springs the misplaced confidence placed in false prophets who are often only intensely hysterical and not intentionally deceptive.

We read a great many prophecies made by sensational neurotics which are never fulfilled. Dates were set for earthquakes and other terrible calamities to occur in California during February, 1914, but the month passed without any of these terrors eventuating. It is never safe or wise to look forward to calamities unless we can be morally certain that there is some more solid foundation for a prediction than the excited phantasy of a highly emotional sensitive giving way to a disposition to cater to a popular love of the fright-inspiring.

A true prophet is a seer or seeress who possesses the penetrative insight that sees thru outward semblances and discerns what can never meet the casual eye. There is undoubtedly a fixed relation between cause and effects that can never be interfered with, and it is only thru fuller than ordinary acquaintance with this unchanging order that genuine prophecies can be made. There are distinctly two varieties of prophets, each genuine and valuable, classifiable under the following heads: (1) Prophets who are such by virtue of their own enlightened perceptiveness; (2) Prophetic mediums who are not prophets themselves but instruments thru which prophetic utterances can be given.

In the first of these categories we must place those who deserve to be styled Adepts or Initiates. In the second rank we must place honest susceptible persons who receive and transmit information they are incapable of discovering at firsthand.

Modern philosophy is rapidly throwing off all materialistic incubi and addressing itself fearlessly and dispassionately to problems of Psychical Research. The obvious result of this excellent trend to philosophical study is to awaken public interest in the reality of a larger world than that discoverable by the unsupplemented findings of our five bodily senses as commonly restricted.

The Astral Realm is now a term becoming so familiar to general readers of literature bordering on the Theosophical or occult, that we are beginning to find a large public ready to appreciate references to this inner and larger realm of matter, for it is a material realm in the broader sense in which we may legitimately speak of matter, tho not in the foolishly narrow sense in which the word has long been ignorantly confined. The realm of thought and imagination is the kingdom of the spirit which creates forms in subtler matter before they can be translated into grosser matter, and thus fully "materialized" before objective carnal vision. A seer can behold a thought-form or mentoid as clearly as a person with ordinary physical sight can see an external object on the plane of physical ultimatum. Now, one kind of true prophecy, tho not the highest, is due to observation of what has already occurred on the astral plane, or is now occurring there, and will eventually be duplicated or represented in the field of grossest material activity. All growth is from within outward. Imagination is the formative faculty without which no inventor could devise a plan for future physical outcarrying. An inventor is in a very true sense a prophet, for he actually foresees and foretells what will subsequently be externalized, and his dreams come actually true. "The stuff that dreams are made of" needs further analysis and, as we proceed with our analysis we frequently discover that dreams are often so prophetic that we have seen every detail of an event on the astral plane prior to its fulfillment on the physical. A misconception of the relation between the astral and physical realms has led to a fatalistic perversion of the idea of prophecy; it having often been taught that we are either slaves to blind necessitiy or else compelled to carry out the will of superior intelligences without our own volition, when in reality this stupendous false doctrine has been built upon a primal misconception regarding the priority of mental creations and the subsequence of physical results.

A prophet may clearly see that seed has already been sown in a plot of earth which gives no outward indications of such impregnation, therefore it looks as tho some blind necessity or arbitrary fate were working if a certain harvest springs up exactly when and where the seer predicated it would appear. But the intelligent prophet, or any thoughtful person familiar with a reasonable view of prophecy, knows that insight in that case, and accurate calculation from cause to effect, led to the prediction being fulfilled. On the mental plane, and in the field of all our spiritual activities, precisely the same rule holds good. If a certain cause inevitably leads onward to a certain effect, then it is for the prophet to tell what must be the outcome of cause already set in motion. Life, then, becomes far more rational and far more under our volitional control than tho we remained ignorant of this law of sequence. Prophets, far from being merely fortune tellers or prognosticators of future events, are exhorters unto righteousness and the most practical and useful of all our various groups of teachers. To the unthinking and unreasoning man or woman life is a game of chance or else a dire necessity at every turn. Health and sickness, joy and sorrow, success and failure, all seem to be portioned out to each one of us in such a manner that we can only take whatever comes and submit to the inevitable. Stoicism is regarded by many persons today as the summit of philosophy, but it is far from being a superlative even when optimistic in its final implications.

The doctrine of Karma, now so much discussed, lends itself either to Fatalism or to an acceptance of the purer doctrine we will call Prophetism, according to the side from which it is approached. Prophets with their clear interior vision may be able to read much that is veiled from ordinary eyes, therefore they may be competent to assign causes for present effects which lie beyond all common ranges in vision. We may have come into the world with certain predispositions which we cannot help meeting, no matter how valiantly we may confront them, therefore they may constitute a portion of our now inevitable Karma. But a true prophetic ministry teaches us how to handle these limitations and seeming drawbacks in such a way as to transmute apparent curses into actual blessings, and this can never be done without combined resolution and knowledge. If a prophet speaks to the edification of the entire Church, then we can only be edified by making practical use of prophetic exhortations. It seems impossible to overate the importance of the prophetic gift when once we regard it as an all-including ability to peer below all external surfaces and penetrate into the veritable arcanum of the immemorial Mysteries. The Mysteries are so often referred to in the various Epistles, and initiation into them was once so highly esteemed, that it seems incredible that the exterior church should have so utterly repudiated them as to have lost sight of their very existence except to the extent of having preserved some account of them as pertaining to abandoned usages peculiar to departed centuries.

The essential difference between priests and prophets is never difficult to comprehend, for the simple reason that a priesthood is always bound by the laws of its constitution to follow a prescribed path alike in doctrine and in ritual. Prophetic ministries are apt to give great trouble to any conservative organization if they are exercised within any such enclosure, because no one can hold a prophet to established precedent, or compel a prophetic utterance to conform to any established order.

In the primitive Christian church the prophets held a position similar to that held by the Oracles in the pre-Christian centuries and tho' there were often unpleasant exhibitions of lawlessness among prophets who exercised no wise restraint over their emotions, in all cases where prophets were well balanced persons there was no confusion. There are in these days frequent outbursts of prophecying among bodies of people whose ecclesiastical organization is somewhat free and easy, and tho' many of the predictions made by seemingly irresponsible persons are not completely verified, there is almost always a substratum of verity to make it well worth while to examine the predictions with a view to sifting out, from much that may be termed alloy, the precious metal which inheres.

We could not obey the wise apostolic injunction, "Prove all things and hold fast that which is good," were we either to blindly accept or blindly reject the many words of doubtful testimony which are often brought to our eyes and ears, however we may be situated, and it is exactly at this point that we need to rid our minds completely of the insane delusion that because some prophecies are unfulfilled, therefore all coming thru the same channel must be equally foundationless.

Vision on the psychic plane, or in the astral realm, is usually imperfect, except in the case of seers, whose seership is phenomenally acute and whose general mode of life is conducive to the unfettered exercise of prophetical endowments. Mal-observation must never be confounded with wilful falsification, for it is an error that can be corrected by improved ways of living and by the practice of complete consecration to an acceptable ministry. The oracles connected with the Greek temples, at a time when Greece was enjoying the full splendor of her highest achievements, devoted their lives entirely to their prophetic work during the period given over to this special ministry. Oracles were not consultable by every passerby who chose for a small monetary consideration to invade the privacy of the seer and have a "sitting" with the oracle. So carefully guarded were these super-sensitive youths and maidens, who were esteemed far more highly than it is customary to esteem exceptionally endowed individuals today, that it was considered a rare privilege to be permitted to interview any one of them. Modern societies for Psychical Research have endeavored to some considerable extent to follow this ancient usage, therefore when a sensitive has been selected for investigative persons she has been secluded from the general public and interviews with her have been impossible to obtain without a special passport from the officers of the society under whose auspices she has been operating. There is much to be said in favor of this seclusiveness, which appeals far more readily to the scientific than to the common mind, because all scientific explorers know how vitally essential to success along all lines of research are necessary conditions. But if one is only a superficial scientist aware of necessary physical conditions, but no more, the subtler aspects of necessary conditions are perforce unheeded. It is in the mental realm, in the field of thought and emotion, that conditions are far more important than on the simply physical plane of demonstration; consequently tho' all outward circumstances favor the best results, some inward perturbation often suffices to prevent any exhibition or lucidity on the part of a sensitive seeress whose interior condition must be peaceful in order that any picture can be successfully thrown upon the astral screen, which is the field of her psychic vision. Indistinct or confused vision is the greatest drawback to prophetic lucidity regardless of whether the form of prophecy be thru vision or thru voice; for the voices heard and the objects perceived with the eye and ear of the inner body can only be corrected and detected and differentiated when the auric belt or atmosphere of the prophet is like unto "a sea of glass." We all know how painful and excited feelings cause a sense of flutter in the region of the solar plexus, which may spread thru the entire body and occasion severe distress in many directions if not quickly mastered. To the vision of a seer this physical disturbance is held as originating in an upset state of the auric envelope or belt which surrounds every one of us and which is a sort of photosphere in which the objects of the psychic realm can be reflected. Very often a prophet speaks of reading characters distinctly traced upon a "flying scroll," and it is by no means uncommon for sensitive persons to see words and shapes clearly outlined on the palimpsest of the atmosphere.

Why should it be thought unreasonable in these days of earnest and world-wide enquiry into psychic mysteries to plead for a School of the Prophets and to demand that opportunities be given for the development of a prophetic ministry to meet the loudly crying needs of these greatly agitated times? Training schools for ministers of religion, like schools for physicians and lawyers, furnish external information derivable from study of literature, sometimes coupled with physical experimentation; but the psychic faculty, without which there can be no qualification for the prophetic office, is not developed, but rather is it often repressed and stultified by collegiate exercises. University graduates are not as a rule, in any sense prophetic; they are apt to be intellectually rigid and confined within narrow conventionalized limits of mental action, incapacitated rather than assisted by their formal training to act as prophets. Apostolic succession is claimed by the external Church as its perpetual heritage, but there is very little proof that the claim has any sure foundation, because the gifts of the Spirit which accompanied the apostles of old seem almost entirely absent in their alleged successors. "Even so persecuted they the Prophets (not priests) who were before you," is an eye-opening text usually read with closed eyelids. Sacerdotalism smothers prophecy; for that reason there is an outcry today against that oppressive externalism which has been the chief bane of institutionalized Christianity, certainly since the days of Constantine who secularized religion without spiritualizing the nations.

Judaism, and indeed all the great religious systems of the world, have been so deeply immersed in formalism that the voice of prophecy is rarely heard within any dignified temple walls. It is outside the temples and among the unchurched that the gifts of the Spirit today stand the best chance of ready heeding. No society or stilted organization of any kind proves a favorable field for prophetic ministries, because prophets can never be held within traces, and there is good reason why there should not be palings placed around their fiery ministry. Pioneers cannot be followers of conventions. Setters of new systems cannot be slaves to old customs, and it is pre-eminently the work of the prophet to blaze a fresh trail and lead a people out of bondage into a new and better pasture-field.

If prophets are not heard their utterances cannot be fairly judged, and tho' it is the height of folly to accept as infallibly accurate and authoritative all prophetic utterances, it is fair and reasonable whenever a spiritual gift shows itself in any person to allow that gift such freedom of expression that we may have the opportunity to derive from its unfettered exercise whatever it may be able to bestow for our enlightenment. Make no claims for the source whence information flows. Simply let the utterances flow and allow subsequent occurrances to prove how far the predictions have been justified. Such is the sane and sober rule to follow in regard to predictive utterances in general. Special manifestations of unusual character may, of course, call for special consideration, and particular cases may demand special treatment, but of these we cannot speak or write definitely in lessons intended only for general helpfulness.

LESSON IX

Mediumship and Moral Character

The ever recurring question of the relation between mediumship and moral character is one that cannot be disposed of anything like so easily as at first sight might appear. To quote the old adages, "Birds of a feather flock together" and "Like attracts like," is by no means to dispose of the inquiry satisfactorily, for tho' both those sayings contain a vast amount of general truth, they do not by any means answer the oft-repeated query as to why it is that very often a medium whose mediumship is unmistakably genuine in the main is addicted to immoral practices and is often a person whose general character is below rather than above an average standard of respectability.

By making this statement we do not intend to endorse the utterly false indictment sometimes brought against mediums as a distinctive class of persons, notorious for flagrant immoralities, for such they certainly are not. But tho' many mediums are persons of pure life and noble aspirations, it cannot be denied that others are very much the reverse, and it often happens that entirely satisfactory evidences of mediumship are furnished by the immoral as well as by the moral sensitive.

To consider this topic fairly, it is essential that we admit at the outset that mediumship is not necessarily a reward of virtue any more than it is a penalty of vice. A medium is often merely an unusually sensitive child, highly impressionable, who sees, hears and feels a great deal more than does the average child; therefore this particular child seems to belong in a class alone and is often grievously maltreated by ignorant adults and by other children who can only see queerness or oddity in their singular associate. As such child grows up, this sensitiveness sometimes diminishes, but sometimes increases, and when it increases, if opportunity favors, its possessor becomes known as a medium and often enters upon a professional mediumship career. There is no more need for morality to induce this simply natural mediumship than to constitute some one a musician or a poet, and we know from history, and also from contemporary proof, that musicians and poets are not necessarily either highly moral or definitely immoral any more than a special degree of morality or immorality is connected with the possession of mechanical skill or oratorical ability. Natural sensitiveness and special characteristic endowments do not pertain to the domain of ethics, therefore it must follow that persons who view everything from a solely ethical viewpoint encounter much that bewilders and distresses them.

Sentimentalism is very prominent in many quarters, and much of it is so natural and proper that it must be treated with respect rather than with disdain. It is altogether natural for a son or daughter to feel reverence for a beloved and honored parent recently passed to spirit life, and it must entail a shock to sensitive feelings to be assured that a revered father or mother makes a communication to a child thru the instrumentality of a libertine, who may be at the time when the communication is made just recovering from a debauch, and it does not seem probable that such a channel of communication could be sought out by the parent in question seeking communion with son or daughter. But, reasonable tho this inference unquestionably is, there are two or more sides to this great question of mediumship, not merely the single thought of mutual congeniality between spirit and medium. It is not always that a spirit has large choice of mediumistic channels to select from, and as the spirit accompanies the person seeking communication to the house of the medium in a majority of instances, and the medium, if a clairvoyant, often simply describes that spirit to the sitter, and if a clairvoyant hears and conveys a message, there is far less psychic association between spirit and medium in such cases than is superficially supposed.

It is not the medium, but the sitter in probably 99 instances out of an average 100 who attracts the spirit, and the claim is not frequently made that someone's particularly near and dear friends communicate thru a public medium, or even thru a priate sensitive, except when the one to whom the message is to be delivered is present. It is the sitter rather than the medium who generally attracts the spirits, consequently the moral condition of the sitter is a more influential factor by far than that of the medium, who is frequently only in a position analogous to that of a telegraphic operator or any messenger who conveys tidings from one individual to another. A person desiring to send a telegram or cablegram, or to have a letter conveyed from one house to another, is not necessarily personally attracted to any available medium of communication, but gladly avails himself of any means at disposal for accomplishing the end desired; and any fee that may be paid to a transmitter has nothing to do with any sentiment felt for the individual who performs the service, except in occasional instances. We do not doubt that a great deal of affection and congeniality often exists between spirits and the medium thru whom they work, but such affection usually is between mediums and their particular guides and constantly attendant spirits, not between them and any influence which may seek for the moment to make use of their instrumentality for conveying a message to a friend not mutual.

Broadly speaking, moral character has a great deal to do with the grades of unseen associates one usually keeps in touch with, therefore if we are discussing the question of the general relation between mediumship and morality, we can never regard it as unimportant to insist upon the highest possible moral standards, but we must avoid confounding one aspect of a general subject with another, for such confounding greatly embarrasses investigation and leads to many seriously bewildering misconceptions. When we leave the lower level of seemingly automatic mediumship and rise to contemplate spiritual associations voluntarily induced, the moral question looms large on our horizon and the mottoes quoted come into large requisition. Voluntary mediumship is determined very largely by one's aspirations, so much so that a person of chronically benevolent intent can never be made use of by unseen influences for mischief-making purposes, nor to advocate any form of treachery, cruelty or dishonesty, because in such cases the medium is surrounded by a wall of protecting aura which shuts out all influences of an unwelcome nature, while it opens the way for all such influx as comports with the established will of its generator. Simple lack of definitely established moral principle is far more common among sensitives than deliberate persistent immorality. That is why so many mediums are under such different influences at different times and in varying circumstances. From the days of the Fox Sisters (of 1848 celebrity) to the present hour, investigators of modern mediumship have confronted the serious problem of extreme sensitiveness rendering its possessor liable to be influenced by an immense variety of conflicting influences. Two of the Fox Sisters were extremely open to varying controls, while one of those remarkable girls seemed to possess throughout her earthly existence a much stronger individuality than either of her sisters.

Responsibility usually attaches far more to the consultant than to the medium when the former is a man or woman of decided individuality and the latter is a yielding sensitive, and when we take a circle into account, composed of a number of persons, several of whom are often strongly marked individuals, the responsibility of what occurs is far more justly laid at the door of the investigators than at that of the medium.

Many a time alcoholic stimulants have been given to an exhausted sensitive who should have received very different treatment, and because he or she began to acquire a taste for liquor after having received it frequently at the hands of "moral and highly respectable" investigators and in their own well-appointed homes and soon commenced to indulge promiscuously in that downward direction, the public, including the chief culprits, were loud in denunciation of the "vulgar, drunken, immoral medium."

The greater responsibility must always be higher up" rather than "lower down," and we maintain stoutly that a very large share of blame attaches to sitters which has been mercilessly hurled at mediums. The average investigator is neither a saint nor a hero, and while there are many honest, pure-minded consultors of mediums who may suffer in some degree from the previous demoralization of the sensitive they consult, in a wider sense it must be realized that the public gets in large measure whatever it demands. There is always a supply to meet an imperative and persistent demand, and no demand is louder or more perpetual than for information thru mediumistic channels pertaining to affairs which are not conducted by any means in accordance with the rules of strict morality.

"Keep away from mediums," is the stupid cry of the timorous and narrow-minded. "When you consult a medium take with you a pure intention and keep a level head," is good practical common sense advice. Whatever may be the pros and cons of some particular controverted case, it is now freely admitted by fair-minded investigators that all phases of mediumship are largely affected by the psychic atmosphere furnished by enquirers. There are a few highly positive individuals who are mediums, willingly and gladly, who are not highly influencable by miscellaneous surroundings, but they are the exceptions rather than the rule. William Thomas Stead was a famous example of voluntary mediumship, but he was in a very different position from that occupied by the medium who earns a living by receiving clients perpetually.

Tho the word, morals, is one of seemingly doubtful meaning, it should not be forgotten that one of the older meanings of the word, derived from the Latin morales, simply signifies manners, therefore much, that is considered moral at one time or in one country, is considered immoral at some other time or in some other locality.

We are often rash and unduly harsh in insisting upon conventional standards of alleged morality, which may not be able to stand the test of impartial judgment. A double standard of conduct, attempting to justify all manner of indiscretions in one sex which society refuses to tolerate in the other, may have no justification in a higher court of appeal than some average earthly tribunal where established precedent and musty tradition rule all decisions. Can the average man or woman be entirely sure that the accepted moral sanction of his particular nation or party are adjudged accurate in the spiritual world, where motive or intention must count for far more than mere conformity with arbitrary man-made standards?

Another point to be considered is the great diversity of opinion that exists in spirit-life, in the spheres adjoining the earth at least, concerning matters which are in constant dispute among incarnate legislators. When it is remembered that the average medium has no directly intimate or conscious contact with influences beyond the states which interpenetrate our earthly atmosphere we need not wonder that no special holiness is required on the part of a sensitive who acts as an intermediary between friends in and out of the flesh who are all living, as you, on a very ordinary plane of mental and moral development.

MEDIUMSHIP AND MORAL CHARACTER

Business mediumship is very popular, for we all know how largely sought after are these clairvoyants and others who make a specialty of dealing with purely mundane matters. It may not be generally wise to seek counsel of the spirit-world in ordinary business transactions, but we know how numerous are the applicants for this sort of information, and it stands to reason that judging by the questions asked and the information given, the moral tone of the questioner and of the communicating intelligences is neither higher nor lower than that commonly prevailing in commercial circles. There is an ordinary business morality neither very high nor very low, which can be carried over into the earthbound sphere of the spirit-world in which multitudes of the undeparted (miscalled departed) are still living, and it is from these unprogressed, undeveloped influences that the great bulk of simply business messages are received.

Viewing this question sanely and soberly, without partiality of any sort, we reach the inevitable conclusion that physical disbodiment can never transform character. It has been said repeatedly by thoughtful preachers in various churches that we have no warrant for supposing that the average individual a few days or weeks after quitting the mortal frame is, in character, any different from what he was previously, and we all know that usually persons of fixed habits have an established moral code centered in their inner consciousness from which they never wish to deviate. This inner conviction regarding right and wrong differs very largely with different individuals who may be living side by side and whose outward conduct appears all of a piece.

In spirit-life there is no immediate change of disposition, or even of belief, but there is usually a great and speedy throwing off of any mask or disguise that may have been worn on earth. It is on that account that so many people believe persistently that death transforms character when it only removes a veil which formerly concealed character. We are by no means discountenancing legitimate business mediumship, for we have no sympathy whatever with the sanctimonious absurdity that leads people to refer to all business affairs as tho they were necessarily either positively dishonorable, or at the very best conducted on too low a moral plane to render it permissable for us to ask the assistance of our spirit-friends in the conduct of worldly affairs. There are indeed two sides to this great question, and while one side seemingly exalts our idea of our friends who have "crossed the border," the other side suggests so degrading a view of necessary business as to discourage young persons embarking on a commercial career from setting before themselves a high or even a decent moral standard.

Morality ought not to be regarded as an exotic, a sort of rare blossom like an orchid in the floral kingdom that can only bloom in very exceptional conditions. Good morals should become a practical every-day asset, and instead of business being immoral and demoralizing it should be so conducted as to reflect credit upon all who engage in it.

Tho we admit, and indeed declare, that there are hosts of unseen influences of undeveloped, and even of perverted, moral tone with whom we can communicate if we so desire, and these respond to all desires to pervert mediumship to the fulfillment of some unrighteous end, we nevertheless most positively insist that when business questions are asked in a right spirit by sincere people they can and do enlist the attention of unseen helpers. It is often sentimentally objected that we should not disturb the rest of the departed, as tho the simple fact of laying aside a material garment introduced its former wearer into a state of profound repose or entitled him to some special reward. All these vain misleading superstitions need to be dismissed from our minds before we embark on the ocean of psychical research, together with all foolish suppositions regarding the special sanctity or awful depravity of the entities we encounter on the astral plane. It is becoming more and more fully demonstrated that a vast amount of spirit-communion is simply telepathy or mental telegraphy extended onto the post-mortem plane, therefore we are frequently functioning here and now psychically as we shall continue to function after we have laid aside our flesh.

Moral purposes certainly have much to do with regulating the class of influences with which we most intimately commune, but no more so when it comes to what is definitely designated mediumship than when we are handling the topic of voluntary associations in ordinary mundane ways. Between association and consociation there is a wide difference which we need to study deeply before we can solve the mediumistic problem. We associate perforce with many people in every-day life with whom we never feel inwardly acquainted, while we are spiritually consociated with many whom we rarely if ever meet in any externally associative manner. Tho' these widely separated words, association and consociation are seldom clearly defined, except by students of Swedenborg who never confound them, it is highly important that we interpret them to refer respectively to outward mingling brought about by the conditions of the social and business world (associations) and to those deep-seated feelings we instinctively entertain for those who are truly our spiritual kinsfolk, even tho outward circumstances rarely, if ever, throw us physically together (consociations). Swedenborg suggested the entire philosophy of psychic intercourse in the following famous sentence of only six words, "Thought gives presence; Love gives conjunction." Whatever we think about is in our mental presence, but only that which enlists our affections is in any vital way united with us. That is why it is that we often find it next to impossible to get into communication with certain individuals whom we saw a great deal constantly while they were on earth, while we are often made aware of the close and continued fellowship of some whose names convey no meaning to us, for we never knew them in any external manner. Mediumistic persons who are not under the necessity of making their living by their mediumship have much more freedom to choose their unseen associates than have those sensitives who are obliged to interview all callers. We admit that professional mediumship is legitimate, but it usually imposes many hardships on the medium, particularly if he or she is extremely sensitive. When one's work only calls for public ministrations the case is simpler, because descriptions can be given and communications read from the atmosphere by a keen sensitive without involving anything like "control," which is usually dangerous in miscellaneous circumstances. It is not possible for a thoroughly well fortified sensitive to be invaded by immoral influences, because there are no points of contact, but there is usually some weak place in one's moral armor and it is thru that aperture that undesirable influx enters.

The desire to please a client is often dangerous, because a mere desire to please is not entirely conscientious. Persons often derive great momentary pleasure from insincere flattery and from hearing what they like to hear whether it is true or false. Owing to this lack of sufficiently high moral principle a great many misleading statements are made, emanating from several sources contemporaneously. The desire of the sitter often assumes form on the astral atmosphere and indeed becomes an ensouled mentoid (thought-form) which a clairvoyant can plainly see and accurately describe. These thought-forms are often mistaken for visions of a more spiritual character and many persons gladly accept a description of these as veritable messages from spirit-friends. Then we often receive communications imperfectly, and there is a widespread tendency among imperfectly developed sensitives to guess on the basis of the little that is actually revealed. We must not overlook the patent fact that mediumistic persons are as a rule only ordinarily human, and we cannot rightfully expect from them a grade of moral excellence much higher than we are ready to supply. For too little thought and attention are given to the subtler aspects of the moral question, which included all that relates to interior affection and aspiration.

Conventional morality is usually so utterly external a consideration that it relates almost exclusively to words and acts, sometimes sincere and sometimes hypocritical, but outwardly the same whether inwardly sincere or insincere. In the psychic realm words are often unheard and actions unperceived but purposes and intentions are clearly visible, and these are considered the morals of the spiritual estate. If love is the universally attractive force, and congeniality of desire and sentiment form the abiding bases of spiritual inter-relatedness, how can we suppose that mere outward conformity to any set of social or other rules can be regarded in spirit-life as constituting morality?

Wherever rules are observed from conscientious motives, such obedience possesses moral character and evinces some real spiritual development; and on the other hand equally where certain social conventions are ignored because the ignorers believe them to be detrimental to human welfare, a higher moral standard is inwardly attained than where hypocrisy is practised. There can be no virtue in double-dealing or in secretly entertaining ideas and affections which we dare not outwardly express, for fear of offending "Mrs. Grundy." If we admit a spiritual basis of morality, we must agree that much that passes for moral conduct in earthly society cannot possibly pass muster in any spiritual realm. Tho it is never safe or honorable to glorify or to advocate transgression of moral codes established and maintained with a general view to the safeguarding of society, when we are dealing with psychic problems we are compelled to peer far below the level of surface morals and search for the instincts underlying words and actions. None of us are perfectly free from faults, therefore charity rather than censure should be our aim when endeavoring to estimate the moral worth of others. Kindly thoughts, pure desires, benevolent intentions are certain links to bind us closely in indissoluble union with those celestial companies in whose society and under whose guidance mediumship must ever prove a blessing, not a bane.

LESSON X.

Types and Varieties in Mediumship—What Determines this Variety

The question is frequently asked by students of the problem of variety in mediumship: What is it that determines and regulates this variety?

To answer this enquiry in anything like a satisfactory manner, one must take into account in the first place the simple fact of Temperament, and though a study of differing temperaments may never suffice to completely explain all we have to consider, it will assuredly go a long way in the desired direction.

Mediumship has been for many years roughly divided into certain easily definable categories, of which the two largest are Mental and Physical. By mental mediumship is generally meant all those phases, such as clairvoyance, inspirational oratory, and all that does not involve the movement of material articles without perceptible physical contact, or the employment of definitely material agents such as trumpets, for example, in the production of phenomena. Between these two easily definable types of mediumship there are many grades of semi-mental and semi-physical, such as automatic writing and much else that gives evidence of a joint employment of mental faculties and physical faculties.

It was long considered probable, if not certain, that a physical medium possessed an organism that lent itself readily to quick depletion and equally rapid recuperation, and many of the best verified experiments of leading scientists who have investigated physical manifestations have gone far to justify this assertion. Famous physical mediums of a departed generation, such as Daniel Douglas Home, Henry Slade, and others who gained world-wide celebrity and notoriety, were persons of powerful physique and of unusual mental temperament. They were, in many respects, very curious individuals, standing in an eccentric class by themselves, differing in some respects so widely from the general run of humanity as to appear often uncanny, therefore they called forth both admiration and hostility, they were loudly extolled and fiercely condemned, pronounced great benefactors of the race and also called frauds, impostors and everything else despicable and criminal. Now, it seems strange that such diametrically opposite views could have been taken by different persons of high intelligence after they had all interviewed and examined the claims of these marvelous physical mediums; but though much allowance must be made for prejudice and misrepresentation, amounting often to persecution, from which these peculiar persons often suffered bitterly, it must also be allowed that their upholders were not always entirely in the right nor were their denouncers always completely in the wrong.

We need not wonder that eccentricity of temperament and disposition characterizes a person thru whose agency the most uncommon phenomena occur; it would indeed be much stranger were it otherwise, for we might reasonably ask: How could a person be remarkably endowed with some rare ability, outwardly manifested thru a physical organism without possessing an organism in many ways differing from the accepted ordinary varieties?

Physical mediums have always been sensational as well as sensitive persons, and their conduct has often been exceedingly erratic, so much so as to cause all but purely scientific investigators to look with extreme disapproval upon much of their behaviour.

To the coldly dispassionate scientific observer every peculiarity is interesting as it affords a fresh opportunity for scientific research, but the strictly scientific cast of mind is rare, though extremely valuable, and all the more valuable, relatively speaking, on account of its rarity.

Many excellent treatises are extant setting forth the results of unimpassioned scientific research carried forward by Sir William Crookes, Professor Alfred Russel Wallace, and other highly distinguished scientists, during the 70's of the 19th century, and to those earlier works new testimonies of great value are being added by Sir Oliver Lodge and other eminent contemporary investigators.

In bygone days mediumship was much more to the front than it is at present, and the complaint has often been made that Home, Slade, Eglinton, and other marvelous physical mediums of the last century have had no adequate successors. There was a time when Materialization was so much in evidence and so widely discussed that a great many fraudulent persons simulated mediumship and many mediums were convicted of intermingling fraud with genuine phenomena. As these disagreeable occurrences are necessarily embarrassing and call forth popular indignation, it is not to be wondered at that physical mediumship passed under a heavy cloud and has been much discountenanced in many quarters, among professed Spiritualists as well as among outsiders; indeed Spiritualists have often been fiercer and more relentless in their attacks upon phenomena considered fraudulent than have any others except the most bitter opponents of mediumship in general among the public at large. It seems impossible to entirely eliminate fraud from mediumship so long as it prevails in the world at large, for mediums are among the most sensitive and impressionable of human beings, and when not endowed with an exceptionally high sense of honor they are more likely to succumb to surrounding influences, good, bad and indifferent, than are persons less exceptional. Physical mediumship has no necessary connection with good moral character or with the lack of it, for it results chiefly from a loosely constructed physical organism, from which a large amount of vital pabulum can be readily withdrawn and quickly replaced with much less difficulty than is ordinarily the case. The rigid experiments conducted by scientific examiners of the most startling physical phenomena have proved conclusively that the weight of a medium's body has been greatly reduced during the progress of a seance and restored to its usual amount very quickly after the phenomena had ceased. Sitters have also been heavily drawn upon in many instances to supply additional material for the production of phenomena; all going to prove that the unseen operating intelligences were making use of physical material gathered primarily from the medium and in lesser degree from others who were assisting at the seance. A physical medium who can supply this pabulum is a very interesting person from the scientific standpoint, and the fact of his being a curious individual in many ways does not in the least detract from his importance, seeing that it would be ridiculous to set him up on a moral pedestal and pronounce him a singularly holy person, when no such claim is made for him or by him.

There is a vast amount of sentimental cant floating about concerning the purity of life necessary to constitute one a good medium. With all due deference to moral character, which is of illimitable value from a truly spiritual standpoint, we must not drop into fanaticism and confound issues that widely differ. A good tailor is not necessarily a moral man, tho it is highly desirable that all tradesmen should be upright in all their dealings. The tailor's art is something apart from morality; it is a product of mechanical skill. Some children would easily make good tailors, while others would not, though all may be equal in respect of moral character. Now, when a physical phenomenon is produced, the intelligence behind the scenes has to employ material to weave into a temporary garment, because no spiritual entity without a physical body can exhibit its powers in a physical manner without recourse to appropriate material, and this must be supplied on the physical plane.

Now, just as there are scientific minds on earth specially devoted to proving facts scientifically, and these demonstrators are only desirous of obtaining the means for prosecuting their researches to a successful issue, so on the unseen planes there are many intelligences bent on demonstrating phenomena which shall conclusively prove the facts they are determining to make manifest. A physical medium may be (but need not be) coarse and illiterate and addicted to many undesirable habits and still prove useful for the purposes for which his temperament peculiarly adapts him. Such a person only needs to be understood to be appraised at his true value, which from the scientific viewpoint is very great.

In such a case it usually happens that the investigators have much more to do with the morale of the situation than has the medium, for they frequently serve as magnets to attract the manifesting entities, and it is according to their aspirations that they draw responses out of the unseen universe. Suspicion is the relentless foe of dispassionate investigation; a suspicious person is never a clear-eyed, but is rather a blear-eyed investigator. Perfect mental serenity, coupled with acute observation faculty, trained thru practised concentration solely upon one object at a time, contributes most of all to qualification for adequate investigation of phenomena. Nothing is more important than that a highly sensitive medium should be kept in an unruffled condition, for disturbances in the medium's atmosphere or auric zone are extremely detrimental to the production of convincing phenomena.

For physical manifestations, passivity on the part of medium and sitters is alike necessity, but this passivity can be as voluntary as any phase of activity, for we can all learn to make ourselves active and passive in self-regulated alteration of mental attitudes.

The best time for sitting for physical manifestations is usually after sunset, and when no business or other engagements press, and the best place is wherever the atmospheric conditions are reposeful and the general air is as free from contamination as possible. Good ventilation is essential to the health of all concerned. Much of the exhaustion following a seance is often due to a stifling atmosphere brought about by stupid non-observance of rudimentary sanitary conditions, and then falsely attributed to the effects of mediumship. If people would only attend more rationally to proper ventilation, hygienic dress and simple food, they would be able to exercise mediumship and attend seances with far less inconvenience and suffering than they now often experience.

A physical medium, upon whose constitution heavy draughts are often made, can readily recuperate without injury to mind or body provided mediumship is exercised only in wholesome surroundings. Such a person requires much free exercise in the open air and usually thrives far better in the country than in a city. A country estate is far healthier than a city flat for everyone, and if a society engaged in scientific psychical research takes a medium under its wing, it would be well for such a body to provide a retreat away from city strife where the medium could enjoy mental and physical relaxation, whether the seances were held there or elsewhere. It greatly contributes to facile production of phenomena to set apart certain rooms exclusively for psychical work, as an atmosphere becomes gradually charged with elements which can be readily utilized in the production of phenomena. Garments also can profitably be kept sacred for use only during the progress of seances.

Turning now to Mental Mediumship we are confronted with a type of temperament altogether different from the physical. As the physical medium is principally called upon to supply material for external phenomena, the mental medium is called upon to retire into an interior condition in which he is removed to an unusual distance from the physical plane. Very often a mental medium of rare excellence is a person of spare frame and of almost ascetic tendencies, generating less than the ordinary amount of physical vitality, but enjoying good health tho by no means adapted to hard manual labor. Many a physical medium makes an excellent tiller of the soil, and delights in physical occupation of various kinds, but cares little for art and literature. A good mental medium is apt to be studious and artistic, far better adapted to literary employment than to manual efforts. Such a person is often highly sensitive to mental states and is much more readily affected by psychical than by physical conditions. We may have to pay much attention to externals with persons of this type in so far as they are expressive of internal conditions, but no further. It is the mental attitude of the persons with whom this type of medium is brought in contact that signifies far more than observance of any outward rules. Here again we often encounter eccentricity, but it is on the mental plane and very apt to manifest in the expression of unusual views of life such as would furnish material for an original play or novel.

Inspirational speakers, to whose utterances an immense amount of attention was given at the very time physical phenomena was being closely investigated in many lands contemporaneously, were usually somewhat uneven in their utterances, their finest orations being given when audiences furnished them with some exceptional stimulus. Sometimes this stimulus is of the most friendly and sympathetic order, but on other occasions it is a wave of challenging antagonism that will call forth superfine deliverances. During recent years Spiritualism has become too general and popular, and its accustomed methods of propaganda too commonplace to evoke very startling results, for the best mediumistic demonstrations require a certain definite stimulation which is only occasionally afforded.

Henry Ward Beecher was wont to say that a great oration required a great occasion, a great inspiration, and a great subject in addition to a great orator, therefore unless the four essentials were present it was not forthcoming. No doubt Beecher was fundamentally right, but judging from results among inspired speakers we must acknowledge that some, if not all of these four essentials, are often furnished on the unseen rather than on the physical side working thru the medial instrumentality of a sensitive who in his or her ordinary condition is no orator whatever, tho no doubt in possession of latent oratorical ability; for it appears, as a result of close and continuous investigation, that dormant faculties are worked upon by inspiring intelligences, who cannot create faculties in a mediumistic person, but can and do arouse and employ to the fullest possible extent such faculties as they find potenial.

A great audience may be composed of only three or four persons, because greatness in the mental sense does not imply a vast concourse of dull intellects which may easily be massed together at a circus. A single bright mind, alert and sympathetic in an audience of any dimensions, may suffice to afford the necessary conditions for the delivery of a masterly inspired oration on a public platform, precisely as the same helpful man or woman of keen intellect and kindly disposition may call out the most amazing results during a private interview with a delicately organized sensitive.

Professing Spiritualists are not always the people who furnish the best conditions for the exercise of any phase of mediumship, for they are often coldly unsympathetic and harshly critical, while many inexperienced investigators are in so receptive a mental state that they aid a medium immensely. Particular phases of mediumship usually follow the bent of the medium's natural disposition pretty closely, thus it comes to pass that a lover of music will be inspired to sing or play; a lover of literature will be inspired to write; a lover of painting or sculpture will be inspired to produce a painting or a bust; a child or adult of inventive turn of mind will be inspired to produce some invention. We must remember that the intelligences who work with and thru mediums are largely limited as to their expression by the instruments they have at their disposal.

No musician, however gifted, can evolve the tones peculiar to a cornet by drawing a bow across the strings of a violin, nor can the finest pianist draw from a pipe organ the same kind of tone resulting from passing his fingers over the keyboard of a piano; neither is it possible for any organist to transcend the capacity of the instrument upon which he plays. Organs have just so many stops, pedals and keyboards and no more; violins have so many string; pianos just so many octaves. So is it with mediumistic capacities at any given time with reference to any special medium. But human faculties can be increased by exercise, therefore the limit of to-day is not necessarily that of to-morrow.

The cultivation of mediumship does not imply change of type or alteration of characteristic temperament, but continued unfolding more and more of latent capacity. We can never countenance, much less advocate any objectionable artificial methods for arousing sensitiveness, such as the employment of stimulants or narcotics, which are invariably injurious. Healthy modes of living, free from all manner of excess, must ever be recommended to those who wish to exercise mediumship healthfully and reliably. Blind yielding to unknown influences is always fraught with risk, but intuition must be our chief guide in all directions.

Unseen influences may call themselves by any names they choose to assume, and if we blindly accept what we are told regardless of sensations accompanying and results following, we may be swindled in many directions by arrogant impostors either seen or unseen. There is a sphere surrounding every individual that cannot be altered except from within, therefore a deceiver cannot emanate the same psychic influence as one whose intentions are honest. The emanation from one who delights in cruelty cannot be the same as that proceeding from one who delights in kindness, and so it goes illimitably.

Sensitive children, in common with all highly sagacious animals, know whom to trust and whom not to trust, and as the childlike disposition is essentially mediumistic in the best meaning of the word, it is well for most adults who are practising as mediums to let their intuitions guide them far more than they usually have done or are now doing.

If a person enters the atmosphere of a sensitive, demanding an interview and the sensitive feels repelled, it would be wise not to give a sitting. No one need be rude or condemnatory in the attitude taken, but discretion should be heeded. Very often certain persons coming closely together clash psychically and the interblending of their auric emanations produces a discord. This is no proof that there is anything wrong or bad in either party, it only goes to show lack of mutual adaptability, and often the direct contradition of adaptation. After all the advice that can be proclaimed and published along general lines has been given and heeded, there will ever remain the need for individual discretion in the exercise of mediumship, and as sensitive persons outgrow more and more the old mistaken idea that they must be in a chronic state of prostrate passivity in order to be successful mediums, the rightful assertion of individuality will increasingly reveal the welcome fact that the highest and most convincing types of mediumship traverse the road of temperamental inclination, so that the most useful mediumship is of supplemental, not of substitutionary character. Inspiration of the noblest sort augments, it never subverts any rightful natural tendencies, and it ever increases natural talent whenever it is healthfully encouraged.

LESSON XI

Mediumship and Adepthood

Having discussed various phases of mediumship and made some endeavor to explain, at least in outline, whence mediumistic faculties proceed and how they may be reasonably cultivated and profitably exercised, we now desire to direct attention to Adepthood which occupies a position in general esteem (and rightly so), far higher than any usually assigned to simple mediumship. The reason for assigning a position of great importance to Adepthood and regarding Mediumship as occupying a more primitive ground, is because many a medium is such from organization only, and therefore practically from necessity, while no one can possibly become an adept without a large amount of deliberate self-development.

When the famous electrician, Thomas Edison, was questioned as to how far he thought that his phenomenally successful work was legitimately attributable to inspiration, he replied more seriously than facetiously, that he considered that Perspiration played a larger part than Inspiration in his accomplishments. On first hearing so strange an utterance one might imagine that the famous inventor was casting a slur upon inspiration, but such was by no means necessarily the case, for the original meaning and true etymological significance of perspiration is breathing thru, while inspiration obviously signifies breathing in. Spiro, I breathe; and spirare, to breathe, are the Latin founts whence our English words, inspiration, perspiration, aspiration, respiration and expiration are derived, therefore as the prefix per stands for thru, perspire is to breathe thru, not as commonly supposed simply to sweat. In all ordinary uses of the word in these days we are led to suppose that sweating and perspiring means about the same, when in reality these two processes are widely dissimilar. We all know how persons whose breathing is seriously impeded, and who are in a generally weak and run down condition, often suffer from night sweats and the water flows out of their pores excessively and unpleasantly whenever they take a little more than their common small degree of exercise. In sound health the human body is comfortably moist but not uncomfortably wet, but when abnormal or pathological conditions obtain, normal breathing is interfered with and thru clogging of the pores disagreeable sweating is substituted for agreeable breathing. All Yoga practices deal primarily with regulated modes of breathing, because there is no self-command where there is no regulated breath, and where there is lack of self-control or self-directed energy there can be no attainment of adepthood. We often call a man or woman an adept who has achieved something unusual along some particular line of mental industry by dint of patient, persistent perseverance, which is something widely different from easy dependence upon natural gifts and endowments alone, which, tho' forming in most instances a necessary background and starting point for deliberate endeavor, can never be rightly looked upon as substitutes for resolute determination to make something of oneself.

We hear so much of "selfmade" men and women, pro and con, that we need to carefully weigh arguments and assertions on both sides of an age-long controversy. On the one hand we are confronted with assertions to the effect that Heredity and Environment are responsible for nearly everything, on the other hand we are told that all truly great individuals have made themselves illustrious by their own determined endeavors. It is safe to aver that there is some measure of truth in each of these diametrically opposite assertions, experience manifestly teaching that the qualities inherent in us and the opportunities thrown in our way have much to do oftentimes with our success when we succeed. But it should never be forgotten that there are many obvious failures in the face of great inducements to success, and many remarkable successes in the face of tremendous obstacles which only the most heroic courage and perseverance could have surmounted. When Longfellow gave us those heroic lines in the Psalm of Life, "Lives of great men all remind us we may make our lives sublime," he struck the keynote to an anthem of human possibility far beyond the realization of average men and women; but it is well that children everywhere should be taught to recite and sing words of such majestic import, for they are fundamentally sound as well as intensely bracing.

We have probably in the course of our investigations met certain mediumistic persons, who may be thoroughly honest and doing a limited amount of good work faithfully who have, by all report, made no progress during 20, 30, or even 40 years. They seem to have come to a standstill; they move in a rut or travel in a groove round and round, but apparently take no steps forward. These honest psychics may be all they claim to be and their guides on the unseen side of life may be sincere and trustworthy, but painfully limited in knowledge and lacking in the spirit of adventure. Mediumship of the sort possessed and exercised by persons of this stamp is by no means hurtful or dangerous, but it is surely not extremely profitable, and owing to its negative and stationery character it justifies the complaint made by many progressive-minded investigators that such a kind of intercourse with the spirit-world fails to add sufficiently to our knowledge or to the elevation of our daily interest in it. It is from this cause more than from any other that many investigators have turned away from commonplace mediumship to a study of "occult," "theosophical" and "new thought" literature and thereby caused lamentation in the ranks of ultra-conservative Spiritualists who protest against the defection from their ranks of persons who have failed to receive edification thru such mediumship channels as were open to them. It is extremely wise for convinced and enthusiastic Spiritualists to do their utmost to cultivate and exercise a kind of mediumship which will bring real satisfaction to intelligent enquirers. There is no necessary opposition of mediumship to adepthood, tho' the method of becoming an adept is one of voluntary affiliation with certain sources of information in place of relying upon whatever may come out of the unseen if one takes and holds a simply passive mental and physical attitude. It certainly ought not to be difficult to realize that the law of affinity works universally and regulates all psychical relationships to a far greater extent than it seemingly determines material conditions.

The old proverbial references to like attracting like and birds of a feather flocking together are completely applicable to what is constantly taking place on the psychic side of our experiences both when we are awake and when we are asleep, and even more when we are sleeping than during our waking periods. "Never walking heavenward can we walk alone" is a true saying, and it is furthermore true that we can never walk alone in any direction, for we attract spiritual companions at all times in consequence of what Swedenberg has termed our "dominant affection." To the merely shiftless in mind the idea of a dominant affection may mean very little indeed, but to all who set some definite goal before them it means immensely much. We can all yield irresolutely or waveringly to whatever influences may be in the ascendant, and that is exactly what fickle-minded people are continually doing. The true adept, and all on the path to adepthood, realize a goal ahead and resolutely strive to reach it, not doubtfully and anxiously but firmly and steadfastly.

Concentration on the selected goal is the first matter of supreme importance, and we all know that concentration only means close and undivided interest. To concentrate upon what we greatly admire and truly love is never difficult but always extremely easy; difficulty arises immediately we seek to pay close attention to something in which we take but very little interest. Lack of concentration advertises lack of interest, and where little interest is taken in any pursuit definitely the goal of adepthood is an unattainable ideal. But we can scarcely imagine anyone seriously faring forth upon the way of initiation whose interest was at a low ebb or a vacilating quantity, unless the prompting motives were merely personal glorification or some financial gain, in which case it would not be desirable to seek to cultivate the inner faculties nor would it be possible to do so to any large extent. A vast amount of mischievous misapprehension prevails concerning the relative strength of the righthand and lefthand initiates, to employ current occult phraseology. It is erroneously taught in many places that the powers of darkness are almost if not quite as strong as the powers of light, but such an opinion is happily entirely fallacious. In such curiously instructive works as "High Magic" by Eliphas Levi, and the rarer works of Cornelius Agrippa and other medieval alchemists, we are distinctly shown how very limited is the ability of the lower occult forces who are sometimes referred to as Brethren of the Shadow. Strength on the spiritual side of life is commensurate with development of righteous intention, therefore it is ever true, both mystically and literally, that Parsifal can defeat Klingsor, but Klingsor strives in vain to subdue Parsifal. In that wonderfully beautiful legend which forms the motif of Richard Wagner's sublimest opera and which afforded Alfred Tennyson material for "The Idyl of the King" (Arthur) we have set before us with unmistakable clearness the path of adepthood or the true way of initiation into the Greater Mysteries. At first Parsifal is represented as only a well-disposed lad who acts as other youths of his place and period, for he goes forth with bow and arrow and brings down a bird. Then Gurnemanz accosts him and rebukes him with seemingly undue severity for so commonplace an act, but in his harsh reprimand we are introduced to the true spirit of initiation. "Faint heart never wins fair lady."

To become a knight of the Holy Grail one must rise far above the ordinary standards of popular society and immeasurably transcend the mediocre standards of conventional morality. In the name of reason it may well be asked how can anyone expect to attain unusual powers or mount to unusual heights without undergoing unusual discipline and refraining from prevailing indiscretion? Here we confront the theological distinction between commandments binding upon all respectable members of ordinary society and "counsels of perfection" binding only upon such as set forth upon the saintly pathway which is the narrow road that only few attempt to tread. A saint is not properly a person unsuited to perform ordinary duties in the world, but one who has attained to a state where he can do far more than the ordinary and help humanity in many extraordinary ways. The question of sanctity is closely allied with sanity and the two words look alike and sound alike and are indeed derived from a common root, Sanitas (health). To be healthy is to be whole and to be whole is to be saintly. Abnormality is very far from sanctity, but supernormality, using the term as it is now often employed, is inseparable therefrom. The cultivation and exercise of our supernormal faculties at our own discretion marks a degree of self-direction definitely phenomenal. We are told of "held breath" and of much else that strikes the average reader as somewhat dangerous, in works professing to give directions for attaining unusual heights of spiritual development, and it is not safe for untrained and undisciplined persons to experiment with curious Oriental practices not well understood in Europe or America and often adapted to India and its native populations, but not to the average native of any portion of the Occidental world. Simple breathing exercises may be profitably practised by every normal-minded person, but it should be steadily borne in mind that it is far more the resolute control over our sense-organs gained and maintained by such exercises than the simple performance of prescribed acts that accomplishes initiation.

If you determine to breathe regularly and rythmically according to a system you believe to be beneficial, you thereby develop ability to govern your sense-impulses when you succeed in regulating your breath. Should you adopt fantastic methods they might work injury, but if the methods are rational nothing but benefit can accrue. Here we see how immensely important is the mental attitude, far transcending the physical behavior, for it is the former which dictates and governs the latter. Mechanical bodily exercises such as are practiced in an ordinary gymnasium cannot unfold spiritual qualities, but in so far as they are healthful in themselves they prove of some assistance by way of bringing the physique into suitable conditions as an instrument for the soul's employment. We certainly do not find athletes and gymnasts as a class exceptionally enlightened spiritually unless they have devoted thought to higher proficiency than that which will enable them to exhibit their muscles to admiring spectators; nevertheless to the extent that they are healthier than a majority of those who gaze upon their achievements they are so much nearer the goal of adepthood, and were they to determine to develop their inner faculties they would at once find their athletic training standing them in good stead.

We all know that abstinence and self-control are absolutely essential to mental and physical proficiency, and what is self-control when we definitely analyze it but successful resistance to pressure from the lower side of existence both in seen and in unseen realms? In order to become self-regulating, we must withstand all manner of overt and subtle solicitations to do as others do and to gratify our own lower impulses when higher impulses are urging us in some contrary direction. It is not gratification of the senses which is in itself the cause of human failure to achieve nobility, but disregard of higher invitations which urge in a supersensuous direction. The adept is the man or woman who takes up the mystical serpent of temptation and thereby transmutes lower into higher energy. This is the mystery of transubstantiation, the magnum opus of alchemy, the true transmutation of baser metals into mystical gold within the human alembic. No medium who simply allows himself to be used by guiding intelligences is an adept, because his attitude is one that calls for no exercise of individual sovereignty, without which there can be no achievement of real victory over the raw material out of which the new statue is to be wrought by the spiritual sculptor.

We usually speak very glibly of the sacrifices made and the victories won by those highly advanced intelligences who have conquered limitations, and become Masters or Mahatmas (greatly unfolded souls) but how are we ever to advance likewise without making similar effort ourselves? When people use their reason on all these matters and refuse resolutely to be swayed by floating will-o'-the-wisp doctrines concerning mediumship and its alleged dangers, they will soon see how perfectly comprehensible is a rational and edifying view of this entire mighty subject. As we grow more and more highly individualized we become less and less swayable by extraneous influences whether in or out of the flesh, therefore we have our own say regarding our yielding or not yielding to invitations and impulses, no matter whence such may proceed.

In the earlier stages of growth toward adepthood we are likely to appear self-opinionated and self-willed in a rather disagreeable way, because we are at a point on the road where we have to act from our own volition in place of being guided by others. The mistakes made by experimentists are not wilful sins, but blunders due to ignorance which can only be mastered by repeated efforts leading to eventual conquest. There is no other way of attainment than thru the gateway and along the path of successive efforts to achieve. The student must work out his own problems, often in solitary confinement in a scholastic cubicle, before he can reasonably hope to graduate with honors from his college, and in due time and turn become a professor in the very university from which he graduated, or in some similar seat of learning. The idle stupid question is always being raised, Why do not our spiritual guides and guardian angels (if we have any) protect us at all times from falling into error? The answer is simply that if they did thus completely shield us we should be rendered chronically subservient and actually automatic, therefore never able to reach to any such attainment ourselves as those more advanced entities have reached already. You can often be controlled, if you are willing to be, by very good influences who will pour helpful teachings thru your lips that will prove helpful to others; but when you set forth upon the road of self-initiation you have to assume far more individual responsibility, and for a time forego many delightful helps which assisted you along earlier portions of the spiritual incline. When adepthood has been attained, our relationship with the spirit-world is consciously far closer than ever previously, for then with open vision do we behold what formerly was only communicated to us by hearsay.

Whatever special exercises you may find profitable you have a right to pursue, but it is unwise, and sometimes dangerous, to endeavor to foist on others your own especial practices.

If every night before allowing sleep to overtake us we fix our thought steadily on some special goal of spiritual desire, during our sleeping period we shall be introduced to halls of learning and companioned by helpful preceptors who will greatly aid us on the forward path.

Whether we actively remember these experiences after we have awakened or not, will depend upon how gradually we have returned from the sleeping to the waking state and how far our outer brains are ready to receive psychical impressions, but no profitable experience in sleep ever fails to produce a beneficial result from which we profit knowingly or unknowingly during waking periods.

LESSON XII.

Objections, Answers and Observations on the Higher Uses of Mediumship

In its largest connotation, the familiar word Mediumship of necessity implies far more than when used in any ordinary restricted, or even in any restrictable sense. The actual fact of spirit-communion is here and there, now and again demonstrated thru the instrumentality of some highly sensitive man, woman or child, and intelligent investigators become convinced that there is, at least occasionally and in some limited degree, intercourse between two planes of existence frequently termed two worlds. But tho so small a measure of spiritual revelation is distinctly valuable and serves to suggest an all-including philosophy of human life and purpose far brighter and more rational than antiquated materialistic theories, the wider aspects of the mediumistic question are often entirely overlooked because of too intense concentration mentally upon matters of immediate interest to persons whose sole object, here and now, is to prove the single fact of life's individual continuity.

The fact is often commented upon adversely that a majority of alleged spirit-messages,—many of them undoubtedly genuine to the fullest extent possible in the limiting circumstances,—are trivial and throw very little light upon the life continuous, concerning which they undertake to deal.

So very unimportant, relatively speaking, is the subject-matter of probably 90 per cent of average mediumistic "messages" that we need not wonder or feel annoyed when we hear them classified as trivial in the extreme.

The triviality, however, does not render them worthless or uninteresting even from a scientific standpoint, but it does produce a feeling of discontent in the minds of seekers after more of truth than is conveyed in such limited communications. An obvious reason for such messages is that they answer a constant demand more or less satisfactorily, and also that they emanate from individuals who have had no wide experience in spirit-life and who were commonplace men and women when they lived on earth. Professor Hyslop and other well-known investigators of prominence in the field of Psychical Research have wisely and fairly called attention to the fact that very often a seemingly trivial communication is possessed of higher evidential value than many a much loftier and far more philosophical utterance given thru the lips of some inspired orator, simply because the trivial message contained some individual quality characteristic of the personal source whence it was said to emanate.

Professor Hyslop in his published works on this fascinating subject shows reasonably and clearly how very commonplace are our daily conversations with our friends and the letters we usually write to our general acquaintances, even tho some of us may be men and women of considerable prominence in literary and scientific circles.

Thomas Huxley said at one time, when one of his scientific colleagues had called attention to spirit-communications which had satisfied Professor Alfred Russel Wallace and other eminent scientific celebrities, that he did not deny any of the assumed facts. Neither was he prepared to admit them, but granting their genuineness they were of no more interest to him than would be the conversation of a company of trivial young persons playing a game of crouquet on a country lawn were he able to hear it while sitting in some room in London.

From one standpoint we can understand Huxley's attitude easily enough, but it was long ago pointed out that it by no means expressed the truly scientific spirit, and it certainly made no allowance whatever for the enormous part played by personal affection in human life at all times everywhere. If those young people were unknown to the listener, and their talk had no reference to any matter which concerned him sympathetically, we can comprehend and agree with his position entirely; but if those young persons were his sons and daughters, or other relatives or students in whom he took a fatherly interest, the case would be entirely different. Letters received from home, wherever home may be, are not usually valued as fine literary productions, but simply as epistles written by some person in whose lives we take much more than common interest. It is not the worth of the message so much as the kindly spirit of the writer that gives us joy when we receive the missive.

Having now justified in outline the interest usually taken in messages which lack high literary or scientific value, we ought to be ready to gaze much further afield and reckon with other and more nearly universal aspects of spirit-communion concerning which there is still dense popular ignorance. Once admit that spirit-communion is a fact in the economy of nature, and we cannot escape from the conclusion that it is an unacknowledged factor in all our lives to an extent impossible to define completely. Intercommunion and interdependence are two words which express the universal co-operative spirit. None of us can live to ourselves alone, not even if like Robinson Crusoe we should spend a year or more on a solitary island without even one human companion in the flesh. The better acquainted we become with telepathy, mental telepathy, and all else that concerns psychic intercourse between persons yet in the flesh without the intervention of ordinary physical means of converse, the clearer does it become that we can and do, both knowingly and unknowingly, when we are awake and when we are asleep, commune one with another in subtle ways unknown to any of our external senses. Tennyson's expression "spirit with spirit, ghost with ghost," truly voices this fact. This spiritual or ghostly intercourse between intimate friends, such as to realize their existence on earth, seeing that every institution is brought into existence and kept alive psychically, rather than physically.

"He is a Jew who is one inwardly," is a text containing a tremendous wealth of food for thought. Many nominal Jews on earth have no love for Judaism, therefore in spirit-life they are not numbered among Israel's sons and daughter, while others who have no Hebrew ancestry and have not been brought up in the faith of Israel are spiritually members of the House of Israel, because of their vital sympathy with Jewish ideals.

No greater mistake can possibly be made than to suppose that external membership in any organization constitutes affiliation, or that lack of external membership excludes anyone from spiritual communion. In all churches and parties there are nominal members who have no spiritual affiliation with the institution to which they outwardly belong, and there is always a membership unseen by mortal eyes and unregistered in material books which goes to make up the soul or spirit of the federation. Nothing is easier than to force a good many people to join and outwardly support an institution of any kind on account of worldly advantages on one side and disadvantages on the other; but enforced outward membership is detrimental to the body which contains these unwillingly incorporated cells, the presence of which causes incessant friction and results in ultimate disruption. In the spirit-life all associations are far more nearly voluntary than on earth, by reason of the fact that ulterior motives cannot be appealed to anything like the same extent.

No one can ordain or disallow spirit-communion in reality, tho shortsighted dictators may issue peremptory edicts commanding their subjects to either join in exercises intended to induce spirit- communion or else to refrain entirely from all participation in such exercises.

The mental blindness of such dictators is pitiable

Alfred Tennyson and Arthur Hallam, may be more keenly intense when there is so very much spiritual affinity as exists undoubtedly between especially close friends, but there is a friendship and spiritual intimacy between companions or affinitizing souls which embraces entire communities or societies in spirit-life, and it is with one or another of these spheres, not exclusively with some particular individual, that we most frequently hold communion when our affections and thoughts are centered in matters of communal and sometimes of even world-wide interest.

Some particular "movement" or aspect of local reform may be the "hobby" of certain peculiar people whose outlook upon life in general is very much restricted and who cannot see much value in anything outside the narrow confines of their parochial club. Such persons are often highly conscientious and truly inspired by unseen helpers who engage with them in the limited philanthrophy in which they take delight. On the unseen side there are far more workers than on the outwardly visible side of such a group of workers who live in their own especial fold, like sheep marked with an owner's name and carefully guarded by shepherd and dog lest they stray into other pastures. To persons who love limitations, and to whom narrow conventionalism affords placid pleasure, are attracted influences who, while in the flesh, lived in the same affectation and who have not yet outgrown it. Every "heaven" conceived of can have an actual temporary existence, and to the individuals now constituting it, it may appear a permanently satisfactory institution.

When a soul, passing out of the earthly tabernacle, insists upon receiving the ministrations of some particular society or church, we may feel assured that that soul is willingly, indeed wilfully, entering a certain clearly defined section of the spirit-world. It need be no more difficult to conceive of the existence of definite bodies or denominations in spirit-life than in the extreme, for to the vision of a seer the means intended to promote an end in all such cases must invariably defeat it. That is why punishment is an egregious blunder and assists to promote the very crimes of misdemeanors it is intended to destroy. If you should forbid a child or a dependent from attending a meeting of any kind you could keep the physical body away but you could not prevent the mind from traveling, therefore you could not successfully forbid a particular kind of psychic influx of which you disapproved. You may lock up prisoners in jails, but you can only incarnate the flesh. You may execute a malefactor, but you cannot reform an individual by depriving one of his outer body. The whole blind punitive system, which is now breaking up the world over, is based in gross materialism and fostered by complete ignorance of the operation of law on the unseen planes of nature. Contemporaneously with the amazing demonstration of interest in all psychic questions which characterizes the present day, we find a world-wide determination to correct hoary abuses and completely reconstruct the penal system. The world at large is beginning to see how worse than futile are all endeavors to reconstruct character by punishment or to effect reform by repression. The less one talks about a subject the more one is apt to meditate thereon in silence, and it is through silent meditation or contemplation, far more than through noisy shouting that great results are brought to pass.

The only advantages accruing at any time from outward measures are to be traced finally to the status of mind they tend to induce and the special affections they incline to foster. Works of art which long endure have been born out of spiritual consciousness and stand externally as monuments to the great love and deep thought which originally inspired them.

The spiritual realm is a region of affectional conjunctions in which souls flew together in consequence of some common affection and drift apart by reason of lack of interior congeniality. War and peace are the two great opposites, therefore, it would appear that no warrior could enter Heaven, which is a collective name for all orderly spheres; Hell being a collective name for all disorderly conditions.

It is true that no one can affiliate with heavenly influences in so far as he loves strife and wishes to intensify it, but when a warrior goes to war in the belief that it is his stern duty and that he is fighting in a righteous cause, he is by no means entirely cut off from the blessing of a celestial influx. Sherman's famous saying "War is Hell" was wrung from the intrepid soldier because he had seen the horrors of battle and felt his true humanity awakening within him. Such a man passing into spirit life becomes an arbitrator, a peace-maker; not one who eggs on nations to continued conflict. That there are warlike spirits fighting for their respective countries we know right well, and it is extremely easy to get in touch with them, for they are still in the earth's immediate atmosphere and present at recruiting stations and wherever else the war fever is encouraged. It is extremely probable that many of the limited patriotic influences are urging men and women to embark on a career of military "duty," while other more enlightened influences are persuading the same persons to take a higher and milder view of duty and work at peaceful industries for the true upbuilding of their native lands and for the ultimate benefit of the entire human race.

To merely claim that one is guided by unseen influences to perform certain definite deeds is not to rationally justify those deeds, because the unseen universe contains all sorts and conditions of humanity, and we can be genuinely inspired from an immense variety of sources. The vital crux of the entire situation is to be found solely in the motives which prompt us in our silent moments when we are most susceptible to spiritual influence.

Nothing can effectually separate us from what we truly love, therefore, no influences can ever come truly near us in the most intensely vital way unless we and they are united by the cords of deep mental affection. To merely profess interest in the world's welfare and verbally endorse well-sounding pacific phrases is not enough to protect us against the spirit of destructive militarism, but sincere love of humanity, whether outwardly expressed or not, must of necessity bind us closely in communion with the great army of philanthropists who are working diligently and incessantly to scatter finally the dark war clouds which have so long hung over the earth as a murky pall, and which are now being dispersed rapidly even thru the direful agency of active exterior belligerence.

Whenever a great crisis is reached there is a fierce clashing in the unseen spheres attaching to this planet; indeed, constituting its far larger portion. This is the "war in heaven" mentioned in the Apocalypse. (Vide Rev. xii, 7.)

In a period of such extreme sensitiveness as the present we are witnessing demonstrations of world-wide mediumship in far more than ordinary degree, and it is for us to definitely decide whether we will range ourselves or not on some definite side as conviction prompts us.

It is useless to condemn any one, but it is reasonable to throw all the light we can on the causes of manifest effects, for though the fixed relation beween Cause and Effect remains utterly beyond our power to influence, we can take such practical advantage of this immutable order as to regulate our inner living so as to affiliate only with such types of influences as we wish to have for intimate companions.

Fear attracts, and so does hate. By fearing we attract the object of our dread, and by hating we attract the objects of our aversion.

If psychics, sensitives or mediums everywhere would but face this mighty problem definitely and straightforwardly they would soon greatly lessen their present sufferings and immensely increase their happiness and usefulness. While it is important that everyone should awaken to this mighty truth concerning the universal operation of the immutable Law of Attraction, it is supremely important that the more sensitive among us should become aroused to the importance of rightly understanding it.

Mediumship can be made a great universal blessing and nothing but a blessing, while now it is partly a bane. The whole universe is at our service. We can tap it where we please directly we have become convinced of the limitless power of united love and thought, which, working in double harness, can truly accomplish all things.

What is known as Prophetic Mediumship figures largely in nearly all discussions concerning the part played by unseen spiritual influences in this planet's guidance. Can events be definitely foretold and, if so, how? is a question of universal and perennial interest, and one by no means easy to answer without acquaintanceship with many hidden causes which never meet the outward eye. The false view of prediction taken by a multitude of fatalistic thinkers, whose thought is never profound, is that to foretell an event accurately is to justify the doctrine that every occurrence on earth is foreordained and therefore pre-necessitated, in such a manner as to leave no room for the exercise of human freedom.

Our sense of freedom is often referred to as an illusion by these shallow would-be philosophers who are overlooking the most important of all the factors in the problem they imagine they have correctly solved. The immutability of law, coupled with the possibility of beholding with the eye of seership the workings of law on an interior plane or in a region veiled from exterior observation, are the two leading factors in the matter we are now considering. Granting these two essentials it becomes comparatively easy to account for predictions subsequently fulfilled without tolerating any fatalistic view of human destiny.

"Coming events cast their shadows before them," is an oft quoted and truthful saying, but one that seldom receives the thoughtful attention it richly deserves. A coming event must be on some road traveling from one place or plane to another, and as it journeys its casts a shadow in advance which an unusually sensitive individual can perceive, but this "shadow' 'is not detectable by persons who lack sufficient sensitiveness to detect it.

The fact that a letter has been already posted and is on the way to a person to whom it is addressed, and the further fact that the postman will deliver it at a certain time at a certain door may be clairvoyantly apprehended. A statement may be made much as follows: "You will receive a letter three weeks from today, postmarked Sydney." The person addressed may reply, "I know no one in Australia." That makes no difference to the clairvoyant who still persists that she sees the letter coming to that person at that time, and at the expiration of three intervening weeks the predicted missive is in your hands. An international conflict is an immensely greater event to foretell than the arrival of an unexpected private letter; but the law governing both predictions is exactly the same, as in both instances the prophecy is based upon more than ordinary information in possession of the prophet. A prophet who simply announces the advent of an unexpected event of world-wide moment has not of necessity any more responsibility for its coming than has the predictor of the letter's arrival at your house any responsibility for what it contains or for the previous act of the writer who indited it.

When causes are already in motion and things are traveling outward from unseen places as seeds sprout in the ground, there is no fatalism in definitely predicting the appearance of a certain crop at the end of a determinable germinative period. There is a time when we are free to act or free to refrain from action, but once having acted in a definite manner we are not free to escape the consequence of the completed deed. It may be further declared that precisely as the actions of men and women on earth lead to certain inevitable consequences through the unalterable working of the law of cause and effect, so do the actions of spiritual entities disrobed of gross material forms produce results in planetary government. The balance of power is always in the hands of the most highly intelligent. Knowledge gives power, while ignorance must ever be the concomitant of weakness. The book of Daniel contains the expressive statement, "that ye may know that the heavens do rule," a very favorite proof text with astrologers. What is exactly meant by "the heavens" is an open question with many commentors, for while all may agree that reference is made to some celestial states superior to all things terrestrial, the mode of action of these "heavens" is not always fully decipherable.

If heavens are taken collectively to signify interior states, and earth stands for exterior conditions, the meaning of the passage quoted is sufficiently clear, and it is reasonable to assume that a correct view of heavenly operations must include the action of incarnate and excarnate humanity. The handwriting on the wall at Belshazzar's feast has often been cited as one of the most amazing combinations of physical with prophetic mediumship on record, and it reads as though the time had then come in Babylon when it was too late to save an empire which had grown so corrupt as to be at the very point of necessary overthrow.

The chief value of a prophetic utterance at so dreadful a time would be to give some opportunity for escape for those who would heed the warning, otherwise a bald prediction would be useful only as illustrating the inevitable doom of iniquity, and in that case it would be capable of conveying a valuable moral lesson. To simply predict impending doom is mere fortune telling, which does not deserve to rank with enlightened and enlightening prophecy. One of Shakespeare's characters has truly said "There is a tide in the affairs of men that, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune." The truly useful inspired and inspiring prophet is one who can declare when that tide will come in and who assists those who hearken to words of prophecy to take advantage of the flood. To sow in watered earth is to act wisely, and it is to prepare for a rich harvest of bread in days to come. While to sow at the wrong time for sowing is to court disappointment, unwittingly or carelessly. It is not rational to believe that the affairs of earth are either arbitrarily dictated by unseen influences or that the earth is left without spiritual promptings and guidance. The simplest definitions are often the most correct interpretations. Teachers stand over scholars to aid them in their studies, but at no experimental stations, and in no laboratory where apprentices are acquiring ability through experimentation of their own to become experts, can learned professors absolutely control the movements of the students in such wise as to make the student entirely reliant on the wisdom and forethought of their preceptor. We should always remember that this earth is a seminary, a place of education; neither a place of reward or punishment. The school idea is one that appeals to all thoughtful minds. We are not automatic agents of unseen intelligences, but pupils under the direction of teachers and given an ever-increasing amount af latitude for self-directing action as we proceed from class to class and advance from the rank of juniors to that of seniors in this terrestrial academy. Mediumship, in the last analysis, is simply susceptibility to information obtained psychicaly in one or another of many possible ways, ranging from original infantile susceptibility to extraneous guidance to mature deliberative exercise of inherent faculties employable or not at the discretion of their owners.

As all things work together for eventual good to all, we may rest assured that the higher intelligences are always immeasurably stronger than the lower, and that righteousness will ultimately conquer all inquiry.

But true optimism does not blindly chirp out the childish words "God's in his heaven; all's right with the world," which Robert Browning put into the mouth of an inexperienced girl going out at 7 o'clock on an April holiday morning. It is to Abt Vogler rather than to the song from Pippa Passes that we must look to find Browning's genuine and incontrovertible optimism; for it is not the untried and untempted who can truly sing the triumphant song of faith vindicated and hope transformed to blissful realization, but those who have born the burden of trial and, having seen their early illusions vanish, have supplanted those roseate dreams of childhood with certainties derived from actual experience of how all roads that wind and turn eventually lead into abiding light.

We need a revelation through enlightened mediumship far transcending the borderline experiences now so common, and as we learn the lesser lessons which those smaller revelations teach, we become prepared for fuller unveilings of the boundless spiritual universe of which this planet though a minute is by no means an unimportant section.

Come up higher is ever the counsel of exalted spiritual intelligences, and from the sublime altitudes of celestial blessedness we derive encouragement to press forward even as those have already pressed on who are now our chief enlighteners. A true spiritual philosophy is exquisitely simple and at the same time immeasurably profound. Every question asked by the human mind is progressively answerable, but we must advance step by step, line upon line, and digest precept after precept in logical consecutive sequential order. There are no limits to attainable knowledge and none to our possible individual achievements. To set a justifiable limit to spiritual revelation is unthinkable. We must either deny it altogether or allow that it is boundless. Fnally considered, there are no real inconsistencies in any statements made by communicating entities, because none can describe things other than as they view them. To those who declare that we are arbitrarily fated, so it appears; but this is in consequence of lack of consciousness of innate ability to transcend environment on the part of the fatalistic babblers. In an undeveloped state of consciousness we are indeed subject to the sway of our surroundings, for we are the foolish ones who are ruled by their stars according to the old astrological adage; but as we advance in self-knowledge we become rulers where we formerly were slaves. We may hear of spirits mourning over the troubles of those left behind on earth to battle fiercely with a hard, cold world, and we may also hear of encouragement and cheer given to mourners by friends who have passed to upper spheres. All these declarations coincide with certain facts in human experience, but experiences on both sides of the "veil" are so immensely varied that we must strive to take into account the exact source whence a statement is received before deciding as to its value for our guidance.

Nothing Can Ever Be Too Good To Be True

It is always wise to apply practically the pragmatic or ultilitarian test to all revelations. We must try all teachings by the effect they can produce if we accept them. Common sense alone suffices to convince the open-minded that pessimism and fatalism are incapable of aiding human progress or contributing in any measure to health, success or happiness. Let us not waste energy and depress our mentality by indulging in the entertainment of theories or in coqueting with doctrines which prove themselves inaccurate by the sad effects they produce wherever they are welcomed and adhered to.

Suicide is justified by hopelessness. Progress is accomplished by holding on through light and darkness to the magnificent assurance that truth must eventually conquer all error, and virtue triumph over every shape of vice. In the exercise of mediumship we should resolve uncompromisingly to yield to such influences from unseen planes as render us aid by helping us to live more nobly ourselves and at the same time assist our neighbors to rise superior to whatever tends to hold them down. World-development means the unification eventually of all nations and interests in one glorious co-operative federation. The old monopolistic, tyrranical, oppressive and repressive systems of government and administration have been weighed in the balances of reason and equity and found so completely wanting that they are doomed to quick extinction, and the whole earth will rejoice when purer governments and juster laws have succeeded to those dying relics of a less enlightened past.

Spiritual hosts of light are ushering in the world's glad, bright, new day, and it is for all who love justice and seek to array themselves on the side of progress to open wide their hearts and minds to such influences, and to such only, as seek and tend to promote the incoming of the long predicted day of international federation. May the Divine Will be done on earth, in us and thru us, even as it is already done in the Celestial Heaven, is the earnest faithful, workful prayer of all who align themselves uncompromisingly on the side of the hosts of light who are the true directors of our growing planet's heavenward progress.

BITTER QUIZ.

QUESTIONS ON TWELVE LESSONS ON MEDIUMSHIP.

This is not a lesson in the sense that the preceding twelve lessons are such, nor is it in any sense a review of those lessons. The questions asked are to be answered by the student after he has gained a general outline idea of the contents of the lessons and feels desirous of testing his understanding of what they contain. It is not profitable in any high degree, except as a simple memory-exercise, to refer to the exact words of any lesson and repeat these precise quotations as answers to these questions, for in that case the student would display no ability to couch familiar ideas in language of his own, nor would he show that he had any individual understanding of the views he was expressing in some one else's phraseology. In order that every person who studies this Course of Lessons may become familiar enough with the views expressed therein to be able to easily undergo a cross-examination at random, no attempt has been made to arrange the following questions in any consecutive order. On the contrary, the questions are asked abruptly for the purpose of giving students an opportunity to test their own familiarity with the general scope of the teaching they have studied. No question is asked in the entire 100 which is not answered clearly in one or other of the twelve lessons.

Entirely apart from any special value which the lessons may or may not possess as explanatory essays, this quiz will be found extremely helpful to all who take advantage of it, because it affords an excellent opportunity for cultivating the good mental habit of grasping and holding ideas in substance altogether apart from memorizing the exact wording of a speech book. It is recommended that the student write out his own answers in his own words and subsequently compare these answers with the working of the lessons to see how far he has intelligently digested what they contain and advocate.

As the lessons are by no means finally exhaustive many a student may, through employment of this Quiz, make many valuable additions to them and produce a set of lessons of his own far superior to these, which are not sent forth as authoritative dicta, but only as helps to seekers after useful knowledge concerning the great question of MEDIUMSHIP, a term which can properly cover a far wider field than any that has yet been satisfactorily traversed.

The author of this Course of Instruction particularly desires to emphasize the fact that the object of its production is mainly to assist students to think for themselves and thereby further the development of their own individuality, so that when approaching the intricate Psychic Problem which so many earnest truthseekers are now resolutely tackling, they may not yield ready submission to any attempted explanations they may chance to hear, neither be frightened off the field of investigation by scarecrow utterances concerning "danger", but set themselves calmly, honestly and fearlessly to work to the extent of their ability to obey the wise injunction "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good," an injunction impossible to follow unless one is free to investigate all subjects impartially and in the midst of all surroundings maintain a placid mind.

W. J. COLVILLE.

100 QUESTIONS ON 12 LESSONS ON MEDIUMSHIP
Asked by the Author.

1. What do you understand by simple Mediumship?
2. What may rightly be termed special Mediumship?
3. Does Mediumship necessitate the subjugation of one mind to another?
4. What is meant by spontaneous Mediumship?
5. Is there any logical connection between Inspiration and Control?
6. What do you understand by Clairvoyance?
7. How would you define Clairaudience?
8. What definition can you give of Clairsentience?
9. How do you define Psychometry; whence is the term derived?
10. What do you understand by Prophecy?
11. What sort of person is a Prophet or Prophetess?
12. Is prophesying equivalent to fortunetelling?
13. What do you think about Healing Mediumship?
14. Does Mediumship interfere with rightful self-assertion?
15. Is there any connection between Mediumship and Hypnotism?
16. What attitude is it right and reasonable to take toward unseen entities?
17. Do you consider all mediumistic experiences proofs of Spirit-communion?
18. What ideas have you of Sub-consciousness or the Subjective Mind?
19. Can you differentiate Super-consciousness from Sub-consciousness?
20. Where do you think the Spirit-World is situated?
21. Is all communion with the Spirit-World conscious and intelligent?
22. What do you think primarily determines our relation with the Unseen?
23. What is your concept of the Law of Attraction?
24. What part should our Will play in regulating our Mediumship?
25. What is the effect of Thought upon Mediumship?
26. Give a clear definition of Will and Thought as distinct actors?
27. Can you determine what you will attract to you psychically?
28. Can you derive information from spiritual sources while asleep?
29. What and Where is the Astral Plane?
30. Have you any clear idea of spiritual relationships?
31. Do we necessarily associate spiritually with earthly companions?
32. What do you think chiefly determines spiritual affinity?

33. Define consociation as distinct from association?
34. Is Mediumistic likely to follow the bent of natural inclinations?
35. Can mediumistic abilities be wisely cultivated; if so, how?
36. Has bodily health any effect on mediumship?
37. Has mental health any influence on mediumship?
38. Has moral character any effect on mediumship?
39. What is necessary to constitute a person a Physical Medium?
40. What temperament is essential for Mental Mediumship?
41. Has food any influence on mediumship?
42. Has wearing apparel any effect on mediumship?
43. Have colors any effect on mediumship?
44. Has music any influence on mediumship?
45. Have Works of Art any effect on mediumship?
46. Is Poetry akin to Mediumship?
47. Has climate any effect on mediumship?
48. Is an outdoor life conducive to mediumistic development of any sort?
49. Have Developing Circles any useful end to serve?
50. If Developing Circles are formed, how should they be conducted?
51. What attitude should a mediumistic person take toward surroundings?
52. What is your idea of Telepathy or Mental Telegraphy?
53. Does mediumship include telepathic experiences?
54. Can we be influenced by our friends unknowingly; if so, how?
55. Can we be influenced against our determined Will?
56. What are the safeguards of mediumship?
57. How should we judge the value of communications?
58. What is the best time for psychic development?
59. What are the best places for psychic development?
60. Are we often influenced spiritually while we are sleeping?
61. Can we learn to regulate our Dreams?
62. Can you discriminate between a psychic vision and a memory-picture?
63. Give some clear idea of Psychic Revelation as distinct from Memory.
64. What mental attitude is most favorable when consulting a medium?
65. Are there dangers connected with mediumship?
66. If there are dangers, how can we best avoid them?
67. Have you any thought about Obsession?
68. Is it ever necessary to yield to unpleasant influences?
69. How would you get rid of psychic annoyances?
70. If you are a medium and also a mental healer, how do you function?

71. Have you any clear thoughts on Inspirational Speaking?
72. What is your idea of Automatic Writing?
73. Have you any theory accounting for Spirit-Materialization?
74. Have you any definite idea of Human Atmosphere or Aura?
75. How do we generate our auric belts and how do they protect us?
76. How should mediumistic children be dealt with?
77. Do mediums attract the spirit friends of those who apply to them?
78. What is the relative power of enlightened and unenlightened spirits?
79. Can you explain Hauntings and other uncanny phenomena?
80. Is mediumship of any practical value in a life-career?
81. Should we seek to repress mediumship?
82. Can we rightfully employ mediumship in business?
83. Is it ever lawful to use mediumship as a detective force?
84. What are the consequences of seeking spirit-communion to harm others?
85. Need we ever be afraid of unseen influences if we desire righteousness?
86. Has mediumship any connection with Insanity, when it is abnormal?
87. How would you set to work to regulate disorderly mediumship?
88. Can a medium be a highly individualized man or woman?
89. Are mediumistic experiences consistent with Self reliance?
90. Have religious ceremonies any effect on mediumship?
91. Is Yoga practice helpful in regulating mediumship?
92. Is mediumship universal or particular, or is it both?
93. Has mediumship any part to play in international affairs?
94. Can mediumship be proved of service in abolishing warfare?
95. Has education any influence on mediumship?
96. Can there be successful training grounds for mediums?
97. Is mediumship subject-to law, or is it purely erratic?
98. How can we control sensitiveness if we have suffered from it?
99. Give some sound practical advice to mediums who are unsuccessful.
100. Sum up the philosophy of the 12 Lessons.

REASON

THE world's leading Spiritual Magazine. REASON articles are from the illumined pens of such writers as Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Sir Oliver Lodge, W. J. Colville, Dr. Julia Seton, Dr. Edward B. Warman, Dr. J. M. Peebles, Daniel Hull, Cora L. V. Richmond, Prof. Edgar Lucien Larkin, Lillian Whiting and Dr. B. F. Austin.

As a thinker and student, you can't afford to be without "REASON."

$1.00 the year.
Send To-day!

Austin Publishing Co., Los Angeles, Cal.

Duke University Libraries
D00676846.

DUKE UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

DURHAM, NORTH CAROLINA
27706

UC-NRLF
$B 109 294

LIBRARY
OF THE
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.
GIFT OF J B Davy
Received July 1897.
Accession No. 66813 Class No.

ONESIMUS TEMPLETON

A PSYCHICAL ROMANCE

BY

W. J. COLVILLE

AUTHOR OF

"DASHED AGAINST THE ROCK," "STUDIES IN THEOSOPHY," "TEXT-BOOK OF MENTAL THERAPEUTICS," AND NUMEROUS METAPHYSICAL AND OTHER WORKS.

BOSTON:
BANNER OF LIGHT PUBLISHING CO., 9 BOSWORTH STREET.

ONESIMUS TEMPLETON

A PSYCHICAL ROMANCE

BY
W. J. COLVILLE
EDITOR OF
THE "PROBLEM OF LIFE"
AUTHOR OF
"DASHED AGAINST THE ROCK," "STUDIES IN THEOSOPHY," "TEXT BOOK OF MENTAL THERAPEUTICS," AND NUMEROUS METAPHYSICAL AND OTHER WORKS

NEW YORK
EDWARD LOVELL
142 WORTH STREET

151 C66
Cle

66814

BP605
06

ONESIMUS TEMPLETON.

CHAPTER I.

ON THE THRESHOLD.

On a bright summer evening in 1887, a party of friends were gathered on the balcony in front of an old-fashioned but comfortable house on Sycamore Avenue, almost in the heart of the business centre of New York. The house, though a very large and roomy one, attracts but little attention from the busy throng, as it is situated on one of those little frequented thoroughfares which still remain as mementoes of the old Dutch settlement of a by-gone day.

No. 312 Sycamore Avenue is at least one hundred years old, and has a wonderful, though but little known history. Like many residences of similar type, it has the reputation of being haunted, and for that reason the present tenant, Dr. Bernard Maxwell, is allowed to occupy a house of twenty-three rooms on payment of an annual rent of $750. The owner is a quaint old German with astrological proclivities, and though he is rarely in the city, between proprietor and tenant a feeling of generous friendship subsists though the two men are about as unlike in appearance, disposition and sentiment as two human beings can well be.

Gerald Gustav Mackenberger (the owner of the property) is a man over sixty, delighting in solitude and given over to the most ardent advocacy of stellar fatalism, while his tenant, Dr. Maxwell, is a handsome, cheerful, healthy man of forty, looking scarcely more than thirty. On the eventful evening when our story opens, Dr. Maxwell, a rising physician of the Electric School was entertaining a party of friends from Vermont, prominent among whom might have been discerned the striking and by no means unpleasing figure of the Rev. Onesimus Templeton, pastor of the Baptist Church at Saddlerock, Vermont. Mr. Templeton was the possessor of a face which could not but attract attention, for though not beautiful, it was strong and earnest, and the eyes shone with a yearning pleading light, as though an unsatisfied but aspiring soul was ever reaching through them to catch some knowledge from the heavenly spheres as yet denied it. In general appearance Mr. Templeton might be described as tall (five feet, ten inches or thereabouts), slender, narrow-chested, and inclined to stoop; hair and eyes very dark; hands small and delicate for one so tall, but not lacking in nervous power or sinuous determination. Raising his voice above the voices of his companions, who were all buzzing together after the manner of people gathered outside a drawing-room window after dinner on a summer's night, his whole attitude one of earnestness and deep conviction—the reverend Onesimus, addressing a portly lady at his side, exclaims: "My dear Mrs. O'Shannon, I tell you there never was and there never can be such a phenomenon as the one you have just described. The law of nature renders it impossible, unless (lowering his voice to an awe-struck, and certainly impressive undertone), which, heaven forbid, some imp of darkness should have been permitted to read the thought in your misguided daughter's mind."

"I tell you what it is, Mr. Templeton," replied the lady thus vehemently and awfully addressed, "if you are going to insinuate that my daughter Matilda is in league with the Evil One, you may as well stop your endeavors to convert me to your opinions on any subject; for a better, purer girl than my child you won't find this side the Atlantic, though I do say it, who being her mother should let others sound her praises."

"What's all this loud talking about between you two this evening," breaks in a cheery, rich, round voice and Dr. Bernard Maxwell, turning an amused glance on the excited combatants who were evidently amusing the passers-by, suggests that for the present, at least, all heated discussions on psychology shall be abandoned, and the evening devoted to more rational and edifying enjoyment, "for (said the good doctor, smiling), when any two persons set out to convince each other by means of verbal strife, no possible progress in the work of mutual conviction can be made, as the needful conditions for making ideas plain to the understanding are of necessity absent, when either party is excited or in the least belligerent."

By way of turning the subject into a more attractive and gracious channel, without, however, altering the tide of the discourse, Dr. Maxwell (who was a brilliant conversationalist as well as a man of rare scientific and literary attainment), began to relate an incident of his recent voyage from Paris on the magnificent steamer, La Gascogne of the justly celebrated Transatlantique line. He spoke as follows:

"As I was sitting on deck one gorgeous evening in May, the sun slowly sinking beneath the waters as one never sees it set on land, I heard, or thought I heard a low, sweet, girlish voice whispering in my ear, 'Bernard, take care, I implore you, or the electric battery for which you paid 6,000 francs in Paris will be utterly destroyed. I can see where it is, if you cannot!' The voice, and more than that, the thrill accompanying the mystic utterance, so powerfully impressed me that I was being addressed by Heloise De Montmarte (the daughter of the dearest friend I have in all the world, and the man to whom I owe almost all my present success in my life's undertakings), that I hastened to my stateroom, and immediately discovered that my most valuable instruments and apparatus were in immediate danger of ruin by water. Hastily calling a steward, who quickly stopped the leakage from the wash bowl, I just prevented the water from soaking into the very place of all others from which I was particularly anxious to exclude all dampness. Ruminating on this extraordinary incident, I returned to my folding chair on deck, and resuming my old position, gazing out upon the water which the moon's soft rays were just beginning to glorify, I fell to meditating on the wonderfully complex problem of mental interaction never wholly absent from the minds of students of the nervous systems of men and animals, which has been for many years my specialty. As I pondered with ever increasing surprise upon this most timely experience which enabled me in the very nick of time, to save my battery from serious injury, I saw a thin blue cloud cross the sky, and from this cloud (apparently of ether), small but intensely bright electric sparks proceeded. Thinking it might be merely an optical delusion, I rubbed my eyes and looked again, determined this time not to be mistaken, when a soft, silvery laugh sounded at my elbow, and the clear, sweet tones of Heloise De Montmarte's peculiarly liquid and unmistakeable voice sounded clearly enough to me, though I am convinced no other person heard any sound. She said, 'Why, Bernard, have you forgotten what papa told you when we parted that I should always be able to warn you when anything specially needed your attention? and here I am to fulfil my father's word.'

"Almost dumbfounded, I answered her in thought, my lips, however, moved but in inarticulate utterance: 'But pray tell me where you are now and what you are doing?' No sooner had I given the words (mentally) to the ether, than a reply came close to my ear: 'Why, here, of course, talking to you. Papa's entertaining company in our salon, and I've retired early; my body is slumbering as peacefully as usual in my own room in the house you know so well, 33 Avenue de l'Imperatrice, but I can't stay any longer now, so good-bye, Bernard, and don't forget the alligator.' With these words the voice became silent and the mysterious presence had vanished from my side. I was alone, intensely alone it seemed after this experience, though the deck was well filled with passengers walking slowly and talking quickly as steamer passengers usually do on a balmy moonlight night in Spring."

"Oh, do tell us about the alligator," broke in Lydia O'Shannon (a graceful girl of eighteen summers), "I do so love queer pets. Is there an alligator in the house, and how did you get him?"

"Well (said Dr. Maxwell, laughing), if you are a good girl, you shall see him to morrow; he's asleep now in my aunt's bath-tub; he and she are great friends. Prof. De Montmarte gave him to me three years ago when we were travelling together in Florida. He seems to have grown up as a member of our family, never snaps or tries to bite, but why should he, when we treat him kindly and hold him under due restraint; is it not man's prerogative to hold the lower creation in subjection? What say you to this, Mr. Templeton, does the theology of the Baptist Church tolerate so much of theosophy?"

"I really cannot decide such a question without giving it long and prayerful consideration," responded the minister addressed, "but anyway, I shall be delighted to see your alligator whenever it is convenient to you to show him to me. Can we not step inside now and have a little music? Your electric system of lighting is such an improvement over old methods, we don't dread the heat generated by it."

So saying, Mr. Templeton, accompanied by Mrs. and the Misses O'Shannon, moved into the large, roomy salon devoted to almost every conceivable modern use. Elegantly but simply furnished, it portrayed clearly the disposition of the man who rented it; no sign of niggardliness on any hand, neither any presumptuous display; all things solid, substantial, comfortable, cheerful, and withal beautiful.

Just as the friends were composing themselves and assuming a listening attitude, for Miss Lydia O'Shannon was taking her seat at the grand piano, which was one of Leven-stein's very best, a bright, handsome boy of twelve devoted to Dr. Maxwell, who had been more than a father to him when he was left an abandoned orphan eight years earlier, threw open the door and announced, "Monsieur Alphonse de Kabriet." Immediately following the announcement of the name, a dashing but not particularly refined young man about twenty-five years of age sauntered into the room, and seated himself without invitation in the most spacious and comfortable arm-chair in the apartment; of course he bowed and murmured "good evening," on entering, but seeing no one present who impressed him with any sense of special dignity, he took no pains to alter his usual nonchalant manner, which seemed to say more plainly than any words could express: "I honor you by condescending to address you!"

Mons. Alphonse was of French descent, born and educated in New Orleans, accustomed to the theatrical stage and particularly to the box office, almost from infancy; exceedingly conceited, somewhat imposing in general appearance and with an amazing amount of self-possession not unmixed with a good supply of genuine "smartness." By means of these qualifications he had always managed to elbow his way either by sheer effrontery or subtle diplomacy, into the most exclusive circles of society. Having no very decided views on any subject, and knowing how to get on the right side of almost every susceptible person he encountered, extremely versatile in mediocre accomplishments, and speaking three languages, English, French, and Spanish fluently, if not always grammatically, he found himself by reason of no special merit, and no one knew exactly how or why, in the very midst of the most literary people in New York. The object of his present visit to Dr. Maxwell was to interest that gentleman in a series of lectures on Mental Science, for which he was endeavoring to secure a distinguished audience. These were to be delivered by Mrs. Felina Catsleigh, who having grown tired of unsuccessful theatrical ventures, had taken up Metaphysics as a means of livelihood.

Addressing Dr. Maxwell in his usual familiar manner, Alphonse begins, "This Mrs. Catsleigh beats all you've ever heard; you'll rave over her the first time you hear her, and isn't she a taking woman in a drawing-room! I don't pretend to follow her all the time, she's often too deep for me; but it's sound reasoning, I tell you, you ought to get her before the Medical Board; she'd open their eyes for them," and with this fervid eulogy of the new aspirant to fame in the ranks of "Mental Science Healing," Alphonse took from his pocket a parcel of circulars (at least 200), elegantly printed on toned paper, and about 100 tickets, pretty little conceits in embroidered cardboard, bearing the following inscription:

"Conversations Extraordinaires, Mme. Felina Catsleigh (of Paris) will give twelve lessons in Mental Science, teaching you how you need never be sick or unhappy, according to the latest revelation of Truth, at Poodleton Hall, W. Minerva Street, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays. Four weeks. First lesson, Tuesday, July 21, at 3 P.M. Tuition fee, $25."

"Considering the season is off, the terms are very low. All the other metaphysicians charge $50 and many of them $100," said Alphonse, patronizingly, "you would be foolish indeed, interested as you are in such things, to miss this unique opportunity."

"Well, I will take six tickets," said Dr. Maxwell, and straightway, that gentleman put $150 into the palm of the courteous Alphonse, who still remained seated, and who after remarking, "mighty good bargain," handed a receipt.

Mr. Templeton watching this transaction from his corner opposite the new-comer, eyed him severely, and sternly observed: "The new gospel is not as free as the old, I take it. $25 for twelve lectures is not a very small price to ask, I must say."

Though this remark was not intended for the ears of Alphonse, that gentleman who had cultivated his hearing as well as his sight to an unusual degree of perfection in his favorite capacity of trained spy and confidential private detective, rose from his languorous position, and drawing himself to his full height, sneeringly replied, with a contemptuous jeer in his voice:

"You parsons are nice people to talk about a free gospel. What with your fine churches hardly ever open, and your big salaries for which you do next to nothing (I mean no offense to you personally, sir, for I don't know you), you may well try and keep people from every place of amusement, and even endeavor to stop them from hearing lectures; it's all a blind, I say, you are afraid if they gave a dollar to anybody else you would go short. As to religion, that is well enough; but when it comes to taking the bread out of the mouths of those who work hard for it, as you never do, it's another matter. What say you, Dr. Maxwell?"

"My dear sir," said the gentleman addressed, "Mr. Templeton is a minister and our guest, consequently, I think it ill becomes you to assail the profession he honors, in our house and in his presence. You cannot render a service to your own ideas by such displays of feeling. I must reserve my own opinion for a more suitable occasion, however, as I have been appealed to, I confess I do not think Mrs. Catsleigh's terms exorbitant; and I feel certain we shall receive more than our money's worth in listening to her instructions. But pardon me, we were about to have some music when you entered. Will you not stay, and as I think it probable you are yourself a singer, may I ask you to favor us after Miss O'Shannon has given us that lovely gem of melody, Lambilotta's chef d'œuvre, 'O Give Me Wings'?"

Miss O'Shannon's voice was clear, sweet and musical,—not very highly cultivated, but tenderly expressive; and though she often appeared a light, frivolous girl, when she sang, her whole manner was altered; it seemed as though some wondrous inspiration fell upon her, lifting her entirely above her ordinary self, transforming her into a gifted seeress, blessed with the divine power of touching the deepest springs of human feeling through the avenues of song. When the touching strains had ended, and the breathless silence which had fallen on the company was breaking, as the fair young damsel resumed her ottoman at her mother's side, Alphonse stepped forward, and extending his hand to the lady, said in his most persuasive accents: "My dear Ma'amselle, will you not accompany me in 'Toreador?' " Receiving an approving nod from Dr. Maxwell, and "go, my child," from her mother, the gentle Lydia allowed herself to be led to the piano by Alphonse, who looking admiringly at himself in a pier glass opposite, twisted the ends of his moustuche, and adjusted his tie and watch chain, quite unnecessarily, while his accompanist was dashing off the prelude. Then bracing himself as though a bull fight were in reality about to commence, he shouted the boisterous composition of Bizet as though he was singing to an immense audience in a great opera house, apostrophizing the chandelier and waving a red silk handkerchief in his determination to act the song as well as sing it, he fairly persecuted the ear drums of his audience, who moved quickly to the furthest corners of the room while the performance lasted. Applause followed, and only too ready to accept an encore, he gave his own peculiar version of "Home Sweet Home," in a style that savored of bathos rather than pathos. His voice was undeniably powerful, and many of his tones were firm and good, but far too loud for a drawing-room, while his excessive mannerism greatly marred the effect of a vocally creditable effort. Looking unutterable things out of his coal-black eyes at the company whom he had so graciously deigned to delight (to use the language he invariably employed when puffing himself in those of the society journals to whose columns he could gain an entrance), he subsided into comparative repose on a neighboring sofa, where stretching himself at full length, he exclaimed:

"That is hard work, I tell you, I am hungry and thirsty and tired into the bargain, I suppose you have something nice going."

At these extraordinary remarks from a total stranger,

Dr. Maxwell touched an electric knob, and almost instantly a page appeared bearing a tray of choice but not extravagant edibles; the conversation then took a gastronomic turn, and one of the ladies addressed Alphonse in the following terms:

"I have heard, but do not of course know how true it is, that metaphysicians can eat anything; now I'm a martyr to indigestion and have just commenced to take electric treatment from our host, but he doesn't allow me any meat even. I am permitted to eat nothing but fruits and cereals, while my principal beverage is hot water; what does Mrs. Catsleigh say on this subject?"

"Well," responded that lady's representative, "you must ask her yourself, blessed if I know. When we dine together we have quail on toast, and lots of other delicacies, but sometimes when people are too nervous, she does tell them not to eat pork and shell-fish and some other things discarded by the Hebrews, of whom she seems very fond, especially when they are free with their coin."

"Excuse my interrupting you," broke in the well-modulated accents of Dr. Maxwell's always winning voice, "I do not think either of you understand what I feel to be the true position on the diet question. Mrs. O'Shannon concludes that I attach as much importance to the simple question of diet as those physicians who make obesity a specialty. I do nothing of the kind, but my studies with the learned and excellent Prof. Jerome de Montmarte in Paris, have led me to study the science of correspondences in a way slightly differing from that in which it is usually studied by the reputed disciples of Swedenborg,—a sage and seer for whom I confess unbounded respect and admiration. I feel it to be an essential factor in human development that we should accrete and absorb such of the forces of the invisible kingdoms of nature as correspond to those mental and moral traits we seek to develop, avoiding all indulgence in such appetites as tend earthward instead of heavenward. I am no advocate of long fasts, except in exceptional cases where a temporary rest from the work of physical assimilation is imperative, but I do indeed contend that the ordinary diet of artificialization,—miscalled civilization, is simply barbaric, it having neither justification in reason nor sanction in morals."

"But what is a fellow to eat?" questioned Alphonse, excitedly. "You don't expect us to subsist on roots and uncooked grains like some people who called at our rooms the other day and asked me to distribute 'Korokoo-heshun' literature among Mrs. Catsleigh's students?"

"Pardon me, my dear sir," replied the doctor, smiling. "I have no sympathy with fanatical extremists, and I consider cooked food in proper quantities and of the right kind, advantageous to us all as we are at present situated. I do not even banish meats entirely from my table, though I very rarely eat meat myself, and I induce all my patients to gradually break away from it, but the point I am aiming at is that there is a science of feeding as well as of everything else, and this science like all true sciences, has its foundation in spiritual not in physical chemistry. I hold that under extreme pressure of need, or in a state of unusually exalted spiritual feeling, the influence of anything and everything usually deleterious in its effects upon the human organism, can be successfully resisted; but under ordinary circumstances it is disorderly and absurd to tell people to eat and drink anything and everything because such words to the majority justify unlimited physical license. I do not say that the teachers and practitioners of 'Christian Science,' are other than extremely temperate in their demands and habits in such respects, but if they are bent on elevating the race, they must seek to wean people from excesses, not teach so as to imply their justification. I shall take the liberty of questioning Mrs. Catsleigh on these points as soon as she gives me an opening by raising them in her lessons, which I shall attend faithfully, with a view of learning all I possibly can of the system, of which, from all I hear, she is a brilliant and successful advocate."

"Oh, you and she will get on first rate," responded her agent, enthusiastically, "she always enjoys talking with doctors who know something, and I don't see that you and she are far apart in theory, whatever you may be in practice, but, bless me, it's 10:30, I must be going; I've three more engagements to-night, so ta ta." And with this unceremonious leave-taking, accompanied, however, by a profound and not ungraceful bow, the irrepressible Alphonse departed for pastures new.

As soon as he was gone the party drew themselves together in the pretty room, which was unusually attractive when softly illumined by electricity, and as though feeling some subtle sense of an invisible presence brooding near, all sat in profound silence for about five minutes, after which a soft, bird-like voice was heard piping in the room as though a telephone connected the apartment with some distant salon. No material telephone however, communicated with Prof. de Montmarte's Parisian residence, and it was the voice of his charming daughter, Heloise, which vibrated through the room in clear, penetrating accents. Mr. Templeton appeared thunderstruck; Mrs. O'Shannon visibly started. Dr. Maxwell listened quietly as though thoroughly used to such experiences, while Lydia gently rose, and taking her seat at the piano, began playing as she had never played before, a soft, dreamy composition of Schumann, the favorite composer of the lovely Heloise, whom she had never seen.*

As soon as Lydia rose from the instrument, the mystical, yet quite natural tones of the unseen visitor's voice spoke in the following words:

"I who am bodily asleep in Paris have been commissioned to visit you this evening and declare my presence thus, that our new friend (indicating Mr. Templeton) may know that the deep secret of his soul is not a secret to those who constitute the circle to which he belongs, though quite unconsciously to himself, save when an occasional glimpse behind the veil of man-made dogma permits him to gaze upon the spiritual temple of which the purest visible church is but a shadow. In a few months from now the bonds will be broken, the letter will be cast aside and the spirit revealed. You, my friend (addressing Mr. Templeton personally), have been reading Swedenborg in secret. You have pondered and prayed over the Arcana Cœlestia and Apocalypse Unveiled; you have struggled with doubts innumerable, and have counted it sin to question the interpretation put upon Scripture by your own and other evangelical sects; but light is to come to you very shortly, and through your own individual experience will you be led to cast aside all fetters of dead literalism. and preach the gospel as its spirit is revealed to you."

*The reader must bear in mind that the O'Shannon's were on a visit to Dr. Maxwell, and knew none of his European friends, indeed, they had never crossed the Atlantic. Heloise and her father had never met them in America.

To say that Mr. Templeton was startled would be to utterly fail to describe a tithe of his palpable emotion. He was literally convulsed with wonder; his agitation knew no bounds, and rising suddenly to his feet, he cried impetuously in his loudest tone, "My God, if this be true, how blind I have been in fighting it. Swedenborg's works, the very volumes alluded to by this mysterious, unseen speaker, are in my bureau drawer at home in Saddlerock, Vermont. I took them from a member of my congregation unknowingly, for when she moved to Boston she gave me all her theological library; these two books were among her collection; they were uncut and had evidently never been read—hardly noticed. Not feeling they were suitable for general perusal by my visitors, I took them to my chamber and locked them up among my private papers. They some way fascinated me, and I have been for some time past reading them nightly prior to retiring. This practice I only discontinued three days ago when I came to visit you on my summer vacation while my church is closed for renovation."

Once again the clear voice rang out through the apartment, "Have no fear, truth will not ask any of you to be its martyrs, though it calls on you all to be its fearless, tireless advocates. My father requests you to assemble here next Sunday at 10 P.M., to hold an electric seance, when I trust the truth of spiritual telegraphy will be yet more convincingly revealed to you. God's blessing is over you. I do not invoke it, I declare it."

As the clear, bell-like utterance subsided into silence, the household at 312 Sycamore Avenue felt a delightful sensation of rest steal over its every member, and seeking their respective couches did not find "balmy slumber" difficult to woo.

CHAPTER II.

A PRIMARY LESSON IN SPIRITUAL SCIENCE.

"Ah! might I soar beyond the sky,
And learning truth which ne'er can die,
Press on and on and never tire,
While listening to the angelic lyre,
Till comprehending music there,
Learn to make this small star more fair."

THE day following that on which our story opened was the occasion of the commencement of Mrs. Catsleigh's course of Metaphysical teachings, for which Dr. Maxwell had purchased six tickets, that he might invite his guests to share the profit of the instruction with him. As not unfrequently happens in New York city, during the heated term, this Tuesday morning was mild and breezy. A delightful wind was stirring, bearing with it "the odor of brine from the ocean," and so far relieving the tedium of midsummer heat, as to induce quite a crowd of persons usually too fatigued to stir, to become pedestrians.

Dr. Maxwell who was always an early riser, was out before 7, in company with Mr. Templeton who always rose at that hour in winter, and at a still earlier hour in summer. Sauntering along in Fuschia Park (one of those charming little oases in the city, which makes New York next to Paris, the most delightful of all metropolitan cities), the two gentlemen fell to conversing eagerly on the subject of the previous night's remarkable experience.

"How can we account for it," said the Rev. Onesimus, "unless we accept your interpretation, which is that the phenomenon owes its origin to its alleged cause? I cannot see how it can be otherwise. Imposition in your house is impossible and how could the cleverest impostor even though a superb ventriloquist, or master of a concealed telephone, or even phonograph, have known about those two volumes of Swedenborg in my private possession under lock and key, several hundred miles away. The circumstance is so startling, novel, and withal so exasperatingly inexplicable from the standpoint of my former prejudices that I cannot but believe we are on the verge of some discoveries in the field of mental science, whose importance to the world I do not dare to estimate even in fancy."

"My dear Mr. Templeton," responded Dr. Maxwell, "to me these singular occurrences have become so familiar, I no longer wonder at them any more than at the triumphs of electrical science. I experience communion with the unseen world as naturally as I breathe or discharge any of the duties pertaining to my avocation, all of which are startling and incomprehensible to the inexperienced in such matters. I never shared your prejudice against Spiritualism, and I never knew what it was to fear any other devil than the lower passions of our nature, which tempt us continually to err until we have subdued them to the spirit. My father and mother were both very liberal in their views, they never tried to force me to accept any special religious dogma; I was allowed to think and reason for myself. I went to a Unitarian Sunday-school regularly for seven years, where the superintendent and all the teachers were at one with the excellent minister Dr. Bellows, in urging us to cultivate our own moral instincts. I never knew a religion of fear, could never understand why people had such dread of the Almighty, and though the Unitarians with whom I was brought up were not Spiritualists, my aunt who is now residing with me, and who has an alligator for a pet, was during my boyhood a private clairvoyant. Her circumstsnces were fortunately such that she never needed to ask money for her services, she never advertised, and her possession of a rare psychic gift was known only to her intimate friends; only those of their acquaintance who by expressing themselves as anxious to investigate Spiritualism privately, were introduced to her. She never tried to obtain communications for anybody; the lower forms of 'fortune-telling' she detests, as I am sure you and I do; but frequently in the midst of ordinary conversation on the most indifferent matters, her fine expressive face will grow suddenly illuminated and her whole manner change. Then in a few exquisitely chosen sentences, she will point out to her amazed and reverent listeners, exactly how they should act in some important crisis.

Again and again, when a boy between twelve and fifteen, I have sat spellbound on a footstool at her feet, receiving counsel, wiser by far than even she (wise woman though she is) could give me in her ordinary state. How she detests the words 'control' and 'abnormal,' along with other common phrases used to express the subjugation of one will to the coercive dominance of another, with her it has always been illumination, inspiration, prophetic insight, anything you choose to call it; provided the word or phrase expresses exaltation not depression of humanity."

"But," interrupted Mr. Templeton suddenly, "how can your aunt then be in any sense a spiritualist or a medium, she cannot suppose herself enlightened by individual human minds, she must receive or think she receives a divine afflatus lifting her completely above the ordinary plane of normal consciousness to a much higher level of perception?"

"Permit me to explain," resumed the doctor, "there are distinctly two, if not more, spiritualistic schools. One school indeed does depress the individual, by attributing everything to the action of the 'disembodied' acting through the 'embodied,' as water pours through an unresisting pipe; but this school is as a rule, ignorant and bigoted, and has contributed nothing but iconoclasm and platitude to the literature of the day. It is to this school you must look for wretchedly ungrammatical speeches from the greatest grammarians who ever lived, and for direct messages from Osiris, Buddha, Plato, Confucius, and of course Jesus and his apostles, couched in language so ridiculous and conveying so little that one can scarcely wonder at the ridicule heaped on its advocates by a scoffing public. There is, however, another and ever enlarging school of truly intellectual and spiritually minded men and women who look to spiritual communion rather than to spirit control as the means of gaining genuine access to the realities of the invisible universe.

"Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten, whom I heard in New York before I went to college, impressed me as the beau ideal of intellectual womanhood; she never for an instant repudiated Spiritualism, though she constantly urged mediumistic persons not to neglect self-culture. My aunt and Mrs. Britten were once great friends, and when that lady was Miss Hardinge, they were frequently companions in psychical research. My aunt is a natural clairvoyant, whose gifts displayed themselves spontaneously in childhood; they were never of a physical order, tables and chairs were never agitated in her presence; but advice, warning, prophetic exhortation, and most marvelous insight into the past and future of those about her, distinguished her as a possessor of the rare gift of spiritual divination, which some of the most enlightened among orientals possessed in Bible times; and speaking of the Bible, I shall hope, Mr. Templeton, that you will join and assist us in our Bible-class, which meets at my house every Wednesday afternoon. We are now discussing the life of Joseph in the light of present day experiences, and I shall have something to say on two diametrically opposite kinds of divination mentioned in the story of his career, that I am sure will interest you. Persons of all shades of opinion fill my rooms to overflowing every week in the full season; as it is now late in July many of our usual frequenters have left the city, but several who are at Manhattan Beach and other accessible places come over as usual every Wednesday. I hope you will not get tired of so much argument. Mrs. Catsleigh this afternoon (who, by the way, I have an intense curiosity to watch and study as well as hear), and our Bible reading to-morrow—but, you told me you wanted to use your present holiday in investigating psychism, as you expressed it in your letter. I am, I think, as good as my word, if not better, in affording you facilities; my house is a perfect rendezvous for persons who are studying the 'occult;' a word, by the way, which I greatly dislike, though I can understand it as signifying to many people an endeavor to bring hidden things to light; perhaps it is permissible, though I think decidedly infelicitous."

As Mr. Templeton expressed himself as only too glad and indeed most anxious to see and hear as much as possible between that day and September 1st, when he must return to Saddlerock, a neighboring clock sounded the hour of nine, so the two friends hastened their steps homeward to join the rest of our party at the breakfast table. They entered the breakfast-room just as Mrs. Priscilla Finchley (Dr. Maxwell's aunt and housekeeper) was pouring out the coffee and distributing the eggs. It was an invariable rule at 312 Sycamore avenue that no one should wait for anybody else. Meals commenced at the appointed hour punctually, those who heard the gong and responded, took their seats at the table; those who were out or engaged came in when it suited them. This arrangement was necessary to the Doctor's comfort and convenience, as his numerous professional duties made it impossible for him to be a slave to tabular conventionalities, and it suited every inmate of his household to perfection. Visitors were never under the necessity of hurrying home to get something to eat at a particular moment; the Doctor kept "open house" literally, and simple but delicious food was always ready for any one who wanted it, a few minutes after such need was expressed.

Whenever the whole party could assemble at the table they invariably did so, for nothing is so charming as to eat leisurely in pleasant company. Mrs. Finchley was a model housekeeper; though a true "Mary," she had enough "Martha" in her disposition to prevent her from ever forgetting the physical necessities of those for whom it was her delight to provide. She was perfectly in sympathy with her nephew and understood him thoroughly as well as he understood himself, and the greatest charm of his development was that he had reached a point where he had made his own acquaintance; he thus knew exactly what he wanted, and so did not manifest caprice.

Mrs. Finchley had just passed fifty-eight when we were first introduced to her. Her hair was soft silver gray, ornamented with a simple lace head-dress, quite unpretentious but of attractive design; her complexion was youthful in the extreme; no paints, powders, lotions or cosmetics (foul relics of barbarism), had been allowed to injure her exquisite white skin; her hands and face were entirely free from wrinkles, and in her soft cashmere gown, ornamented with a single spray of heliotrope at the throat, she appeared like an elder sister of her handsome nephew. He looked thirty, she scarcely over forty; their ages were forty and fifty-eight respectively. Workers they were and had ever been, but worriers they were not. They rested in work, by working restfully and resting actively they solved the problem of health and contentment; though always occupied they were rarely if ever even slightly fatigued.

Miss Lydia O'Shannon looked very sweet and spirituelle in a snow-white muslin gown decorated with pink rosebuds, while her portly mother, in her elaborate robe de chambre, which she insisted on wearing at the breakfast table, looked like what she was,—a very good-natured, but not exceedingly reposeful Irishwoman of not quite the highest type.

Matilda O'Shannon was a gentle, nestling creature, perfectly enamored of Mrs. Finchley, by whose side she sat in quiet happiness, scarcely exchanging a word with anybody at the table, but evidently enjoying her coffee, toast and egg, with fresh watercress, more than many a princess surrounded by her courtiers, enjoys a sumptuous palace banquet. During breakfast the party was talkative, as all parties should be when eating. One of Dr. Maxwell's inflexible rules for his patients was, "Never eat rapidly, never eat when your mind is unquiet, never eat in gloomy silence, never think of what you are eating." If this rule, a practical lesson in four brief sentences, is studied and acted upon by dyspeptics, dyspepsia will soon be no more.

After breakfast, the doctor having patients to see and letters to write, the ladies with Mr. Templeton as their escort, took a walk in the direction of Central Park. They started up Fifth Avenue, talking pleasantly all the way, till they found themselves within the park enclosure, ready to appreciate the shade of the lofty trees after their long walk. Mr. Templeton said to Mrs. Finchley: "Your nephew and I have been freely discussing you this morning. He tells me you have been a clairvoyant from childhood, but never attempt to use your gift except when some inspiration comes to you unbidden. I only want to say that if ever you feel like giving me a message I shall be truly grateful, as since last evening my mind has undergone considerable change toward all such matters. I never scoffed, but I doubted and feared until last night; the impression left upon me by that astounding revelation, has killed my prejudice, considerably allayed my fears, and made me intensely desirous of studying for myself the mysteries of the borderland which I begin to feel are not so mysterious to some of you as they have always appeared to me."

While he was yet speaking, a sudden flash of light seemed to flit over Mrs. Finchley's fine, intellectual forehead, and answering him almost before his voice had died away, she said, "Chosen of heaven, thou hast a mission of love to fulfill. The world is thy church, and thy congregation shall know the truth through thee as they have never heard it before; six weeks shall prove enough to open thine inward eyes, and at the end of thy vacation here thou shalt return to the scene of thy former labors to break fresh bread and present new wine to thy flock; changes are before thee; these in due course shall be explained. Rest! REST! REST! Let not thy mind be anxious, nor thy heart grow sad; there is for thee reserved a noble chair in the prophetic college to which thy willing steps shall soon be led. Trust! TRUST! TRUST! All will be well. Daily thy bread shall come and to-morrow's work cannot be portrayed to-da "

Words are dead, lifeless things on paper oftentimes, but when from the lips of an inspired speaker accents fall glowingly with living power, the human voice seems indeed a telephone transmitting to earthly ears sounds begotten in a higher world. So felt Mr. Templeton when Mrs. Finchley ceased speaking, and the sudden accession of brightness left her brow, and all relapsed into sweet meditative silence in which more of truth perhaps is often realized by receptive minds, than the most impassioned eloquence can express. Slowly and peacefully wending their way back to the park gates and through them to the nearest station of the elevated road, the party wended their course back to Sycamore avenue where a light collation awaited them at 1:30.

By three o'clock they were all in their seats at Poodleton Hall, awaiting the appearance of Mrs. Felina Catsleigh. About seventy-five people were present, fifty at least of them middle-aged ladies of thoughtful mien and soberly attired. A few gentlemen were scattered among the audience, mostly literary and professional men; two or three young medical students gave variety to the scene, as they were evidently present to take notes and air their own superior knowledge when the question hour gave them an opportunity.

Mons. Alphonse flashily dressed, sporting some very large diamonds and generally to all appearance intent on impressing everybody with his importance, bustled hither and thither, talking loudly as he showed people to vacant chairs, adjusted the light and made himself useful in twenty ways at once. At five minutes past three the curtain rose (the hall was often used for theatrical purposes), and seated on the stage in a reposeful attitude, her bare arm leaning on a table decorated with a few books and papers, a choice bouquet of roses in a very handsome porcelain vase, a lace handkerchief and a large white feather fan, appeared the heroine of the hour, clad in blue silk trimmed with white lace, her raven hair and finely shaped hands glittering with rubies. Slowly rising from her peaceful attitude, bowing and smiling to her audience, Mrs. Catsleigh advanced to the front of the platform holding a dainty manuscript in her hands:

"My very dear friends," she began in well modulated accents, "we are here to investigate and if possible to solve the problem of life immortal. Man is a thought of Deity, we are not the clay of which our bodies are formed; we are living, spiritual, eternal entities. God is good, and so are we. Sweet friends, can we ever reach the sad, the suffering, the toil-worn masses of mankind, until we realize the unity of life and allow human brotherhood to mean for us infinitely more than a stock expression. We must know ourselves to know our neighbors, and when I think of the beautiful graciousness which is ever indicative of a true reformer, I venture to say if man is liberated at all from the bonds of error which now oppress the race, it will only be through the blessed matchless instrumentality of divine human love."

A murmur of applause ran through the room. Dr. Maxwell and Mrs. Finchley smiled and exchanged approving glances. Mr. Templeton looked both surprised and delighted. Many of the "blue stockings" clapped, and one or two elderly gentlemen tapped the floor with their walking-sticks, and said, "Hear, hear!"

Proceeding for exactly an hour in a similar strain, Mrs. Catsleigh defined the distinction between spiritual, mental and medical therapeutics, and ended by inviting questions from the audience. As the audience was a very inquiring as well as intellectual one, many persons availed themselves of her offer which was most cordially extended to all present.

"We left our friends alone in the ground when we were materialists," exclaimed an elderly gentleman in the rear of the hall, "but now, since the light of immortality has been revealed to us, we know they can never die; at least, I speak for myself and many friends of mine. Do I understand you to say, Madam, that mediumship is a mortal delusion, and that the departed never communicate with earth?"

Mrs. Catsleigh immediately answered as follows: "My dear sir, I do not think you have quite understood the drift of my discourse; or, perhaps you have attributed to me the opinions of some one else. I am no one's echo, I have studied with three or four of the most widely known Christian and Mental Scientists, and I have dipped somewhat into Theosophy. I am myself an independent thinker, and though I quote from others, and often refer to something I have read, I never dogmatize on what I do not understand; and for the life of me I cannot see how any intelligent advocate of metaphysical healing is going to successfully refute the philosophy of Spiritualism. As to the phenomena, that is another matter, and I don't care to discuss it with my class because I want to keep to my subject on the twelve afternoons we are to spend here, and that is 'How to get well when you are ill,' and what is more important yet, How to keep well when you are not ill.'"

Herewith one of the medical students arose and put the following essay-question to the fair lecturer: "We know disease is in the air, it is a living creature, we can see it through the microscope. Now, how is your thought or mine or anybody's going to keep parasites out of the blood or eject them after they have once entered? I grant you nervous fancies can be dispelled by mental methods, but we all know that, and in our college studies we learn to practice mentally whenever mental cure is practicable. The regular school to which I belong is the only truly eclectic school in the world; it is neither alopathic or homœopathic, all 'pathies are irregular, and all 'pathists are therefore quacks. Now how are you going to improve on our methods or teach us anything we do not already know? You are simply taking a fraction out of our perfect system and holding that up as the whole."

Having delivered himself of this grandiloquent effusion, Mr. Horatio Bonen resumed his seat with an air which caused his companion, who evidently thought him a lion, to whisper not by any means inaudibly (whispers are rarely unheard at a distance), "She is squelched this time."

"Is that a question or an essay?" began Mrs. Catsleigh in reply. "If we have many of equal length our exercises will certainly not have the fault of undue brevity, but comments aside, I will answer you. My experience with medical men has taught me two things. First, very few doctors even attempt to teach the science of health to their patients, probably because a fashionable clientele could rarely be maintained if truth were very plainly spoken to aristocratic invalids; second, doctors do not always know quite as much as they think they do, and sometimes, what with mistakes in diagnosing, prescribing, and ultimately in the compounding of prescriptions, a large unnecessary mortality takes place. If I am feeling unwell and take a dose of medicine, I learn nothing, I do not know what occasioned my illness, I do not know what I have been taking to remove it; for, I am not a Latin scholar, nor have I served as an apothecary; I do not know how the evil is overcome, nor how to ward off similar attacks in future. I personally am not a physician but a teacher, and doctor correctly translated means teacher and nothing else. Now granting your regular practice is all you claim it to be, it may cure me at a certain time of a pain or local ailment, but it does not instruct me in the science of life. I was an invalid four years, often had to be helped off the stage, and then took to my bed for weeks at a time, but I never knew what ailed me until I was introduced to Mrs. Amy Pushing, whom no doubt some of you know well. After six weeks treatment from her I was well, and now I can defy the elements and eat everything I please. Six weeks with Mrs. Pushing did for me what four years painful experience with, I cannot tell how many eminent physicians, never began to accomplish."

Applause ran through the audience at this testimony. Some of Mrs. Pushing's friends, of whom there were several present, became quite excited and cheered lustily, when the discussion began to take a new turn. Rising slowly, at the back of the hall, and speaking in quiet but ringing accents, Dr. Enamel Plategold, President of the Crowningfalse Dental University, a great authority on occult matters as well as on dentistry, said: "Do you know that you are doing very wrong in seeking to interfere with the operation of inexorable Karmic justice; to seek to hinder the working out of anybody's Karma is a fatal error fraught with disastrous consequences to all parties implicated?"

Mrs. Catsleigh was equal to the occasion, for, literally springing to the edge of the platform, her countenance suffused with animation, her eyes glittering like gems, she replied in positive and thrilling tones: "Does my would-be opponent not clearly see that his absurd misapplication of the law of restitution or compensation, rules out his practice and that of all dentists, surgeons and physicians, fully as much as mine or that of any Mental Scientist; if every pain we suffer is a result of Karma and we must suffer to the bitter end? Why extract a decayed tooth which gives pain to its possessor? Why apply ether, nitrous-oxide gas, or any other anæsthetic to deaden sensation during the extraction? Why permit the surgeon's knife, or the physician's or nurse's pill, powder, lotion or plaster to relieve bodily distress? And (warming to the subject as she made a yet stronger point, and gave a more effectual reply to her interlocutor), why not put down education, for instruction such as I give is mental unfoldment. I teach you Karmaites how to become capable of making good Karma wherewith to replace evil, to use your own favorite Sanskrit word, which the majority of English-speaking people apprehend but dimly. If past existences have yielded to us the fruits of suffering, so long as we remain ignorant of truth, so long shall we suffer; whereas, the moment new light breaks in upon our hitherto darkened minds, we shall learn how not to evade but conquer Karma." This answer was very warmly received by nearly every one present, though it appeared to have little or no effect upon Dr. Plategold who was evidently sincere, but so utterly wedded to the curious theories of a certain cult which seems to see no good outside of Hinduism, that he could not understand how Mrs. Catsleigh's answer met the case. Like many others, he persuaded himself that she was a gifted sophist, and though he could not repudiate her conclusion, there and then in adequate phrases, he fully expected to be able to shiver it to atoms before the next lesson. The tide now began to turn in a distinctly theological direction. The speaker in her remarks had spoken of the divine indwelling light in the soul of man, this she had styled man's veritable savior. Mr. Templeton was naturally anxious to know how a woman of her views would deal with the orthodox plan of salvation; and therefore in no carping spirit, but eagerly seeking information, the Baptist minister addressed her in effect as follows:

"You have told us that we have within us the means of salvation from sin, sickness and death, you have spoken glibly of the essential Christ which seems to me the platonic but not the Christian logos, and though you have freely quoted from the Gospels and said nothing whatever against any portion of the sacred Scriptures, I fail to see how you explain redemption satisfactorily without a personal redeemer, who was as truly a historic person as Julius Cæsar."

"Well, I confess I don't know everything, and I am not seeking to overturn anybody's religious convictions unless they can be proved detrimental to human welfare. I cannot accept the orthodox interpretation of vicarious atonement; it has always struck me as dreadfully unjust, and are not your ablest ministers and bishops to-day putting quite new interpretations upon old creeds and catechisms? Now as I understand the matter, God is never angry, we fancy He is when we rebel against the light within, then when we adjust ourselves harmoniously to the universe by means of a correct understanding of truth and the practice of what we know, we discover that our ideas of God's anger have arisen entirely from our own fears and mental darkness. Of course, I cannot cover the whole field of theology in an answer to a question, but I think I have given you the key so that you may unlock the subject at your leisure on the line I have indicated."

LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY

"Are you never ill?" broke in a harsh, rasping voice from the centre of the room, and all eyes instinctively turned in the direction of a sallow, spectacled cynic, a critic employed by the Weekly Venomspleen, a paper devoted to scurrilous attacks on personal reputations in the pretended interest of immaculate morality.

"Are you ever well?" queried Mrs. Catsleigh of her sickly-looking questioner; "the way to be well is to think no evil, speak no evil, talk no evil, and WRITE no evil of anybody or anything. We are none of us perfect; I know I am still very imperfect, therefore I do not enjoy entire immunity from distress, but contrasting my mental and physical condition to-day with what it was a year ago, I may say truly, I am well. I was never so well before, never so capable of sustaining exertion without fatigue, never so happy and light-hearted as at the present moment; and while I thank God for everything, I owe my recovery, humanly speaking, to my dear friend and teacher, Mrs. Pushing, whom I hope you will all meet and learn to know and love as I do."

"What do you mean by God? I don't know of any God; Nature's enough for me," queried Mr. Henry Jackdaw, a man of considerable ability, but weighted down with an intolerable burden of egotism; sub-editor of the Buried Age, and vice-President of the "International Society for De-constitutionalizing Religion."

"What is Nature?" asked Mrs. Catsleigh. "Nature means that which is born as well as that which gives birth. When I use the word God, I do not try to fix in my mind the idea of a big man, I mean to imply simply that all is GOOD, and as good cannot be conceived of in its highest sense apart from consciousness, I agree with Bulwer (Lord Lytton) in believing that the Coming Race will style the Infinite all-pervasive Mind which rules the universe, the All-Good. God means the Good One, and I affirm that without a focal point at which to rivet thought, philosophy is chaos and we are all simply arguing in a circle or a maze. 'All is Good, there is no Evil,' will be the subject of my next lesson, then I shall hope to discuss the subject with you far more fully; it is already 5:30, and from two to three hours is quite long enough for any single session, even though the questions are diversified and represent many phases of thought. I do not wish to be regarded as a dogmatist, I do not ask any one to accept my conclusions; consideration is all I ask for my feeble words. Not through oratory, but by an appeal to the intelligence and heart of all before me, shall I ever seek to explain as far as my limited knowledge will permit, the truth of man's real being. I thank you more than I can express for your kind and gracious attention here to-day; you have, many of you, supported me more than I can make you understand in my somewhat arduous task of opening classes in mid-summer in a new place before an unknown audience. Those who come to learn will, I hope, be edified by an interchange of thought; those who know everything can of course learn nothing more, and I rather wonder they waste their precious time in this assembly. I invite you all to my reception on Friday evening at the Quicksilver Hotel; you all know where it is, corner of Lemon Avenue and Orange Street. Come as soon as you can, not later than 8 o'clock, and stay as long as you are disposed to talk; we'll try and have a social time together. I always like to become personally acquainted with my students, but I cannot call upon them all, they are too numerous, and live too far apart, and I am far too busy. My agent, Mons. Alphonse de Kabriet, who awaits you at the door, will furnish you with all information you may require. Again thanking you, au revoir till Thursday at 3 o'clock prompt."

The curtain fell noiselessly as it had risen, and Mrs. Felina Catsleigh disappeared, bowing and smiling behind its advancing folds.

"Well, what do you think of her?" was Dr. Maxwell's exclamation as soon as he and his friends were on the street; "she astonishes me, I cannot comprehend how such a woman as she appears to be can give such amazingly profound spiritual instruction. I would not have you imagine for a moment that I think her an objectionable woman, but she appears very worldly. Look at her general get-up; we know she has been an actress, but I think stage dresses and effects a little out of place at a Metaphysical matinee."

"I more than agree with you," responded Mr. Templeton. "I confess I was almost shocked at first, she was, in my opinion, most unbecomingly attired, and then her affected mannerisms were completely out of keeping with the time, place, and circumstances; but of course you noticed how quickly the most conspicuous of them left her when she was without her notes and warmed up to her subject; you I know are something of a Spiritualist and your aunt is avowedly a medium of a very exceptional order; do you think she is under any 'influence' while speaking, or do you agree with Hartman in his work on 'Magic,' in which he attributes an orator's supposed inspiration to the mental conditions of the audience and quite ridicules the agency of 'spirits' in the matter? you see I've been looking at some of the books on your table."

"My dear friend, I am very glad to know you are reading in this line; the book to which you refer gives much salutary advice, and were I to eliminate its objectionable portions I would gladly put it into the hands of all enquirers, but as it stands, I must take decided exception to such statements as the one you have specially referred to. Most specialists read but one side and look at matters from one point of view only. I find this a great drawback to the merit and reliability of their teachings. Professor Huxley, for instance, whose Lay Sermons embody much of the deepest wisdom I have come across in modern literature, allows prejudice to completely warp his judgment when he treats on Spiritualism. The Seybert Commissioners of Philadelphia made a perfect wreck of their investigations from the same cause; it is not logical to declaim against prejudice in the strongest terms, and then manifest it immediately afterwards; but this is exactly what many educated persons are continually doing whose inconsistency is evidently not apparent to themselves. I cannot see how an unbiased man can attribute to the mental efflux of an audience, ideas and sentiments entirely foreign to the opinions of that audience in all respects; to go no further than my own family, my aunt Mrs. Finchley, has frequently persisted in giving communications to her friends utterly at variance with their opinions and entirely beyond the scope of her own experience, while that queen of platform orators, Mrs. Britten, who was for many years my aunt's particular friend, has been known repeatedly to go before large and bigoted companies of people, and pour forth burning tides of eloquence in direct opposition to their darling theories, to the astonishment of all who heard her. I never accept anything without proof, but to dismiss a great subject with satirical flippancy and attempt to explain it away by means of a statement utterly at variance with an enormous mass of thoroughly authentic fact, is to impose on popular credulity and betray one's own weakness. I repeat what I have said many times, the simple philosophy of Spiritualism unadulterated with cant and untarnished with absurd pretensions, is to me the only philosophy which does or can solve the problem of life here and hereafter. I believe the action of mind upon mind to be in many cases utterly independent of the corporeal organism which mind uses as a workman employs a tool, or a musician an ingeniously constructed instrument. When Sunday evening comes and we hold our promised circle, I shall hope to initiate you much further into the truth as we perceive it on all those subjects; now it is time for dinner, and as we have had a good deal of mental food to-day which we can digest at our leisure, I propose that after a light but satisfying repast, we run over to Coney Island and see the fireworks; we can get there by 8:30 and be home again at midnight."

"I for one, shall be delighted," responded Mr. Templeton, with alacrity, and the rest of the party chiming in, they quickened their pace homeward, then speedily adjusted their toilets and after a delicious but exceedingly simple dinner found themselves crossing the water under the light of the silvery moon which was then at its full and just rising, in ample time to reach the island for a display of pyrotechnic skill, which to those who, like Mr. Templeton, had lived all his days in quiet seclusion from popular gayeties, must appear as a feat almost beyond man's unaided power to accomplish.

CHAPTER III.

SPIRIT AND LETTER.

"I seek for Truth where'er 'tis found,
On Christian or on Pagan ground;
The Truth alone can set us free
And lead us, Oh, our God to thee."

THOSE of our readers who have ever visited Coney Island in summer, know how supremely beautiful is the whole enchanting scene. The rolling of old ocean, the superb strains of the incomparable band, the brilliant electric illumination of the island, the gorgeousness of the palatial hotels, and to cap the climax the unequaled pyrotechnic display in the late evening, contribute to render the scene a veritable realization of childhood's dreams of fairyland. Suddenly transported from scenes of sober thought and strenuous argument to this gay haunt of what should be pure and innocent enjoyment, the minister from Vermont was affected more strangely than he had ever been in his life before. On the way home he was quiet to taciturnity, and seeing that his mood was reflective instead of talkative, Dr. Maxwell, Mrs. Finchley, and the three O'Shannon's fell to talking briskly among themselves about the prospects of the world in the 20th century, if the present pace of improvement in mechanical skill should become accelerated during the next few years.

Mr. Templeton, in his semi-recumbent posture on the steamer deck, apparently dozing in an obscure corner, though he had no wish to talk, listened with breathless wonder to some of his host's astounding statements concerning man's power over the elements. The fireworks had led Mrs.

O'Shannon to question Mrs. Finchley as to the possibility of bringing rain from the clouds in periods of dearth, by means of pyrotechnic display; "for," said she, "I have always observed, when fireworks have been let off in great quantities, showers have fallen soon after." This remark was called out by a slight sprinkling of rain which led the party to seek a more sheltered corner on the boat.

Dr. Maxwell, after listening to his aunt's brief reply to her friend's question, volunteered some amazing information he had collected when in France, from members of the Academy, to the effect that rain can be produced at will by human ingenuity; for provided Governments are willing to make sufficiently large appropriations, scientists now living are quite ready to construct and set in motion electrical rain-producing apparatus, as they are also prepared to perfect long talked of schemes of aerial navigation. Bulwer's wings on his Vril-Ya in the "Coming Race," are simple and quite practical mechanical contrivances; but until a new industrial system is in vogue, these great inventions cannot be fairly tested for lack of means, as the wealth of no individual is apt to be available for such purposes, whose first cost would be necessarily enormous. However, when co-operation shall become universal, science will not be fettered as it now is for lack of means, and in the next century education will doubtless have made such rapid strides that the incredulity now so prevalent whenever such subjects are broached will have almost entirely disappeared. In the natural evolution of events, unless some remarkable backward current sets in, it cannot be another half century before many of the most utopian expectations of the world's savans will be fully realized,—first in America and then in Europe. America will doubtless take precedence even when European scientists are the projectors of the schemes, not because of the superior intelligence of the American nation, so much as on account of the readiness of a newer country to try measures which the conservatism of the old world would wish to see fully perfected elsewhere before favoring their introduction into European countries. Talking in this strain with considerable animation till the boat landed at the Twenty-third Street pier, our friends regaled themselves with encouraging foregleams of happier days in store, days we must not only hope and pray for, but WORK for with all our might. By 1 A.M. the household at 312 Sycamore Avenue was again rocked in the peaceful arms of Morpheus, and it was late on the following morning before any one awoke.

During the night Mr. Templeton had a singular prophetic dream, and when he presented himself at breakfast just as the others were about to rise from the table, his countenance wore an unusually thoughtful expression. He was rather silent, but not at all morose, nor did he seem mentally disturbed, only intensely anxious to learn more of the mysterious science on whose threshold he felt himself palpably standing. Dr. Maxwell, divining his unspoken wish for a private confidential talk, said pleasantly: "Come into the library about 11; I shall be disengaged for an hour then; I have a good deal to say to you. Now go, all of you, and visit the alligator." The parties to whom the alligator had been mentioned before (Lydia O'Shannon in particular) were all anxiety to see the wonderful creature which dwelt in Mrs. Finchley's private bath-room.

The house was one of those comfortable roomy ones, built when land was cheap and people had no idea of squeezing twenty people into a house too small for ten. The best bed-rooms had private dressing-rooms attached, not little closets, but good-sized rooms, much larger than the "elegant hall chambers" so often let to single persons at fabulous rents all over the city, and which are considered large if they are as roomy as fair-sized dog-kennels. Mrs. Finchley's room was over the drawing-room; Dr. Maxwell's was a flight above. Either of those rooms would have comfortably seated one hundred and fifty persons had the furniture been displaced by benches, and then there would have been room for a good sized platform at one end. Leading out of the main room was a dressing-room more like a conservatory than a bath-room. Ferns and tropical plants were growing freely there; one side of the wall was entirely of glass and looked directly out upon the spacious garden which extended for quite a distance in the rear of the house. In a bath-tub reposed a small alligator from Florida, who awoke with a gentle start and looked up with quite an intelligent expression when his mistress called: "Jefferson, show yourself to these good people."

"He is quite tame and never offers to snap," said Mrs. Finchley, as slight signs of alarm began to be depicted on the countenances of her guests, "now, get up, Jeffy, and fetch the paper." The obedient creature slowly climbed over the side of the tank, and following the lady like a lazy dog, slowly advanced into the adjoining room, where picking up the morning Times, handed it to her as though he fully understood his business. She took it from his jaw just as she would have done from the mouth of a favorite dog; she then fed him with varieties of vegetation upon which members of his species thrive. He took his food from her hand with all the docility of a well-trained horse, and then followed her back to his own chamber, where he peacefully reclined on a bank specially constructed for his accommodation on the edge of the water. "Human electricity, that is all," smilingly explained Mrs. Finchley, in answer to numerous inquiries from those who had witnessed the performance. "Prof. de Montmarte assured me the words of the Apostle James are literally accurate according to his experience: 'Every kind of beasts and birds, of creeping things and things of the sea, is tamed by mankind.' (James iii., verse 7, revised version.) When true theosophy breaks through the encumbering mass of oriental legend and superstition which now envelops it, and when theosophists live as well as preach what Gautama taught; and when Christians put the precepts of the gospel into practice, it will not be long before another Paul may shake a viper from his unharmed hand, and man in the image of Deity may exercise as well as claim divine prerogatives and show himself the 'lord of nature all.' I am a very humble and untutored disciple of truth, but poor though my attainments, and many my weaknesses, I have learned by curbing my own rising anger and other base emotions, to subdue in some measure the lower animals to my will; as a child, nothing grieved and angered me more than to see a dumb creature ill-used. I used to collect pennies from the children in my class when I taught in a Sunday-school, to send to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, a noble society of which my nephew is a distinguished member. When that dastardly villainy known as vivisection dared to expose its viperish head clad in the borrowed plumes of science in the college where he was studying, my nephew (then only twenty-one) refuted the ablest professor on his own ground and won a gold medal for the finest essay ever presented on the subject. We will rule by kindness or not at all; that is our motto. We leave cruelty to brutes and savages, and in them we seek to overcome it.

"I was at one time in the presence of Dr. Anna Kingsford in London; she and I had more soul communion in one hour than I have enjoyed with any other woman in a lifetime. I shall never forget her. Fragile in body, but beautiful withal —beyond the ordinary beauty of fair women—strong in intellect, tender in heart, noble beyond description in the purpose of her life; this gentle, graceful heroine fought and conquered the most virulent opposition on the anti-vivisection platform, and was to the French Academicians a star beaming with celestial lustre. Dear, brave, noble, saintly woman, her memory will live in the grateful hearts of humanity when time shall be no more."

Visibly affected by Mrs. Finchley's emotion, her guests repaired slowly to their various enjoyments. Mr. Templeton had a long chat with Dr. Maxwell in the library; and the O'Shannons took books and fancy work into the garden. At 1:30 they were all again at the table enjoying a well-cooked lunch and pleasurably anticipating the Bible class which commenced precisely as the clock struck three. Dr. Maxwell and all the inmates of his household filed into the large drawing-room which every Wednesday afternoon assumed the appearance of a singularly attractive lecture room. At one end on a small movable platform stood a handsome eagle lectern containing a large open Bible, near by stood a fine, sweet toned cabinet organ, and in its vicinity, a number of young ladies who raised their tuneful voices to the accompaniment of the music, and sang very melodiously Samuel Longfellow's beautiful and inspiring hymn, commencing:

"God of ages and of nations,
Every race and every clime,
Hath received thine inspirations
Glimpses of thy truth sublime."

During the singing no one entered, and no one committed the atrocious vulgarity of whispering, much less of talking aloud. When the hymn ceased, Dr. Maxwell offered a short, fervent aspiration, one could hardly call it a prayer, for it did not at all resemble the ordinary prayer one is accustomed to hear at religious gatherings, in which the Almighty is informed of what He is and told how to act for the good of the universe. An act of trust would better describe this helpful utterance, which harmonized the thoughts of all present, and so unified the atmosphere of the room, that a stranger entering could not fail to be impressed with a delightful sense of one accord. After this exercise, a young lady with a pure, cultivated voice, sang "O, Rest in the Lord." During the solo breathless silence pervaded the apartment; by due attention to these opening exercises, all minds were attuned for the instruction which followed. The door which had remained closed during the fifteen minutes occupied by the two musical selections and the aspiration, was then opened for a moment, and a few late-comers quietly slipped in and occupied seats at the rear end of the room. No one embraced them or made himself officious by turning round to stare; and noiselessly as he had opened it, the page closed it again, and listened as attentively as any one in the assembly to Dr. Maxwell's clear and forcible reading of the 44th chapter of Genesis, which contains the singular story of the placing of Joseph's divining cup in the sack of his youngest brother Benjamin, and the consternation occasioned by its recovery in such a place.

For the benefit of the new-comers, Dr. Maxwell reviewed briefly the events of the preceding chapters which had formed the basis of past lessons, and then went on to explain the divining cup and its use among the ancients.

"Cup-bearers," said the doctor, "were very influential persons at oriental courts; to be the king's cup-bearer was to hold an office of peculiar dignity, for the sovereign's cup was not simply a vessel out of which he drank, but one by means of which he divined."

Reading an extract from Theophilus O'Hague's "Mysteries of Egypt," he proceeded as follows, almost in the words of that writer. "Wine, in the days of old, as drank in palaces by men of renown, and in temples by participants in the mysteries, was freshly produced just before it was partaken of. Rich, ripe clusters of the choicest grapes were brought, fresh gathered from the vines; the juice of these was squeezed into a golden or crystal goblet; cups of gold denoted the civil rank of those who drank from them; crystal vessels were for the use of seers or those possessed with the faculty usually called clairvoyance. As the juice of the grape in the crystal cup was held to the light by the cup-bearer who knelt before the throne on which the distinguished sage or sovereign sat, the great master would often see and describe events taking place in various parts of the kingdom, and sometimes in distant countries; by means of such discernment many impending catastrophes were warded off, for this fore-knowledge did indeed enable the wise men to make provision against being surprised by enemies, and also by this means did they prepare themselves to meet on-coming storms; foreseeing the approaching agitation of the elements, the diviner would cause knowledge to extend through the empire, in obedience to which, military preparations would be made against foreign invasion; vessels, moreover, would be detained in port, as heavy gales and angry seas were foreseen.

"So pacific in result was this most hallowed divination that when the spies from neighboring countries came to see how the land lay, they reported the well-armed condition of its inhabitants, and through these tidings many premeditated wars were nipped at their commencement. The crystal cup of divination was, moreover, employed in courts of law, or rather, in the Supreme Court, where a great and mighty master presided, and his verdict was invariably correct, for a most excellent spirit of wisdom and prophecy doth animate those who were called gods, and these were none other than the enlightened ones or illuminati who had by dint of much cultivation of the soul and subjection of the flesh, rendered their inward vision clear so that the secrets of nature were revealed to them."

"To place the divining cup in the sack of his youngest brother, was Joseph's method of testing and proving to the world the fitness of that brother to associate with him in the work of government and direction of the people."

It was always the object of the leader of the class to call out the opinions of the members; discussion invariably took a practical turn, useless controversies being always avoided. "For," said Dr. Maxwell, on such occasions, "we cannot always decide on matters of genealogy where scholars differ widely; and if we could accurately determine the precise time and place of every event of which we read, how much the wiser should we be? I use the Bible not as an infallible text book to be accepted as absolutely free from error from beginning to end. I find it, however, the most compendious and instructive as well as by far the most easily available collection of documents extant, in which we may find, if we do but search for it, the jewel of eternal truth; deeply buried sometimes, I grant you, beneath a mass of legendary lore, but even the most mystical portions contain many direct allusions to matters of vital moment to us all."

Mr. Templeton, who had often conducted Bible classes in his church at home, listened with ever-increasing wonder to the wealth of meaning Dr. Maxwell extracted from even the harshest and obscurest passages, and not feeling like asking questions, he listened quietly and attentively to every word, whether it proceeded from a student or the teacher. What struck him most forcibly was the unusual intelligence and freedom of thought displayed by the very youngest of the girls, who in clear, decisive, and yet modest tones, gave her ideas with all the outspokenness of a great divine whose position is so well assured that he fears no opposition. Some of the members of the class were very near to orthodoxy; others were but little more attached to dogmatic theology than was Charles Darwin; occasionally an admirer of Ingersoll would seek to point out a mistake of Moses, and again, an ardent disciple of Swedenborg would insist upon leaving the letter entirely and interpret according to correspondence. What charmed him most was the absolute good feeling which prevailed; not an acrimonious exclamation was made; persons of the most divergent theories came together and compared notes, while Dr. Maxwell firmly but good-naturedly held his ground, fortifying his statements, not so much by referring to "authorities," as by appealing to the reason and moral feeling of all whom he addressed.

"Was Joseph justified in playing a trick upon his brethren?" piped the clear treble of Miss Symphonia Delsarte, a young teacher in a Unitarian Sunday-school, delicately clad in snowy muslin with violets at her breast.

"Do you think his action in the matter could fairly be called a trick?" responded the doctor. "It has never struck me as such. Now, I call people tricky when they set traps for others to fall into, and take delight in advancing their own interests at somebody else's expense. Practical jokes are tricks; any device is a trick which is used as an artifice to beguile the unwary. But I see in Joseph's conduct only a means of hurrying his brothers to a sense of justice and effecting a condition of order otherwise not so easy of attainment. Divine justice is personified in the conduct of Joseph, but his personal conduct to an extent reflects the moral calibre of his age and nation. The lesson we learn is that the wrong-doers suffer for their own best good; thus the sequel to the story proves that the writer's intention was to demonstrate the unfailing triumph of justice."

"But, my dear Dr. Maxwell," broke in the tremulous excited voice of Mrs. Gerald Godfrey Hooper, a distinguished member of Felix Adler's Society for Ethical Culture, "you cannot maintain in the face of what we, alas, know to be the case, viz.: that iniquity frequently triumphs while a just cause is often defeated, that an equitable case is always carried through. My own poor, dear, dead husband lost his life fighting a wrong, and Dr. Adler gave us no comfort at the funeral, but said the event cut him like a knife. Do help us, if you can, out of this perplexity; you don't know how agonizingly it strains many of us."

To this sad questioning, the doctor quietly responded: "I don't know that I can satisfy you, but I will say just what I feel. This present term of existence is but a brief episode in eternity; sometimes events prove conclusively on earth that virtue is its own reward, while vice is its own punishment; but often, I grant you, it seems far otherwise.

"Now, I know what you would say just here, viz.: that theologians have been telling us for centuries that we must be content to suffer here, and await reward hereafter, which many of you, perhaps, think very dubious counsel. I do not agree with either Catholic or Protestant views of the hereafter, as ordinarily presented. I cannot believe in the efficacy of 'indulgences,' or in people being delivered from a state of purgation by purchased prayers; nor can I sanction the theory of the so-called evangelical, who tells me, if I take his view of the atonement, and put my trust in the Son of God, I shall be at once in glory after I have laid aside this body. No, nor can I endorse what I consider the errors of some of our theosophical brethren, who speak so much of a separation of principles at death. I am convinced, and I have had evidence enough to convince any reasonable being, that this present term of experience we call earthly life is but one link in an endless chain, and that when these bodies fall away, we simply go on living. I was very pleased to hear Mrs. Catsleigh agree to this yesterday. Very few who call themselves metaphysicians make this plain. Mrs. Eddy is, to my mind, not at all clear on this subject, and with the exception of some passages in the works of Dr. Evans and Miss Barnett, I have found very little lucidity of statement on this subject. We must try and realize that we do not die and then live again, we simply go on living, and I feel very sure that death is much more a trying experience to those left behind than to those who pass on.

"Now, if we realize that we are precisely the same individuals after we have dropped the flesh that we were before, what occurs to us in one state of existence is just as real and satisfying as though it occurred in another. Let me illustrate: One of us has earned a reward of effort; he is not paid in America, but goes to France and the account is settled there; he receives so many francs instead of so many dollars, but the amount is the same in value; it is thus, whether we receive our reward here or hereafter. My opinion has always been that small results usually follow quickly upon small transactions, while great consequences take longer to become palpably fulfilled."

"What do you think we had better do to cultivate our psychic powers; do you advise us to sit in circles, or do you repudiate what is known as mediumship? I think it very dangerous," said Mrs. Balaclava Nelson, a lady of some standing in a well-known Episcopal Church, who had been slyly visiting clairvoyants, and lost a little money and got herself sometimes muddled by contradictory communications.

"I think," replied the doctor, "we should use proper discretion in all matters; I cannot discountenance speech because I try to put down lying and slander; the remedy is not to cut out the tongue, for by so doing, we should destroy our power to speak truly and kindly. Everything is dangerous in the hands of the unscrupulous. Think of the devastation which might ensue were some of my electrical instruments to be viciously tampered with; but am I to discontinue my scientific studies and refuse to use the electric force which is so mighty to build and to destroy, because danger attends abuse? I think not, for were I to take such a stand, I would but veto every advance in science, and lend my influence toward a return to the barbaric chaos of ancient ignorance. Now, as to the best method of developing, i. e., calling out whatever psychic ability any of you may posses, I would say avoid all promiscuous circles; never sit in the dark holding the hands of strangers, and never hold yourselves in a negative attitude of thought ready to be psychologized by any influence temporarily in the ascendent. Sit alone, or with a congenial friend, or a few trusted friends may sit together for spiritual unfoldment; but not only is it desirable to conduct things in an orderly manner on the surface, if we desire enlightenment on any subject, we must agree upon what we seek; there must be unity of purpose, and when this is the case, we draw to us what we steadily attract, for by the focalization of thought on a given object, great results are obtained. This is the secret of divination, and while it is not necessary to gaze into cups or crystals, there are persons who find outward aids valuable, as without some such assistance, they find it difficult to concentrate their thought. Concentration does not mean intellectual vacuity, but quite the reverse. It signifies intense aspiration toward a given center, so that harmonious influence may reach us from the source to which we look for guidance."

Thus ended the questioning.

As Dr. Maxwell ceased speaking, all present rose and sang a new doxology, in three stanzas, written by Mrs. Finchley and set to music by one of the choir. After the exercises were over, tongues began to move rapidly, and it was quite an hour before the front door closed upon the latest of the lingerers. No sooner had the last of the company departed, than a sharp ring at the bell, and a loud rat-a-tat tat on the knocker, announced the arrival of Mrs. Catsleigh and Mons. Alphonse, who had been invited to dinner. As not the faintest intimation of "company" had been breathed, and Dr. Maxwell and all his household expected nothing out of the common, everybody was positively startled to see both the visitors in the most elaborate evening dress; of course, they came in a carriage. Mrs. Catsleigh looked as though she was dressed for a grand ball, or, possibly, for the banquet scene in some elaborate play or opera; her throat, arms and shoulders showed to great advantage, as her firm, white flesh contrasted with the scarlet satin of her long train gown; her abundant raven hair, twisted into a loose knot at the back of her head, was pierced with a gold and diamond arrow of great size and exquisite workmanship; her white ostrich fan, splendid rings, and bracelets, completed a decidedly striking toilet, but not a particularly restful one on a hot July evening.

Mons. Alphonse appeared as though he had no possible object in life but to allow his fine figure to set off expensive clothing to the best advantage. Though loudly, he was handsomely dressed; his evening suit was of the latest London pattern, his linen of the choicest, his patent leather shoes fitted like gloves; his hair was silky and glossy as a raven's wing, while splendid diamonds glistened from his shirt front and his hands like stars on a winter's night.

"Why, what have you been doing here?" exclaimed that gentleman, noticing the number of chairs (nearly 200), which still remained in the drawing-room. Have you had a lecture, why didn't you let us know? Mrs. Pushing is in town, just run over from Newport; called on us this afternoon and begged permission to meet you this evening; hope I have not intruded, but I have asked her to dine here; she will be here by 6:30 at the latest, and it is after 6 now."

"I shall be delighted to see her," responded Dr. Maxwell, "I'm very glad you asked her, but I wish we had known it sooner; we have a very plain dinner and we are not dressed for company; we really treated you as old friends, though we have only known each other a few days. I hope (turning to Mrs. Catsleigh), you will excuse our appearance, but we had no idea we should have the honor of Mrs. Pushing's company; however, we shall no doubt enjoy ourselves quite as well as though we were more presentable, and as to the dinner, though it's very simple, my cook usually makes things palatable."

"Oh, that's all right," replied the lady, "I should never have got myself up in this rig only Alphonse told me you were going to the opera at ten, and we better be prepared for a front-tier box." Then, suddenly seeing she had astonished her host, she shook her fist at her escort, and said with assumed petulance:

"Is this another of your falsehoods, you naughty fellow? I shall soon send you to the right about, if you can't speak truthfully; this isn't the first time you've made me make a fool of myself."

"I pray you not to blame him," quietly but quickly interposed the doctor, "probably I did say something about the opera, but I have been so much engaged it has quite slipped my mind."

How far this embarrassing episode might have proceeded it is difficult to conjecture, had not another loud ring at the door-bell been quickly followed by the entrance of Mrs. Amy Pushing, accompanied by her dear friend and submissive satellite, Miss Theresa Hockmeir. Mrs. Pushing, be it distinctly understood, was one of the most popular teachers of Mental Science who had ever visited New York; the previous May she had thirty-seven students in her class who had paid her $50 each, and though her expenses for the month had amounted to $350, she had laid away a clear $1500 as the result of one month's teaching; she was now working at Newport, but having some business to see after in the great city, had run down on a flying visit. Being on friendly terms with Mrs. Catsleigh, and knowing she was at a pretty good hotel, she had written to her to secure a room at the Quicksilver. Immediately on arrival, learning of the interest being taken in her one subject by Dr. Maxwell and his friends, she had expressed a wish to accompany her "sister in the science" to that gentleman's residence, and was not at all disposed to leave her factotum, Miss Hockmeir, behind her.

Mrs. Pushing was a woman who never for an instant forgot her dignity or lost sight of her own importance. A Boston woman by birth and education, she impressed all who met her as a person of culture as well as shrewd business ability. In appearance she was rather commanding, of good height, rather slender build, with piercing black eyes, small and restless like a bird's; her hair, which was not much thicker than a cobweb, was very carefully arranged, being evenly parted in front and tightly drawn up from behind to the crown, where it was carefully combed over a silk pad of exactly the same color. In front of this diminutive chignon, which was worn exactly on the top of the head, was a very handsome gold band studded with five large diamonds. Her dress was of rich black silk ornamented with Mechlin lace of fine quality. Her jewelry was valuable but not gaudy.

Miss Hockmeir was a quiet little body about ten years younger than Mrs. Pushing, who followed the elder lady like her shadow. This unobtrusive but useful little personage did everything for her employer; managed her business as far as possible, attended to correspondence, interviewed callers, and took the whole brunt of life upon herself. For these services she was fed and clothed, but very rarely had even a dollar to call her own.

Dinner was served at seven, and a very pleasant meal it proved to be, though Mrs. Pushing talked incessantly, and entirely of herself and her doings. She related instance after instance where she had literally "snatched from the jaws of the grave," distinguished persons whom the best physicians had pronounced incurable.

Miss Hockmeir occasionally ventured a sentence to add still further to the effect of Mrs. Pushing's self-laudation, though we must never forget that both ladies completely disowned having any share in the work other than that of being "Truth's trumpeters."

Mrs. Catsleigh and Alphonse appeared hungry, and did full justice to the dinner, which was a very choice one. Everything was perfectly cooked; the courses were, however, only four, and there was no attempt at display or excessive garniture. At eight they rose from the table, and re-entering the drawing-room, which had been cleared of its extra seats and made very attractive, music was proposed as a relief from excessive conversation. Miss Lydia O'Shannon sang more sweetly even than on any previous occasion, her voice seemed to grow richer and fuller with every fresh attempt she made to exercise it.

"The dear child," said Mrs. Pushing, "I wish I might have her with me for a week by the sea. I have a most delightful little cottage, and Newport is charming at this season. In my company she would grow so strong you would hardly know her on her return. Judge Firefly's daughter is visiting me at present, and her father says the change is incredible, and only three weeks since she was prostrate with pneumonia."

"May I ask you how you treat? I do not fully understand your system. Sometimes I have severe headaches and feel very weary after mental effort. I wish you could tell me how to shake off these unpleasant feelings?" inquired Mr.

Templeton, who was very anxious to hear more of the new science for which so much had been claimed.

"Certainly," said Mrs. Pushing. "I will give you an outline of my system, as far as I can, in a few sentences. I see you are a minister, and you ought to give this truth to your people. I treat all cases alike. I utterly deny sin, sickness and death, which are but mental illusions, errors of belief. I deny the possibility of sickness. I deny that I can feel pain or be in any way affected by material things, for we are all spirit and there is no matter. I do not want to know what ails a patient, or anything about him. I can treat people thousands of miles off as readily as though they were in my presence, for mind makes nothing of time and distance. I simply affirm that all is spirit, that all is good, and then deny the opposite. I negative the affirmation of disease, calling the disease by name in the act of denial when it has been named to me; otherwise I simply affirm with emphasis, 'God is well, and so are you.' Nothing and no one can withstand the power of invincible truth; read the New Testament without prejudice, and you will see that we are the only genuine Christians."

"What you say sounds very beautiful, but I must say I cannot understand its application to cases of physical ailment. Take, for instance, a broken bone or dislocated joint, how can thought heal in such cases?" rejoined Mr. Templeton.

"Spirit is everything," replied the lady, "and though at present we have not fully learned to perfectly demonstrate the science, if we are but faithful, the time will quickly come when surgery as well as medicine will be entirely needless. But there is a life to live as well as a gospel to proclaim. We must practice the science individually."

To say that Mr. Templeton was satisfied with these replies would be to claim too much for the effect of Mrs. Pushing's eloquence, though she was a most effective speaker and gesticulated gracefully and freely, but introduced fewer theatrical moves than Mrs. Catsleigh. Mr. Templeton was, however, impressed, and when the visitors departed at a rather late hour, he sought his couch not so much to sleep as to pray and think over all he had heard that day. New light was coming to him, but as yet it was but dimly breaking.

CHAPTER IV.

THE MAGICIAN AND HIS WARD.

THE week ended pleasantly as it began; Mr. Templeton grew more and more satisfied that spiritual force was far more directly operative in the affairs of earth than he had hitherto imagined, and though his early training and mental proclivities, intensified by a long course of special effort in a determined direction, all led him to resist the encroachment of new conceptions of life here and hereafter, the ice of prejudice and ignorance was rapidly melting around his heart and brain, and where hitherto the skies had been dark above him, they were now becoming rapidly illumined with the breaking dawn of a new and brighter day.

To a sensitive nature, many of the tenets of "orthodoxy" are always appalling; the dogma of endless punishment, that hideous nightmare of theology which holds so large a class of Christians in its gloomy and frightful embrace, together with a view of atonement utterly irreconcilable with every ennobling conception of divine or human justice, leads some to despair and many to infidelity; Mr. Templeton had never suffered to the extent that many affectionate natures suffer when contemplating these awful themes, but there had been constantly with him a sense of sorrow and unrest as he dwelt on the slender chance which "orthodoxy" concedes to the great multitude of human beings of ever reaching the celestial regions.

The fate of the heathen and of unbaptized infants had often sorely perplexed him, and through Swedenborg's

"Arcana Cœlestia," and "Apocalypse Unveiled," had considerably influenced him, he found that though the wondrous seer of Sweden threw bright light on difficulties, there were still many mysteries which remained obscure. In his last sermon previous to his departure for his summer vacation, two or three of the more progressive minds in his audience had noticed a faint tinge of "advanced thought," and these had decided within themselves that their preacher might ere long, come out a little more broadly on the liberal platform; but with the exception of a very few sentences, there had been nothing to indicate any approaching change of base. How astonished then would those good people, hidden snugly away among the green hills of Vermont have been, could they have seen their much-respected and steady-going pastor, the very next Sunday at a Unitarian Church in the morning, at a Catholic Cathedral in the afternoon, and oh, whisper it with bated breath, at a seance, yes, positively at a seance in the evening.

Sunday morning had been devoted to attending the ministrations of a celebrated Unitarian minister from England, who was preaching at All Souls' Church on Fourth Avenue and Twentieth Street, in the absence of the regular pastor. The whole service was impressive and the sermon an excellent one; but as the Rev. Paget Hope is not a man given to cloaking his convictions or apologizing for them either, the Rev. Onesimus heard some sentiments which rather startled him. The text was from the 8th chapter of Romans, and was a complete refutation of the Calvinistic interpretation of that remarkable and difficult chapter of St. Paul's most brilliant and scholarly epistle; this however Mr. Templeton could easily harmonize with, as the denomination to which he belonged was not given to belief in preterition, his wing of the Baptist Church being that known as general or free will; but when it came to an advocacy of evolution, a denial of special creation, a sharp criticism on the historical accuracy of some portions of the gospels, and to cap the climax, a decided allusion to Jesus as an excellent but not infallible example to mankind, our hero winced inwardly; he was, however, greatly pleased with Mr. Hope's kind and gracious toleration of the views of those who disagreed with him, and could not but contrast this loving and honest spirit of forbearance, with the spiteful acrimony he had often seen displayed in other quarters.

At St. Patrick's Cathedral, he had been principally impressed with the grandeur and solidity of the massive edifice and the perfectly harmonious singing of the boys in the sanctuary choir. The service consisted of vespers and benediction, the sermon being omitted in the afternoon at that season of the year. The great organ in the gallery was silent, and the operatic soloists who sing in front of it were scattered at summer watering-places and elsewhere. When the last strains of the closing psalm "Laudate Dominum" had died away, and the chancel organ was pouring forth a melodious postlude, Dr. Maxwell proposed to his friend that they should stroll round the church and inspect its treasures. As they were examining some exquisite carving behind one of the altars, they were greatly startled at beholding two individuals as utterly unlike as any two could be, the one standing, the other kneeling in front of a beautiful shrine erected in the Lady chapel.

The standing figure was a singularly handsome, but most extraordinary looking man in the full glory of a splendid young maturity; tall, shapely and faultlessly attired, his head adorned with a magnificent crown of rich, bright golden hair, his eyes green as emeralds, green as the deepest hue of the Irish sea, green as the grass in early spring or as the shamrock of old Ireland—dazzling, fascinating, winning, repelling, terrifying, alluring, commanding eyes, eyes that could flash lightning from their emerald depths, eyes whose glance could cause the strongest opponent to cower before them, eyes that could draw with irresistible magnetic force whoever could be found susceptible to their imperious beauty; eyes that betokened strength perchance born of some great magician's skill, but whose darting rays had no tale to tell of soft emotions or of tender love.

The other figure was a boy not over fourteen, of slender, supple form, with jet black locks, and dark brown eyes, full of pleading, yearning wistfulness as they were riveted upon the statue of the mother of Christ. With a brief imperial touch of the tip of one finger on the kneeling boy's shoulder, the stately man caused him to rise instantly and accompany him down the aisle and out of the church. Though previously absorbed in devotion and quite oblivious to his surroundings, the child instantly responded to his master's will, as a dumb animal might obey the slightest gesture of a powerful human hand whose lightest touch could never be resisted by the subject creature. This singular couple so impressed Dr. Maxwell and his friend that they soon followed the mysterious pair out of the church and walked for some distance behind them, down Fifth Avenue, observing the perfect compliance of the child with his director's every movement. The boy wore on his head a scarlet cap, after a fashion rarely seen except in Greece and the islands of the Moditerranean; his stately companion wore a straw hat of light and fanciful design which rested carelessly on his abundant shimmering hair.

"What can be the relation between those two?" exclaimed the doctor, "they are so utterly unlike; the man must be a Russian and the boy a Greek, they cannot be related. Surely, the child is not a servant, he appears of noble, at all events, of gentle birth; and his haughty, masterful attendant cannot surely be his tutor. They excite my interest, they constitute a psychological phenomenon. I would like to investigate. That handsome man is certainly a tyrant; those eyes are utterly devoid of mer y or compassion; he suggests to me a god of Norse mythology, dressed by a London tailor and holding command over a Russian army. It strikes me he is a Russian nobleman, but how the boy comes to be associated with him is a marvel."

"His eyes are simply horrible," broke in Mr. Templeton, "they positively made me shudder; I shall never forget the expression which came into them, and suddenly vanished when he saw we were observing him; conscious power, egotism, vanity, disdain, all gleamed forth at once, he looked at me as though I were a noxious reptile; his glance in your direction was somewhat less disapproving. I have a feeling that we shall meet that man and boy when we least expect it, and if we are not careful we may be led into some trouble; a man with those eyes would stop at nothing. In Mrs. Catsleigh's agent, Alphonse, we witness a combination of the low cunning of the monkey with the vanity of the peacock; but in this mysterious Russian, I can discern the tiger and the serpent, which you will grant is not a very safe combination."

"You're waxing eloquent, my friend, in a direction which has always interested me intensely," responded Dr. Maxwell. "When I was a child I traced resemblances between my schoolmates and all sorts of creatures, and seeking to verify my fancies I studied the traits and habits of various birds, animals and fishes, and found in almost every instance that when I could trace a likeness to some lower creature in a human being, the person in whom I traced it, behaved very much like the animal he favored in appearance. But we are now at our own door and I have a few preparations to make for our gathering and experiments this evening, you will therefore excuse me till 9 o'clock, when I shall join you in the drawing room. Mrs. Finchley will preside at the dinner table. Before a seance such as the one we are to hold this evening, I eat nothing but fruit and bread, with pure water for a beverage, which I take alone in my study. I advise you all to dine lightly, but you are none of you gourmands, so my advice is not much needed."

By 8:30, Mrs. Finchley, the O'Shannons, and Mr. Templeton were in the drawing-room awaiting the arrival of guests. Only those who were well-known to our host, and fully in sympathy with his views were ever invited to take part in any circle under his roof; for, unlike foolish proselyters he knew how dire were the results following upon the introduction of an element of discord into "psychical research." Shortly before 9 o'clock, five persons entered the room together; they were Prof. Kiddersley, a man fully seventy years old, but in the best of physical as well as mental health; a gentleman of the highest culture and truest refinement, one moreover, who had been led to investigate Spiritualism in consequence of startling demonstrations in his own family; Dr. and Mrs. Jarvis-Forbes, a singularly well matched couple, who worked together in the direction of hygienic and other reforms with perfect equanimity; Mrs. Emily Gore Angusthorpe, an English lady of exalted social position; and her younger brother, fresh from his studies and pastimes at Cambridge University, the Honourable Freddie Pugge Gore.

After a few minutes spent in pleasant social conversation Dr. Maxwell entered, bowing and smiling to all his friends and addressing some pleasant and appropriate word of greeting to each, but shaking hands with nobody. "Now," said he, "let us commence the first portion of our exercises; we need to collect our thoughts and direct our aspirations unitedly to the common fount whence all good proceeds before arranging ourselves into the circle which we have been directed to form at 10 o'clock precisely. I feel a very agreeable sense of harmony pervading the atmosphere to-night, and I doubt not we shall witness something truly remarkable." Then giving his arm to Miss Lydia O'Shannon he led her to the piano and whispering, "Schumann's Eighth Nocturne, if you please," left her at the instrument and took a seat by himself in a distant corner of the room. During the exquisite music, a gentle electric current was felt passing through the room; this was due to an atmospheric distribution of electricity well known to some scientists and perfectly understood by Prof. de Montmarte, Dr. Maxwell's instructor in science

While the current was gradually equalizing and purifying the atmosphere, Miss O'Shannon, whose voice as well as touch was daily increasing in firmness and purity, sang three of Heinrich's beautiful German melodies in that fine composer's native tongue. Just as the hour was approaching 10, and the music about to cease, the front door-bell sounded imperatively, and after a minute's interval a page knocked timidly on the door, which was however opened immediately with a firm hand, when the mysterious stranger of the afternoon walked decisively to the center of the room, followed by the Greek lad who acted like his shadow. Not apologizing in the slightest for his intrusion but on the contrary expressing in every movement a sense of unbounded superiority, he handed a note to Dr. Maxwell whom he had only glanced at in the Cathedral that afternoon, with the air of an old acquaintance, or to speak more correctly, with that of some distinguished nobleman who consented graciously to patronize a poor physician. On opening the letter the doctor's countenance immediately took on an animated and cordial expression, for he instantly recognized the well-known caligraphy of his preceptor. The letter ran thus:

"DEAR BERNARD:—I introduce to you, Count Katolowynski, who will I know be able to assist you in your studies; he is attended by his protege, a singularly fine lucide.

Yours in the true Bond,

JEROME DE M.

PARIS, July 6, '87."

"How long have you been in New York?" enquired Mrs. Finchley of the haughty Count, after the usual formalities of introduction had been abruptly curtailed by that gentleman's saying "introductions are needless, I know you all."

"Three days," he replied, curtly, "we arrived on Thursday from Paris. Now, if you wish this evening to be other than wasted, we will commence at once with the business we have in hand."

"Zenophon, lie down on that rug," (addressing the boy and pointing to a tiger skin on the floor). "Now, be still all of you, don't move after you have drawn your chairs around this centre. There, that is right, just a natural circle; and no one nearer than six feet from the centre. No matter how you place yourselves so long as you are comfortable. Play a reverie Mademoiselle (turning to Miss O'Shannon, who took her place near the piano). Now, doctor, tell me where you wish Zenophon to go, anywhere you like, and I'll send him?"

To say that some of the company were startled would be to express their feelings far too mildly, they were awed as animals are apt to be immediately before a tremendous electric storm, then after their agitation they sink into a silent, awful expectancy of they know not what. Dr. Maxwell was deeply interested, but otherwise unmoved; Mrs. Finchley felt rather nervous, but endeavored not to show it; Mr. Freddie Pugge Gore felt uncanny and squirmed in his chair; the other ladies and gentlemen felt they were about to witness something they would rather not have faced, still their curiosity was aroused and they felt an undercurrent of eager longing to see all that could possibly be shown them. Mr. Templeton felt some of his old fear of witchcraft rising within him, and began to feel that perhaps after all he had been consorting with the devil, disguised as an angel of light during the past week. The reverie which was one of Guardicelli's sweet mystic compositions, ended in "a low moaning prayer to the angel of music, to baptize the earth with the waters of melody from the fountain of Asphodel in the Elysian fields," to quote from a criticism of the composition in a fashionable musical review.

"Send him to our mutual friend," said Dr. Maxwell to the Count immediately the music ceased. Instantly Count Katolowynski walked round the recumbent boy three times, hen breathed on his eyes and into his nostrils seven times, keeping his own lips tightly compressed while Zenophon turned round upon the soft fur on which he lay, and after breathing a deep and heavy sigh, seemed to be riven from his form by some all potent spell; his lustrous eyes dilated and his lips began to move, uttering faint, inarticulate sounds.

"What is it, quick," said the Count, as he watched the pleased expression on the sleeping lad's illumined features.

"I see" clearly responded the entranced boy, "a beautiful lady, with rippling golden hair, eyes as blue as sapphires, and skin like the lillies fair; she is beside a painting of the Madonna like the one in this room, she has arisen early from her couch and is at prayer; her soul is far away from her flesh. In the room across the spacious corridor into which all the doors open, is a man of venerable but almost juvenile appearance; he must be fifty-five at least but he looks quite young; the lovely girl is his only daughter, and between them exists a subtle fluid chain of electric ether. Listen! I hear a voice, it says "await the coming of the Masterfrom across the sea, he comes to-night from far Afghanistan, yea from his holy temple there sequestered 'mid the hills, and he tells you to be free." Freedom is the boon I crave, I am a slave."

At these last words the classic features of the Count became convulsed with wrath; darting his eyes upon the innocent victim of his displeasure he literally scorched him with their burning rays. Not deigning to explain anything to the wonder struck observers, he struck the boy a sharp blow across the chest, then addressing Dr. Maxwell, said: "Now ask your Parisian friends any questions you like, the wire of communication is laid and you will receive responses just as though they were actually in your bodily presence, this you understand, I simply mention the fact for the benefit of the vulgar." At hearing herself denominated vulgar, though the word was used only in the classic sense, Mrs. Angusthorpe grew livid, but a spell being on her, as well as on all the others, she kept her feelings to herself. The doctor first asked "Can Heloise inform me when I shall perfect my process for so electrifying my office that my patients will not need external treatment at my hands?" "To-morrow," answered the boy, "the Master is here to-night to celebrate your victory over the cruder elements of the atmosphere against which you have so long been battling; to-morrow morning at 10 a woman suffering from paralysis will be cured in your sanctum without any physical action or mental force of yours; Heloise is here now in spirit, she smiles on me, but frowns on my director."

Againt Count Katolowynski flushed with rage, for this was another pointed allusion to the subject upon which he and Prof. de Montmarte and Heloise had decidedly disagreed in Paris only three weeks before. The Montmartes had insisted that Zenophon was to be liberated from his subjugator's will and that higher powers were about to take him fully under their protection. The Count had resented this prediction with positive vindictiveness and on the occasion of their last meeting a fierce altercation had ensued. Heloise had defied her stately antagonist and had commanded him to yield up his prey and give the captive boy his freedom. She had indeed assured him that she could and would rescue the child whom he had in her presence lashed with a horsewhip till he was insensible, and then restored by a magnetic process only just before it was too late. Disgusted with such despotism, and being herself a living embodiment of electric force she actually fastened the Count's feet to the floor in the presence of a domestic by her WILL, and then calling the trembling boy to her side, said with the majesty of a queen confering liberty on a captive subject, "I release you." The boy looked at her with eyes full of gratitude and love, but turning away his face, sadly replied, "I love my master, and to him I shall ever belong."

Rightly indignant at this response and feeling certain the mesmeric influence of the Count was the sole cause of such an answer, she lifted her eyes and straightened her form till she appeared an incarnation of divine justice resisting human tyranny and called aloud—"Azoriel we await your judgment."

Even the Count, magician though he was trembled when he heard a heavenly voice vibrating clearly through the room, "Zenophon, henceforth I am thy guardian." The boy covered his face with his hands, then addressing Heloise said, "I have seen your guardian angel; he is mine also."

Knowing how needless it would have been to interfere any longer between the Count and the child, as a higher power had interposed, she bade the man a cold, and the lad a most gracious farewell; and left the matter in the hands of the unseen but glorious and mighty intelligence whom she well knew to be the prompter of her father's greatest discoveries in science as well as her own protector in every time of need. Count Katolowynski never forgave her for this scene and vowed he never would; but knowing the affair to be no farce, he was really afraid lest the boy, who brought him a fortune through his clairvoyant gift (and whom he really loved in a brutal way despite his cruelty), should be removed beyond his reach by some supernatural agency against which bolts and bars afford no sort of protection. In the voyage across the Atlantic, Zenophon had been submissive and affectionate in the extreme, rendering him all the prostrate homage he exacted; reclining at his feet and gazing up into his face, the little fellow would assure him that heaven would be hell were not his sovereign there to rule him; but now for the first time since their arrival in America that he had undertaken to experiment with the boy, though as of old the mesmeric spell took full effect, in his trance the child divulged unpleasant facts concerning their mutual relations, expressing discontent with slavery and declaring himself as soon to be released from his now irksome bondage. These circumstances were sufficient to goad him to desperation, and as people usually jeopardize their own interests sorely, when they allow passion to run away with reason, Count Katolowynski by his very determination to hold all and win more, staked all and lost, as the sequel will amply prove.

The boy awoke feverish and fatigued, something quite unusual, for he had lain in a dead stupor sometimes for days at a time without eating or drinking anything while revealing startling facts to a long succession of visitors almost without intermission, and then awoke on the third or fourth day bright and strong, beaming with affection on his master. Now he was evidently under another influence and the power of the Count was no longer in the ascendant. Thinking it advisable to adopt decisive measures then and there, he threw himself upon the child and by sheer force of will compelled him to return to the magnetic state, which he did instantly; but no sooner was the boy asleep than everybody in the room felt a strange electric shock, which to some was delightful and invigorating in the extreme, but to others somewhat disagreeable, according to the state of each recipient; electric sparks were seen in all parts of the apartment and the air seemed alive with an unseen presence. Zenophon started in his slumbers, exclaiming "the Master! the Master!" Then instantly a clear, resonant voice rang through the air accompanied by a sweet and powerful treble which those who had heard it before recognized as the mystic voice of Heloise.

The boy rose erect and clasping his hands upon his breast, with eyes upturned, his whole frame and every feature quivering with delight, murmured "at last I am free," and with these words sank back on the tiger fur and was soon breathing heavily as children do when sleeping sweetly after unusual tension of the nerves.

The Count sat down and watched the proceedings with glowering displeasure, but he knew too well how absurd it would have been for him to have attempted to direct the current of events. The boy was now clearly beyond his psychical embrace, but he trusted that though all fear and enforced submission were over, love would yet continue to dictate that absolutely willing surrender to another's will, which enables the psychologist to succeed far better than when the subject's will is coerced in his interest. Contenting himself as best he could with this anticipation, he affected haughty, almost insolent indifference to all that transpired; and at length, as the voices completely absorbed the attention of all present except himself, he noiselessly left the room and wandered into the library. Other than the lights and voices, there were no phenomena, and these voices were those of people still living and actively engaged on earth, though their psychic selves were for the time liberated from their ordinary physical environment.

Mr. Templeton, who had never seen or heard anything of the wonders of the hidden realm prior to his visit to New York,—if we except a low and ridiculous take-off of Spiritualism, in the shape of bogus materializations palmed off by itinerant show-people on the credulous villagers of Vermont, —was at last convinced that whatever explanations might be given of the wonders now displayed, fraud could not account for them. Ventriloquism was out of the question, as the information given in answer to his own questions precluded the possibility of the ventriloquist's art supplying the responses, while mechanical electricity, with all its potency, cannot reasonably be regarded as the source of definite human intelligence. "And then," queried the minister, "what right have we, whatever theologians may say to the contrary, to give the devil credit for truthful, accurate information and advice which if followed by us all would soon transform this earth into a paradise. But yet," he queried, "how is it possible for a girl in Paris, and a savan in Afghanistan to make their voices heard in a New York drawing-room?" Let this quotation from a rare old treatise on "The Faculties of the Superior Man," suggest an explanation if it cannot fully solve the riddle.

Theophilus O'Hague says: "So complicated and yet so simple is the mechanism of the psychic form and so perfectly intelligible is the law which governs it, that though unknown to the most of men, all adepts are aware that there is a vibrating cord of vitality between the corporeal structure and the travelling psychic; while the will force of any twice-born man is quite sufficient to guide his psychic body to the place where he would be, leaving his earthly tenement asleep upon his bed. When the travelling psychic can control surrounding ether to a sufficient extent, he can produce sounds and sights audible and visible to those whom he visits psychically. Would'st thou, oh tyro, on the threshold of the mysteries, attain this skill, thou must thy rising anger well restrain, and holding thyself above the allurements of dull sense, so live superior to the fetid aura of a world of sin that thou canst defy the unnatural limits sin imposed on the human race."

CHAPTER V.

DIVINE HEALING.

THE following morning, notwithstanding the exciting events of the previous night and the late hour at which our friends had retired, they were all seated at the breakfast table by 9 o'clock, and though a close observer would have noticed an unusual thoughtfulness in the expression of all, an unobserving stranger would have detected nothing out of the ordinary. The extraordinary events of the previous night had thrown a weird and almost uncanny glamour over the whole aspect of affairs, in the mind of Mr. Templeton. For some time past he had been giving thought to mystical matters, now things he had hitherto deemed impossible had been absolutely verified in his own experience; he had now passed the rubicon of doubt and could no longer remain a skeptic toward what had been so abundantly demonstrated to him; but to a Baptist minister to whom a very real personal devil had been a familiar figure almost from infancy, the likelihood of what he had witnessed having emanated from his Satanic Majesty seemed a possible though not probable contingency.

The singular conduct of Count Katolowynski had excited in his mind the strangest emotions. That gentleman had returned to the drawing-room at the conclusion of the seance, partaken of refreshments and chatted affably, but his whole demeanor revealed to the perspicuous, his offended dignity, desperate resolve, and scarce admitted fear. Zenophon had remained in Dr. Maxwell's house all night and was still sleeping soundly; the Count went to his hotel about 1 A.M., outwardly polite, but inwardly muttering vengeance. Dr. Maxwell was unable to conceal a slight trembling of expectancy as 10 o'clock approached, when (if the prediction so singularly made was to prove true) he would meet a sufferer from paralysis who would pay him a simple professional call and there and then be restored to health and vigor. "To doubt would be disloyalty," this line of Faber's beautiful hymn kept running through his mind, and as in the past he had received many verifications of almost equally wonderful prophecies, he felt pretty well assured that this day was to prove a singularly eventful one to him and to Mr. Templeton whom he determined to invite into his study to witness all that transpired.

Ten o'clock came, and just as the gong in the hall was sounding the hour, the door-bell rang. The summons being quickly answered by the ever ready page, a lady about fifty years of age, with a pale drawn face, evidently with no use of her lower limbs, was slowly carried into the house by two attendants. As soon as these assistants had deposited her in an easy chair in the doctor's office and had begun to detail the symptoms and history of her case, she was abruptly stopped in her narative by experiencing a decided electric thrill; we purposely avoid the word shock, as the true electric system of practice never causes patients to suffer from the violent action of the remedial agent which in its fiercer moods is often destructive and dangerous rather than constructive and beneficial. Whence came the thrill? No treatment was administered from any visible battery or in any external manner whatsoever, and neither Dr. Maxwell, Mrs. Finchley nor Mr. Templeton who were all in the room, felt anything. A succession of thrills one after the other, following in rapid sequence caused the invalid to exclaim, "What are you doing to me, oh! can it be true that miracles are performed to-day as they were of old? Father Franciscati at the Hoboken Monastery told us they were now possible and saints could perform them; he said so when I was carried into the church and placed in a special reclining chair near the privileged altar, but I was one of the many who had to be content with the assurance that my affliction was for my good and therefore God would not remove it; several people were healed during the novena in honor of S. Stanislaus, but I left the church a little happier in mind, a little more resigned to my condition, but none the abler to walk than when I entered it; but now I feel something, oh, so different from what I ever felt before. I've been ill three years, I was struck the day my only son was shot in Virginia; nothing and no one could help me. I've been everywhere and tried everything, and should never have come to you had I not been recommended to try Christian Science. I was directed to Mrs. Catsleigh who said she never healed while she was teaching and she directed me to you. What is this force? Do tell me, I can't understand it. I feel my son standing at my elbow but I see nothing; Oh! now he beckons me. Gregoire take me to you if you can;" and the lady sank into a deep motionless slumber from which she did not awake till after 3 P.M.

When she awoke the change which had come over her was so miraculous that even Dr. Maxwell,—accustomed though he had been in Paris to similar demonstrations of electric power,—could not believe his eyes when he saw the once wretched-looking and prematurely aged woman, get up without the slightest difficulty from her chair and walk across the room as blithely as a girl. To say she was completely cured by this one treatment would be to exaggerate, but she had recovered perfect freedom in the use of her limbs; her system might need some days for recuperation before it would be wise for her to return home, but to all appearance she was as well as she had ever been in her life. Not realizing that she had been in an electric trance for five consecutive hours, she looked about her in a half-dazed manner, and seeing the clock on the mantel point to 3:30, consulted her watch which greatly astonished her by pointing to the same hour.

"Where have I been and what has happened?" was her first inquiry. "I saw Gregoire just for an instant, he took me somewhere, I can't say where. I felt a cold, invigorating current pass through my frame, then I dozed and woke to find you all here just as you were when I fell asleep." The doctor endeavored to explain to her that he knew by means of electrical diagnosis that her difficulties had all arisen from her deep grief at the sudden loss of her only son, and consequently that no treatment could prove availing which did not set her mind at rest in that direction. Electricity, though a medium of communication between the "two worlds," is not self-intelligent; it is however, the externalized force of life, which vibrates responsive to intelligence, it is therefore employed to accommodate truth to human consciousness; it is indeed the creative force in all nature and the destructive agent also. The Brahminical Siva who is both destroyer and reproducer is a symbol of divine electricity, this is known to deep students of cosmogony.

When an apartment is properly electrified, conditions are ripe for a manifestation of spirit, just as light streams in through an open window, but is shut out by closed ones. We bar the doors of our minds against the entrance of life by follies and sins, and it needs that errors should be destroyed ere we can consciously participate in the health which is universally free to all who comply with the conditions necessary to realize it. While the lady was engaged in conversation with the doctor (she was greatly refreshed and strengthened by this converse), Mr. Templeton retained the attitude of attentive listener; he had not a word to say and could not quite perceive how electricity could be the instrument in accomplishing the restoration of paralyzed limbs when no ostensible treatment was given. The explanations given by Mrs. Catsleigh in her classes, which were mostly echoes of Mrs. Pushing's theories, did not cover the ground to his mind, for both these ladies taught that nothing had any power to benefit or injure us except as we thought or believed it had. The terms universal mind and race belief were used to answer questions otherwise unanswerable, but until a larger idea was shown him, he could never see how belief started, or how poisons ever became such even in belief.

For the particular benefit of Mrs. Macmarcy (the lady who had just recovered under this mysterious influence), Dr. Maxwell took from his desk a precious MS. given to him by Prof. de Montmarte, from which he copied the following for her use.

"Electricity is everywhere throughout nature, and is the only life of the world; it is the true anima mundi of which we read much in the writings of mystics; while not itself a conscious agent, it is the perpetual emanation from God to all degrees and grades of life, and is the only channel through which Creative Force works to ultimate expression. The physical form of man is permeated with electricity, or it could show no sign of life; when a derangement occurs in the flow of the currents through the system, disorganization ensues. In cases of paralysis, an electric shock has been received, and after it, the electric force has been prevented from flowing freely or sufficiently to the parts affected. When one discovers the exact cause of this derangement, it is necessary to place the patient in an atmosphere completely free from all antagonizing currents, and let him rest there under the soothing spell of the recreative influence.

"Mind is inter-communicative on all planes of expression, and as no soul perishes during its transit through the various states it successively enters, it is possible to introduce friends into the presence of those they specially love, by establishing mental telegraphy. Harmony in thought is imperatively necessary, without it no worthy results can be achieved; mental discord would result in greatly intensifying the ailment."

This and much more, the doctor read in a clear, well-modulated tone to his delighted and much affected auditors; when he had closed the roll and returned it to his desk,

Mrs. Macmarcy said, "I'm very hungry, may I eat something?"

From a closet in which he kept the few very simple but immensely powerful medicines he employed in his practice as a physician, he handed her a glass of what looked like ordinary wine, but was very different, though made freshly every morning in his own kitchen, from the juices of choice fruit; this she eagerly drank and felt satisfied. At 6 o'clock she joined the family at dinner, and no restrictions were placed upon her quite considerable appetite.

The evening passed pleasantly in music and deep conversation till 10 o'clock, when Mrs. Macmarcy was informed that her room was ready and she must consign herself to the care of Mrs. Finchley, for whom she had already conceived a warm attachment. Mrs. Finchley conducted her to a pleasant chamber next her own, where a bath was in readiness; then after bidding her a sweet good-night, and telling her to get into bed immediately after bathing, left her with a few kind words of assurance and heartfelt blessing to enjoy a truly refreshing slumber.

Though usually a very light sleeper, and of late subject to much pain at night; notwithstanding the excited, though happy mental condition she was in, she fell asleep as soon as her head touched the pillow, not to awake till high noon on the following day, when she found the sun shining brightly into the cozy apartment, beautiful flowers and luscious fruit on a table beside her, and Mrs. Finchley entering with steaming chocolate, delicious rolls and fresh dairy butter.

"Oh, how well I feel!" she exclaimed, as her hostess deposited the tray and embraced her. "I have not only slept soundly all these hours, but have had a lovely vision. I must tell you about it; it was so heavenly, so sweet, so grand! I feel as though I could never doubt anything again."

"Well," replied Mrs. Finchley, "you must take your breakfast now, and then come down to the library and tell us all; we are quite united in this house, and though some of our guests haven't had our experiences, they are very anxious to receive light on all topics."

"Oh, I'll tell them all if you wish, but it's some of it so strange I want to tell you first, then I can take your advice afterward."

"Will it astonish you very much to know that both the doctor and I know all about your dream, indeed we are certain it was not an ordinary dream at all, but a veritable vision. Now, to make a long story short, you first went to Paris and then to Heaven. You were introduced first to friends yet living, who assisted at your restoration yesterday, though you cannot quite understand how 3,000 miles is no obstacle to a doctor's treatment of his patients; then you saw your son again, and he and you went together to those bright realms of light for which he is now being prepared. You went with him beyond the orbit of this planet and saw a star which in your childhood always fascinated you, and there you learned much you could not learn from any books you have read or sermons to which you have listened."

The astonishment depicted on Mrs. Macmarcy's countenance can be better imagined than described; she could not perceive how other persons could be familiar with her dream, for was not her vision mere imagination, a result of highly wrought nerves?

Perceiving her thought, Mrs. Finchley answered by positively reiterating what she had previously affirmed, viz.: that this vision was an actual experience, and one withal vastly more real than are the transitory experiences of our waking hours, when dresses, bonnets, calls and dinners occupy so much of the feminine mind, while business cares absorb the masculine. Explaining much of the law which governs the interaction of minds in natural sympathy, she taught her willing, eager pupil a great deal in a short time concerning why in one case a doctor will be supereminently successful and in another similar instance ignominiously defeated after all his best endeavors; this is regulated entirely by natural affinities which material science unaided can never explain. "Mrs. Macmarcy," she exclaimed, speaking with singular impressiveness, "you have been led here by Azoriel, whom you saw in your vision, and who conducted you in your starry journey. Your son could never have scaled those heights had it not been that he was led on and borne up by this most glorious angel, who is at this time revisiting the earth to teach its inhabitants what ancient sages knew right well. In a few days (you must remain here ten at least), you will be strong enough to interpret for yourself the shining courses of the stars, and then those astrological predictions made to you in London seven years ago which have greatly harrassed you, will be interpreted by a higher law than that known to the old man with the lizards in the bottle on his writing table in Princess Street." Here was another allusion to her private experiences by a stranger; that visit to the astrologer she had never divulged except once to a priest in the confessional, who had told her never again to dabble in such mummeries; and here in New York, a woman whom she never saw till the day before, knew all about it. Truly, the ways of mind are marvellous, and the agnostic is at best but a sorry dunce with all his boasted learning.

CHAPTER VI.

A TRIP TO SIRIUS.

"Oh, when shall this dense vail remove,
And we behold the realms of day;
Oh, when shall these dull senses prove,
No obstacles upon our way;
Oh, when shall matter cease to bind,
And earthly limits all depart,
Oh, when shall kindred spirits find.
True unison of mind and heart?

We know not fully here below,
Our souls are yet in fetters bound,
Yet sometimes we can through a rift
Within the vail, the more profound
And glorious wonders of our life,
Discern, to lull to rest our strife."

Mrs. Macmarcy partook of her lunch and felt quite strong enough after it to accompany Mrs. Finchley to Dr. Maxwell's study, where all the house party was assembled to listen to her extraordinary narrative. As we have already stated, neither the doctor nor his aunt were in ignorance of the nature, or even of the details of her experience, for being themselves in the closest sympathy with the intelligences who were instrumental in her restoration to health, and knowing how true it is that kindred minds communicate in sleep, they had no difficulty in following the progress of her spirit out of the darkness of affliction into the light of joy. Mr. Templeton and the O'Shannons were not thus privileged, to them therefore, the recital of her vision was a stupendous and unlooked for revelation.

Feeling the great and marvellous import of this event most keenly, Mrs. Macmarcy unconciously adopted the air of a person making an important deposition while she told her story, which ran as follows :

No sooner had I laid my head upon my pillow, than I felt conscious of a subtle, but most delightful and intensely powerful presence beside me; no word but presence would convey my meaning. I saw nothing, neither did I hear anything, my senses of taste and smell were not appealed to, I was conscious of only one sense, feeling. I felt I was not alone, still I could not attribute this feeling of companionship to the idea that any other person was occupying the apartment with me. In this sense of a lovely, yet utterly undefinable presence with me I fell asleep; a delicious feeling of perfect rest stole over me, such as I had never felt in any such degree of fullness since my girlish days. As soon as I was asleep, and I was most vividly conscious of going to sleep, i. e., of passing from an outer to an inner state of conciousness,—I saw a bright, handsome young woman approaching me; I could not feel that she was one who had severed her connection with the physical body, for I perceived what looked to me like a luminous cord of light, very slender, white and fleecy, connecting her with a form exactly like herself, lying in profound repose, in a luxurious bed in a beautiful room.

"The location of the house in which the form was sleeping, I could not define, as I had no sight whatever of anything but that particular apartment. The radiant figure, who approached me with a graceful and tender smile, put both her hands on my shoulders and said to me in pure, strong tones: 'You are well now, Harriet, and you know it; never again will you suffer as you have done for the past few years, which seemed so long and weary to you, unless you return to your old sad habit of grieving over the loss of your son's body You have seen dear Gregoire and you can see him now constantly; but this is a privilege you can enjoy only so long as you do not mourn a fleshly loss and keep the eyes of your affection centered on immortal being.'

"Having delivered herself of this message, she beckoned me to follow her to a most charming spot, a little distance from where we were standing. At that point I perceived a boat, something after the fashion of a Venetian gondola, but seeing no water in the neighborhood I wondered of what use a boat could be in such a place. Almost instantly this beautiful young lady (whom I know now is your friend Heloise), assisted me into it and as soon as she had taken her seat beside me, it began to rise and float through the air as though conducted by some skillful ærial gondolier. Swifter and ever swifter grew the flight of this amazing vehicle. In it we seemed to pass cities and even countries in moments of time, compassing distances almost with the rapidity of thought, I felt a novel sensation of wonder steal over me, but I was not the least afraid. Suddenly the boat stopped and we alighted on the summit of a lofty mountain, from whose height we could look down upon the Earth and see it revolving in its orbit, a small ball enveloped in a dark, murky atmosphere, through which it seemed impossible any great light could penetrate. Other planets were also discernable, some of them far brighter but none darker than the earth; their moons were like fire-flies in attendance on them, so small did their satellites appear. I still felt no sense of fear, only an intense feeling of release, as though I had suddenly gained full deliverance from every yoke of bondage that had ever oppressed me.

"No bird could feel freer than I, when with my graceful companion at my side, I sat on that heavenly hill-top and watched planetary revolutions with the deep enquiring interest I had always felt when an opportunity was afforded me in my youth to look at the stars on a clear night from a hill-top in the neighborhood of my old Irish home. It suddenly occurred to me to ask, where are we? But before the words were fairly framed in my mind, an answer came from the lips of my companion.

"'On Sirius; you know how you always admired the "dog star" when you were little, and asked whether your little pet doggie, who was run over in Dublin over forty years ago had gone there; and how you cried when a priest told you dogs had no souls and you must not ask such questions This beautiful world where we now are, is peopled with beings whose forms are so radiant and ethereal that you cannot see them though they are all about you. Azoriel, my guardian, is a ruler here, and all the inhabitants love him; He is so great and good that he rules entirely by kindness, and yet were injustice done to any, he would be so terrible to the evil doer, that the sinner would wither beneath his glance, though he would never in anger reproach or condemn him.' While she was speaking thus to me I felt again, though in much stronger degree, that sense of a presence with me which I had felt before sleeping; this time, however, the feeling was accompanied with the sound of sweet music. Some one was singing perfectly, but I could not discern a syllable of what he sang. I knew instantly that the song was a speech delivered to Heloise and thought it contained references to myself. As the angel was addressing her, her beautiful face lighted up with dazzling, rapturous delight; she appeared as though she might be his bride or sister, so nearly did the two resemble each other, as I caught a glimpse of the singer's most glorious countenance.

"As soon as the song ceased and the rapt expression of ecstasy left her still smiling and exalted brow, I asked who the celestial visitor might be, who thus addressed her as an equal in a language she could certainly understand though it was utterly unintelligible to me. She hastened to correct me for speaking of her as the equal of this, her glorious master, as she styled him, and assured me she was only his devoted but very humble and ignorant pupil. He, however, evidently took no such view of her, for the words had scarcely left her lips when I heard the melodious tones of the enchanting song again, and this time Heloise looked down and buried her face in her lily hands. I understood the purport of his words; he styled her his soul-mate, a radiant being from a higher world, imprisoned for a brief term in a lovely earthly body, not to suffer as an expiation for crimes committed on another orb, but to live a sweet, happy life, joyous and free as a butterfly's, for the sake of souls on earth who could be uplifted only through her sojourn among them.

"As I listened spell-bound to this discourse and wondered why I should have been chosen to listen to such wondrous tales and privileged to enjoy such association, I ventured to ask of Azoriel, 'Have you a blessing for my Gregoire, I ask nothing for myself; he was cut down in the flower of his youth, while life was very sweet to him. I saw him yesterday, but though his eyes beamed very tenderly on me he did not shine like you or Heloise. I would suffer anything if I could help him higher. Oh, can you show me any way that I can help him, even though I am tortured to subserve his gain?'

"The face of Azoriel then turned toward me, and I beheld a countenance so lovely, so divine, that I could have believed it to have been the Lord's, only there were no prints upon his brow.

"'Daughter of a fallen star, though thou art,' he said to me, 'such sentiments are worthy of the blessed ones who never left the path of virtue to tread the by-paths of disobedience to heaven; to this request thou shalt obtain an answer, Light divine shall henceforth enable thee to work with Gregoire in the establishment of the first true college of the soul which in this materialistic generation has been established upon earth; and as thou art now refined from the debasing dross of self seeking love, thou needst not suffer more as thou hast suffered in the past; I was with thee yesterday when thou wert hovering 'twixt life and death in a strange electric trance? I saw your need and your sincerity, and as I am one of those commissioned now to rehabilitate the earth with something of its golden aura of pristine light ere yet its people fell from Arcadian innocence into the mire of selfishness and its resultant pain, I lifted you from your low estate, not to save you simply from a further discipline of pain from which you merited release, but to call you out among the few faithful workers who shall dispense the bread of life to the hungering multitudes who yearn for what, alas, the churches do not and the schools cannot give them. I was on earth in ages past; I dwelt where now the deep, dark waters of the Atlantic roll, when Atlantis was fair and young, ere her people fell a prey to wanton pride which compassed their destruction; I trod with glee the hills and vales of the Pacific slope, when peaceful nations rose to heights of bliss almost forgotten now, a district where at this day a new race is forming and the god of gold is contending with heavenly troops for mastery. But thou art weak, as yet, my child, and canst not bear too long a severance from the material robe in which thou for many years to come, as men count time, must work for earth's emancipation. I will now grant thy request; I cannot bring Gregoire here; he is not ready to breathe the air of this bright star which thou canst breathe freely, for thou hast suffered and borne thy purgation on earth. I will take thee to him, and where he is thou wilt learn more of thy heaven-born mission. You will not see me again during this journey; Heloise is thine escort visibly; I am thine unseen guardian; fare thee well and call on me whenever thou art in trouble.'

"The angel had no sooner ceased speaking than I realized that I was passing down what seemed a steep declivity, supported by Heloise, upon whose arm I leaned heavily, but tenderly. Following, as though by instinct, every movement of her will, I soon came to a place where at first I could see nothing; presently the idea of a military encampment came to me, and there, surrounded by comrades in arms, I saw my beloved Gregoire. At first he did not seem to see me, but as my mother love penetrated the atmosphere around him, as sunshine dispels a fog, he turned to me quickly with a sudden flush of glad recognition, and smiling sweetly upon me, said:

"'Your prayers, dear mother, have always reached me. Whenever you have thought of me I have felt it; but oh, this visit from yourself in person is more than I dared to expect. According to the canon of your church you have thought of me in purgatory, though you have tried to believe I had ere this entered paradise; but, mother, I was not the pure, unselfish boy you thought me. I loved you purely and unselfishly, and sincere love for any creature, if that love is not quite overgrown with foul weeds of selfishness, is a base on which angels build when they seek to renew our characters. I was restless and unhappy when I left the body, for I clung to earthly things with a vigorous and desperate hold, and it was only after bitter disappointments and much conflict, I gained the measure of peace and satisfaction I now enjoy. People make a mystery of the life beyond the grave; they weave complicated webs of fancy, and indulge in many unfounded speculations, but in fact the whole question is decided by the nature and object of a man's affections. I am the same impulsive lad I was on earth, a little sobered and subdued, and I hope a little wiser than when we shared a dear old home in days gone by.'

"Much of his narrative I cannot tell; it was too sacred, too personal even to be mentioned to you, my dear and valued friends; but I was assured by Heloise that you, Dr. Maxwell, and dear Mrs. Finchley, who has been like a mother to me, knew all about it, as you had followed me in my wanderings, and learned how Heloise, whom I should never have known but for you, escorted me through space and took me to my son. I cannot enter more freely into details; the endeavor to reproduce all I saw is quite beyond me, but I was assured I should soon have other experiences which I may fully remember and recite, and even publish for the benefit of others."

When Mrs. Macmarcy had ceased speaking, Mr. Templeton enquired how such experiences in the invisible world were reconcilable with scripture, and how a minister of the gospel could possibly accept such doctrine and continue to perform his duties to his flock.

"Our church," said he, "teaches most emphatically that there is no such intermediate state as you describe. We can accept paradise but not purgatory, and does it not interfere with accepting the finished work of Christ to imagine a place of probation beyond the tomb? I do not say that I myself am loth to credit your statement as actually true and not merely a vivid dream; I have thought of these matters frequently and have read Dorner and other German theologians who favor what is called 'second probation,' and now I am in New York at Dr. Maxwell's kind request, for the express purpose of receiving what light I can on all these matters, I beg of you all to let me hear all you have to tell, whatever it may be. In all humility I can faithfully declare I am a seeker after truth, and though I may have to relinquish my prospects and take a fresh start in life, I am willing to make any sacrifice or change if I can but be sure I am being guided to lead souls to God, not away from Him."

Mrs. Macmarcy, who was quite a novice in all such matters herself, and had trembled lest she should overstep the boundaries of her own previous belief, sympathized heartily with the Baptist minister, but could help him no further than by assuring him she knew inwardly that all she related was actually true. The strong corroborative testimony of two such thoroughly trustworthy persons as Dr. Maxwell and his aunt, in addition to her own sense of certainty within, had dissolved her doubts, as the sun melts an iceberg or dissipates a fog, and she was now ready to devote herself in future entirely to the discovery and promulgation of such truth as might be revealed to her.

* * * * * * *

Ten days later she was perfectly strong, and had gained twenty pounds in weight; she then returned to her home in Virginia, where she intended founding an orphan school for delicate girls who might enjoy the comforts and attention attainable only in a well regulated home, as well as the benefits of a sound, moral and secular education. In this enterprise she was warmly seconded by friends of Dr. Maxwell and Mrs. Finchley, and soon became a robust, hearty woman, the center of a thriving community of growing girls, developing not only in physical grace and vigor, but in what is far more important still, true womanhood which fits its possessor for usefulness on earth and indescribable blessedness hereafter.

CHAPTER VII.

CLAIRVOYANCE DEMONSTRATED.

"They told me many wondrous tales,
Of how the angels come to earth
Swift, as on wings of living flame,
To quicken nobler thought to birth.
I could not understand the thread
Of such discourse, until I saw
Before my very eyes the proof
Of Heaven's divine mysterious law.
Why should I harbor any doubt,
Or wherefore should I suffer dread;
Why is it not enough for me
To be by such wise counsel led?"

Mrs. Macmarcy's narration of her vision had led Mr. Templeton into one of those strange reveries of his, which though of every rare occurence, had from early childhood largely shaped the current of his life. Often when a boy he had been the subject of strange experiences, which he dared no longer relate to his austere parents after they had sent him several nights in succession lunchless to school and supperless to bed. As it often happens with children of sensitive temperament who can take an outward or an inward interest in life as occasion demands, the youthful Onesimus finding his spiritual experiences distasteful to his relatives, (who attributed them to the devil, insanity or disease according to their moods), soon learned to agree with his surroundings and to refuse all invitation from the unseen to carve out a special environment for himself. Neither remarbably profound or superficial in his conclusions, he simply addressed himself to his tasks with the feeling that if God called him to the work of the ministry, God would qualify him in some special manner for the work.

Mrs. Margaret Lesbia Templeton (his mother), became a widow when he was only seven years old. His father, the Rev. Aaron Edwards Templeton, had been pastor of the Saddlerock Baptist Church for nineteen years; his wife married him three years before the birth of their only son. After the good minister had resisted for nine years all the efforts of match-making mothers and aspiring farmers' daughters to induce him to enter the matrimonial estate, Lesbia Mintsheller had visited Saddlerock one summer with an invalid mother who died while on a visit to the place. Immediately after the funeral Mr. Templeton discovered her penniless condition and utter inability to sustain herself when left entirely to her own resources; but he did not realize how devotedly he loved her, until one day after he had undertaken to provide for her support in the family of an old and valued parishioner, who had known him from babyhood, with such delicacy that poor heart-broken Lesbia Mintsheller thought God had indeed sent good Samaritans to her in the persons of Deacon and Mrs. Haggai Ezekiel Macpherson-Smith,—he found her weeping over her Bible, tears in which resignation, sorrow, regret, faith and hope were all blended like the hues of the rainbow.

Mrs. Macpherson-Smith touched him lightly on the shoulder, whispering "Aaron my lad, there is the wife heaven has sent you, as God sent Rebekah to Jacob, only it won't be fourteen years, or seven either before you can make the parsonage what it ought to be."

The good man was then just thirty-four years of age and though still in early manhood had become settled in bachelor habits. His elder sister, Sophronia Angelica, a firm maiden lady, kept house for him and never touched his papers or thought of entering his library without his special permission. His ways were all regulated with mathematical precision, and from the straight-line of this uncompromising rigidity no deviation was ever permitted. One can imagine how such a person who had positively shunned marriage, and was inclined to a view of the celibacy of the clergy most uncommon among evangelical Protestants, would start at such words from the lips of a staid old deaconess, about as unworldly an old soul as one would be likely to meet in a journey around the world. With characteristic terseness and brevity, he said, "God's will be done," if the Lord has sent me to her; or, rather directed her to me, it is not for his dust to question his decree.

He always alluded to himself as God's dust, it was a very favorite expression of his in the long prayer at every public service. The congregation would have felt that some familiar and beloved portion of their liturgy had been omitted had they not heard the phrase, "bless thy dust," which always came after a list of petitions for all sorts and conditions of people. Mr. Templeton put himself last and styled himself dust in all sincerity, for he was really a very self-abnegating man, and when his old friend told him God had ordained that he should marry Lesbia, his first thought was only one of complete surrender to whatever might be the inscrutable purpose of the Almighty; his second emotion was however of a very different nature. The love which had slumbered but never awoke, now asserted itself with all the intenser fervor by reason of its long repression, and when Lesbia rose from her absorbed attitude, and turned to greet the minister with watery eyes which tried to smile, his pressure of her hand was not the same as it had been before. She felt the change in his touch and he ackowledged the involuntary, almost unconscious response of her soul to his. The proposal was soon made, and a mutual declaration of love was speedily followed by a very quiet marriage.

Mrs. Templeton took up her abode as mistress of the parsonage, to the surprise of every one, it is true; but so quietly and naturally, that even the most voracious gossips found very little to talk about. She was soon universally respected and beloved, as she was her husband's companion and helpmeet in all things; a very quiet, subdued minister's wife, whom no one dared to approach with scandal; one of whom some stood in fear, not on account of her imposing manner or commanding voice (she was gentleness personified), but by reason of the perfectly frank gaze of her modest grey eyes, which seemed to see through imposture, and her inveterate hatred of gossip. She was a woman of comparatively few words; her parents had both been Baptists; she had joined a church when only seventeen, and was therefore fully prepared for the work in which she soon found herself actually engaged.

Her husband, though an excellent man and tenderly devoted to his fragile, yet healthy wife, was of a stern temperament and could not tolerate the slightest departure from the creed of his denomination. His first and last wish for his little son (Onesimus) was that he might be a minister, and if possible, carry on the work in the very place where he himself had labored.

When Onesimus was only six, his father's health began to fail—hereditary pnuemonia, doctors and anxious friends pronounced his disorder; his voice became feeble and uncertain; a minister from a neighboring village often assisted him in his duties, and at length he resigned most reluctantly, amid the tears and prayers of the people who never knew how much they valued him until they felt he was to be taken from them.

Two months after his resignation, sea air having failed to recruit his wasted energies, he passed from the body, triumphant in faith, singing in a weak, quavering voice, "Rock of Ages," as the spirit severed its connection with its earthly tenement. His last act was to call the little Onesimus to his side, and blessing him fervently, prayed that God might incline his heart to the work of the ministry and direct his steps to the pastorate of the Saddlerock Baptist Church. After her husband's death, Mrs. Templeton never fully recovered her energies, she was always plaintive, but still very useful in the district. Though the succeeding pastor, the Rev. Martindale Fischer-Bennett was a married man with a very energetic wife, they were always good to Mrs. Templeton and the two families decided to live together for economy and company's sake.

As Onesimus grew up, he found himself more under the tutelage of the Fischer-Bennetts than under the influence of his mother; they directed his studies and mapped out his career; his mother acquiesced in her usual quiet way, but whether she fully endorsed all their opinions, her son never knew. The Fischer-Bennetts left Saddlerock when Onesimus was ordained, and they were not sorry to do so, as they departed for a larger and more lucrative field of effort. Mr. Templeton had lived alone with his mother since his settlement over his father's church, and it was of her he chiefly thought when the impending changes in his course of teaching came most forcibly to his mind.

While in New York, in an atmosphere highly charged with what might be called a "developing influence," the seership which his father most sternly rebuked and punished, and his mother attributed to poor health in childhood, now began to reassert itself with more than its original vigor; reminiscenses of childhood's experience which before had been faint, latent recollections, now returned with a vividness he could never have supposed possible, and these remembrances crowded about him; he called to mind singular episodes in his mother's history, which convinced him that she also was a dreamer of dreams and beholder of visions, but had refrained from all mention of such things through fear of offending her husband during his lifetime, and afterwards from an over sensitive regard for his memory. She was a woman who could never bring herself to feel that a true marriage lasted only "until death" and her son had sometimes felt (though scarcely willing to admit the thought even in the privacy of his own chamber) that perhaps his father was much nearer to his mother, and even capable of impressing her with his wishes than their fixed beliefs permitted them to suppose.

But after all, however much may be said about churchly antagonism to spirit communion, Christian literature of the most pronounced orthodox type abounds with incidents in the lives of foremost Christian advocates abundantly proving how deep seated and widespread is a belief in communion with "people from another world," even among those who are supposed to be very strenuous in their opposition to such a doctrine.

The day after Mrs. Macmarcy's narrative, while Mr. Templeton was pondering in solitude over some of his own experiences, it occurred to him to search in Dr. Maxwell's library for such volumes as might help him to ascertain the views of some distinguished authors on the subject of visions of the departed. Among other testimonies he came across the following:

"The year just past, like all other years, has taken from a thousand circles the sainted, the just and the beloved; there are spots in a thousand graveyards which have become this year dearer than all the living world; but in the loneliness of sorrow how cheering to think that our lost ones are not wholly gone from us! They still may move about in our homes, shedding around them an atmosphere of purity and peace, promptings of good and reproofs of evil; we are compassed about with a cloud of witnesses, whose hearts throb in sympathy with every effort and struggle, and who thrill with joy at every success.

"How should this thought check and rebuke every worldly feeling and unworthy purpose, and enshrine us, in the midst of a forgetful and unspiritual world, with an atmosphere of heavenly peace! They have overcome, have risen, are crowned, glorified; but still they remain to us, our assistants, our comforts; and in every hour of darkness their voice speaks to us: 'So we grieved, so we struggled, so we fainted, so we doubted; but we have overcome, we have obtained, we have seen and found all true; and in our own heaven behold the certainty of thy own.'"—HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

"I believe there are angels of light, spirits of the blest, ministers of God. . . . There have been times in which, I declare to you, heaven was more real than earth; in which my children that were gone spoke more plainly to me than my children that were with me; in which the blessed estate of the just man in heaven seemed more real and near to me than the estate of any just man upon earth. These are experiences that link one with another and higher life."—HENRY W. BEECHER.

CHAPTER VIII.

CLAIRVOYANCE DEMONSTRATED.

As he continued reading and pondering over these beautiful words, culled from the rich, ripe experiences of two remarkably noble and useful lives, a strange sense of reverie stole over him, and out of the deepening gloom which seemed to encircle him, shutting out the surrounding scenery, a form appeared so closely resembling his father as to make him start suddenly, yet carrying with it a delightful feeling of ineffable repose. Whether he was sleeping, dozing or wide awake, he could not tell, he was certain however, that some gentle pressure of the hand accompanied by the accents of a clear, deep voice, impressed these words on his brain, as though they had been traced in letters of living fire:

"My son, let not any doubt disturb you in your religious trust; you are now to see truth far more clearly than I saw it when on earth. Old doctrines must be freshly interpreted; the Bible is a mine containing precious ore, but it is the hidden meaning not the superficial import you must seek; with the kernel of the fruit, not any longer with its outer rind, can you feed the people committed to your pastoral care. I was, as you know, a strict adherent to literal forms when I occupied the place which now you fill; people then were not prepared for what they are ready to receive now; do not shrink from announcing your uttermost conviction, it is yours to thaw the ice around the hearts of many, to break down lurking, unsuspected unbelief in the minds of many who still adhere to olden customs which they cannot reconcile with modern views of life. Your place is not outside the church but in it; you must not cloak conviction, neither may you too carelessly offend the weak, as many reformers do. Move cautiously but conscientiously; enlarge men's faith, do not attack it; broaden your sermons, do not attack prevailing dogmas. Some little persecution awaits you, but the people at large will follow you, and though some trials are before you, they are not of a nature to cause any stout heart alarm. Your mother knows of what is going on in your secret mind; she has been a seeress many years, but never avowed it, out of regard for me, for I used to be very bitter against all such revelations. Thank heaven I am wiser now than then. I have seen the folly and the wrong of mental despotism, and had I my life to live over again I would never seek to cramp the limbs or tie the wings of any soul. You will have a letter from your mother in a day or two confirming what I say; this is an evidence I give you of my trustworthiness. This day your mother is inditing you an epistle, in which she makes full confession of her experiences from girlhood; when you receive the letter you will hear from me again. Now farewell; you always have my blessing, but I give it you for old association's sake."

Mr. Templeton awoke suddenly from his reverie which had lasted several hours, and as he awoke he saw Zenophon, who had been an inmate of Dr. Maxwell's house since the preceding Sunday night, glide swiftly into the room and take a book from one of the shelves. Feeling disposed to converse on the subject nearest his heart, he stopped the boy, saying kindly:

"Come here, Zenophon, I want to ask you something about your own life, about the trances you go into and the visions you see. Do you suppose you could see something for me? I'm very anxious to get an explanation of a singular occurrence which has just impressed me deeply."

"I'm sure I don't know, sir," replied the boy. "I'll try, if you like; I'll sit quite still and describe anything I see if anything is shown me; but I've always been Count Katolowynski's subject, and as I have been taken from him, I don't know if I have any power left. I won't stay away from him long for I love him though he does beat me sometimes; he has never been as kind to me as all of you here are, but he is my master and I will obey him; whenever he summons me I shall return to him. If he comes here and wants to take me away, I will go with him wherever he chooses."

No sooner had Zenophon thus testified his love for the Count, who had so singular a hold over him, than a loud double-knock and furious ring of the door-bell startled the servants to their feet. Count Katolowynski, handsomer and prouder than ever to all appearance, entered the study with a supercilious nod to Mr. Templeton and a "so you are here, Zenophon, I thought they hadn't devoured you." Then divining Mr. Templeton's wishes he instantly magnetized the boy, who became quickly prophetic and said to Mr. Templeton: "You will get a letter from your mother the day after to-morrow by the early post." Zenophon here paused for a moment and stood gazing earnestly on something no one else could see; he then read as from an unseen manuscript suspended in the air, the following missive:

"My Dear and Only Son—It is not often I approach you on a subject with regard to which our opinions may differ, but of late I have had most singular and vivid dreams of your father. I cannot feel that they are only dreams; he visits me night after night and holds long conversations with me, and oh, my dearest boy, you must not be shocked when I tell you he argues with me on theology just as he used to, taking difficult texts, throwing light upon them by comparing them with others and then winding up with a short homily in which he clenches his argument and brings home a lesson. I cannot be deluded, why should I be, I have been a faithful wife to him and mother to you according to my lights, and the scripture even when it speaks most harshly, never says God sends delusion or allows it to come to those who are striving to walk in His way. Oh, how I wish you could enter into my feelings and share my experience, for my husband tells me in these visions you are seeking light earnestly but are as yet bewildered concerning many things, you cannot plainly see the way; it is simple when one finds it, it is indeed plain enough for the wayfaring man to walk in without stumbling.

"You will perhaps call me a Spiritualist and even think I am getting crazy, but even for your sake, I could not pretend to deny, neither could I cloak the convictions which are daily adding to my joy in this world and my hope for the next. The minister at Pinchingtown is delivering a course of lectures on 'Demonology,' and as our church is closed, a number of our people go over there to hear this Mr. Mewle, whom many think a fine preacher, but he grates on me. I have been occasionally to the little Catholic church at Shoe Hill, and oftener for long, solitary rambles among the hills. You will find me changed when you return home; I have lost much of my reserve and I have developed an insatiate desire to visit sick people, and they all welcome me with the brightest smiles; the priest at St. Catherine's tells me I would make an excellent sister of charity, and wants me to enter the Convent of Our Lady of Perpetual Help, opposite his church; he is a good, self-denying man, but completely wrapped in a mantle of creed. I tell him I am no longer a Baptist, but I can never be a Romanist; I must let God speak to me as He will, just in His own way, through all the voices of nature and through His children who have risen higher. I like the quiet, earnest work of the Sisters but I cannot join an order; I shall never be acceptable again as a teacher in an "orthodox" Sunday-school, for I cannot disguise my convictions. If you are still "orthodox" when you return home I shall be quite silent if it hurts you to hear me speak, but if, as I trust and feel assured, the same change comes over you which has come over me, we shall work together, not to depopulate the churches, but to infuse new life into the service of God, and to reach some portion of the great unchurched mass which can never be reached by prevailing methods.

"Write to me as soon as you can after receiving this; be quite candid with me, don't try to spare my feelings if you think I am misguided, but intuition tells this letter will be welcome rather than distasteful to you in your present mood. Remember me kindly to the family of your host, and give them my thanks for their kindness to you.

"As ever, your devoted mother,

LESBIA TEMPLETON.

"SADDLEROCK, Vt., July 30, 1887."

After this marvelous display of clairvoyance (the day after the morrow confirmed it), Zenophon awoke suddenly, rubbed his eyes, resumed his former posture at Count Katolowynski's feet. When questioned as to his marvelous gift, declared he knew nothing whatever about anything that was given through him. After a few minutes' conversation Dr. Maxwell and the ladies returned from an afternoon drive. They were all quietly courteous to the Count, and he was invited to dinner, but no one of them seemed pleased to see him.

The Count refused the invitation, saying it was his intention to give Zenophon an evening's amusement; they would dine at Delmonico's, then visit Madison Square Theatre, where "The Private Secretary," was being performed. After the theatre they should take ices and return to the Hotel Meurice, where the Count rented a splendid suite of rooms on the grand etage.

Dr. Maxwell quietly said, "Zenophon, remember your home is here; I shall expect you to-morrow, if you accept your friend's invitation to-night. I do not forbid your going with him, perhaps I have no right to use so strong a word, I however disapprove of it, but act as you please."

Count Katolowynski, bridling at these words, said, "the boy belongs to me, and I shall hold him, though you do want him, for some mercenary schemes of your own. I only let him remain with you the past three days to test his loyalty to me. Say what you will, do what you will, he is mine always. The farce on Sunday night was one of your contrivances; it was well acted; but it takes more than that to scare a man of my nerve, so you had better reserve your private theatricals for more gullible and appreciative spectators."

With this insolent speech the Count departed, the boy following him like a dog, not however without casting a grateful look on the inmates of the library, which said as plainly as glances can speak: I am not leaving you for good, of this I can assure you. While the Count and his subject were on the street they maintained an unbroken silence, but as soon as they were seated vis a vis in a cabinet particulier in the grand restaurant, they found their tongues and chatted to gether with all the exuberance of youthful glee. Count Katolowynski was a spy in the employ of the Russian government; a trained diplomat to whom clairvoyant aid, such as that rendered by Zenophon, was of priceless value. Never thinking it necessary to be on his guard when alone with the boy, and having taught him to converse fluently in Russian, he unfolded to him all his plans for extracting secrets from the wives and daughters of ministers from foreign courts and particularly for utilizing Zenophon himself as a discoverer of all he desired to know.

The boy's moral sense was usually keen, he shrunk from every species of dishonorable conduct; still the fascination of the Count's presence and magnetism was so great that even after all that had transpired on the previous Sunday, he found himself enraptured; he admired his master even in his dishonorable enterprises. Strange it is, but none the less is it true, that when under a spell exerted by beauty of person and assertion of will, even the purest of sensitives are likely to be entrapped, even to lend themselves to crime unless fortified against all unhallowed influence by strongly confirmed knowledge coupled with intense love of truth. Impersonal affec- tion for truth is the only infallible safeguard against magnetic witcheries and intoxicating spells.

The dinner was fit for a prince and cost $15, though the Count only ordered one portion of each desired article and he took but one pint bottle of Widow Clicquot The play at Madison Square delighted them both, for the stately Russian had all a boy's love of ridiculous situations, and though it was out of the "season" and many of the boxes and stalls were vacant, the company played their best to the intensely appreciative though unfashionable house. After the performance and a feast of delicious ices and fancy confections at Tortoni's, a walk up Broadway brought them to the Hotel Meurice at 1 A.M.

Count Katolowynski's rooms were magnificent and superbly furnished; three spacious apartments and a bathroom constituted the suite. In an atmosphere of luxury and light and in company with the imperial master whom he idolized and who was in his most agreeable mood, it is not to be wondered at the boy soon fell asleep to the music of such thoughts as had often allured him in the brightest hours of his past revels in Eastern palaces and gardens with himself Grand Vizier at a Court where his master was Absolute Monarch. The softly tempered light, the faint odor of pastiles burning in a rich antique vase on the mantlepiece, the rich draperies at the windows and coverlets of the bed, which were all of oriental design and had been specially procured to meet the Count's fastidious requirements, naturally lent a strong suggestion of the orient to the boy's meditations before retiring; and usually our dreams are an outgrowth from our thoughts during the day though not in the limited sense to which many people confine this statement. Exceptions it is said prove many a rule, and to this rule for dreams a singular exception was found in the case of Zenophon, who, marvelous to relate, went to sleep in a nightrobe in Count Katolowynski's apartments in the Hotel Meurice at 1.30 A. M., and woke fully dressed at 9 A. M., on a lounge in Dr. Maxwell's room at 312 Sycamore avenue, a considerable distance off.

How he got there he could not imagine; his eyes closed on the splendors in the hotel, he was perfectly content with his surroundings; but (seemingly without intermission of time) he awoke to the tones of the breakfast gong in Dr. Maxwell's house. As he had been recently in that house for a few days, he was not at all startled; nothing was new or strange about him; but when he entered the breakfast room he was greeted with exclamations of surprise by all present except Dr. Maxwell. Then a sudden burst of recollection came over him, and throwing himself at Dr. Maxwell's feet, as he had been accustomed to fall at the Count's, he imploringly solicited an explanation of so singular an occurrence. The good Doctor could only reassure him by telling him that all was well, and bid him eat his breakfast as though nothing unusual had happened, then accompany him into the study and seek an explanation from the unseen.

The following explanation was given through the boy's own lips, who went into a deep trance immediately he entered the study: "The powers who have charge of this young hierophant, seeing the necessity of withdrawing him again from pernicious control, guided him in his sleep to do the right thing. At 7.30 he was made to get out of bed and dress himself, he left the hotel like any guest going out to walk; he was further guided to let himself into this house by means of the key you have given him, and to proceed to your room after you had left it. Enquiry at the hotel will confirm the statement that nothing unusual occured. Count Katolowynski is not yet up, when he discovers the boy is missing he will think he has gone to church and will not search for him till noon, when he will begin to grow wrathful; later in the day there will be an explosion. The decisive moment has come and Azoriel will assert his power finally. You are all going to Paris in ten days, do not be surprised, you will be summoned unexpectedly. Prof. de Montemarte has written for you; you will hear from Heloise long before you get the letter."

CHAPTER IX.

PREDICTIONS VERIFIED.

O had I but the eagle eye
  Which sees within, behind, before,
Which compasses all sea and shore,
  And yet is ever turned on high.

Then would I leave this lower earth,
  And on the wings of tho't and love
Soar to those eyries far above,
  Where songs celestial find their birth.

But if awhile below I stay,
  And dimly thro' the veil of sense
Behold life's glorious recompense,
  Truth here may turn my night to day."

Dr. Maxwell, with his usual clear-sightedness,—and considerably aided by the talk he had with Zenophon on the memorable day when the boy was so strangely delivered from Count Katolowynski's hands, and guided by unseen intelligence while in trance to make his way to the hospitable home where the family had already come to regard him as a son of the house—thinking prevention better than warfare with a person of the Count's irascible and unscrupulous disposition, and not being much pressed with immediate duties, proposed to Mr. Templeton, Zenophon, Mrs. Finchley, and the O'Shannons, that they should all go up the river as far as Northwalk, and visit some old friends of Mrs. Finchley's, who had a large, hospitable country-seat in that pretty suburb, where they were always prepared for company, and delighted to see friends whenever they might call.

Not wishing, however, to arrive inopportunely, and being anxious for Mr. Templeton's particular benefit to test Zenophon's clairvoyance in a matter which admitted of easy and speedy verification, the party above mentioned gathered round the boy who always liked to recline on a rug in the centre of a harmonious circle when he exercised his gift,—and let Mrs. Finchley, who was on intimate terms with the Codringtons of Northwalk, interrogate him as to their present readiness to receive visitors. Zenophon, who was always particularly lucid under Mrs. Finchley's suggestions, at once began describing "The Cedars" and its occupants. "I see," he said, "a venerable man seated at an escritoire writing a note of invitation to you; it reads as follows: Dear Mrs. Finchley, do come over to-day and bring all your friends. We shall hope to see you to luncheon at 2, but if any of you can not get here so early, be sure and take dinner with us at 6.30. We want you to hear Mr. Vincent Hammer who is just from Scotland, and has been entertaining the Edinburgh professors with his views on Theosophy. We have a conversazione this evening; he will read a paper; don't fail us. Wife sends her love, and urges her claim on your offer of help when we have unexpected visitors." Yours as ever,

AMOS CODRINGTON.

The Cedars, Northwalk, July 31, 1887.

"Well," said Templeton, "here's another case of most extraordinary letter reading. I am intensely anxious about the letter from my mother which I shall get to-morrow morning, if this wonderful clairvoyance does not disappoint me; but here is a letter that ought to come in an hour at latest. It is already nearly 11, and how do they expect us to get out to their house by 2 unless we get news before mid-day?

No sooner had Mr. Templeton spoken than the page knocked at the library door and announced that Mr. Clarence Codrington had called with a message, but could not wait to see any one as he was hurrying into the city on business, and wanted to get home early. He left word that his father and mother were very anxious to see Dr. Maxwell and those of his friends who could make it convenient to spend the day or at least the evening at their place across the water. A letter was on its way, but he brought word to give them more time for preparation.

Here was confirmation direct of Zenophon's perception; Mr. Templeton was delighted, and all were pleased and somewhat astonished at the immediate proof afforded of Zenophon's ability to use his powers to perfection when separated from the Count, to whose mesmeric sway he had been invariably accustomed to yield before passing into the ecstatic condition. Without further delay they arranged their plans for departure, and just as they were leaving to catch the one o'clock boat, the postman delivered to Mrs. Finchley a letter addressed in Mr. Codrington's well-known hand. On tearing open the letter she found it word for word as Zenophon had read it; she handed it at once to Mr. Templeton, who was overjoyed at this demonstration of the boy's positive accuracy in an affair so nearly related to the one in which he was so greatly interested.

They just caught the boat, and after a delightful hour on the water, reached Northwalk just after two. Mr. Codrington was at the landing stage with a drag, ready to take as many as might appear, to his sylvan retreat about a mile distant. In a few minutes they were at "The Cedars," greeted warmly by Mrs. Lavinia Codrington and Miss Florence Hope (a delightful girl visiting them during the long vacation at Vassar). Lunch was ready and they all partook freely of the good things provided; a lovely drive and delicious sauntering through the extensive grounds which comprised the estate, occupied all the afternoon until dinner, at which meal they were joined by Mr. Clarence Codrington son and heir; a young gentleman of very prepossessing appearance, coupled with such grace and dignity of bearing as can never exist apart from delicacy of feeling and genuine culture in the true sense of that often misapplied word.

About 7.30, carriages began driving up, and pedestrians arrived in considerable numbers. The billiard hall had been arranged to seat at least two hundred people, and as many of the Codringtons' friends and neighbors were greatly interested in Theosophy, the invitations extended were nearly all honored by those who were at home on receipt of them. Delightful music was the order of proceeding for about half an hour; Miss Lydia O'Shannon and Miss Hope had become great friends during the afternoon, and soon discovered that they could play and sing duets together. It is the unchanging experience of truly artistic people, that whenever they encounter congenial spirits they can rise together to artistic heights neither can attain singly.

Dr. Vincent Hammer was a tall, rather prepossessing elderly gentleman, who wore spectacles and spoke from manuscript; his delivery was good though not extraordinary; he was evidently deeply imbued with the importance of his subject, and being a "new-school" Theosophist not in very good standing with the Aryan Theosophical Society, he seemed especially desirous of making himself perfectly understood, and to this end was particularly careful and precise in his statements.

The following is his paper handed to a reporter after the exercises:

"Theosophy is the master-key to eternal life; to the understanding of God and man. True Theosophy concerns itself exclusively with man's spiritual development, with the finding of Christ within, the Divine Logos or Word of the Eternal. When we find God within, where Jesus and the Buddhas alike say God resides, we truly realize our divine nature. Genuine Theosophy is to this generation the Christ of truth arising out of the tomb of error; it teaches complete self-control, the crucifixion of the senses, the liberation of the spirit from all carnal passion, the resurrection of all that is divine within us. Theosophy is complete spiritual science. Knowledge of the eternal is the only true science. To know Christ is to hear the living Word which speaks in us from Infinite Divine Being. When Spirit is revealed, henceforth we have no thought of death. The true Theosophist drinks inspiration from the ever present spiritual life, the universe becomes to him an open book. We must outgrow false ideas and sacerdotalism, and become each one a true priest; our daily sacrifice must be the daily surrender of our lower appetites to our higher promptings.

"The principles of Theosophy are love, wisdom and truth, which reveal to us in measure as we can understand, the absolute purity and perfection of the Divine Nature. Theosophy is universal truth and universal religion; it is demonstrated spiritual science, and holds the key to all sciences and religions. In Theosophy we behold the essential unity of all religions; Theosophists should study all religions, but dogmatically enforce none. What does religion really mean? Religere signifies to bind together, but does not imply a condition of bondage other than that in which the lower nature is held subject to the higher. This is truly at-one-ment or reconciliation, the perfect harmony of all the elements in human nature. Religion does not consist in belief in immorality, or in God. Belief saves no one for it is merely intellectual assent to certain dogmas. One can believe in religion and be devilish; devils it is said believe and tremble. We can be so intellectually unfolded as to believe in God without being in the least developed in our truly spiritual nature.

"What does resurrection mean in our individual lives but rising through death of the lower self to spiritual triumph. Nothing dies in reality, only in seeming. The seed is not quickened unless it undergoes the appearance of death, and there is no quickening of the spirit unless there is a death of the lower self; then from the sepulchre the rock is rolled away a symbol of our new birth to a knowledge of Truth.

Theosophy, which is true religion, is the science of right living, and is in no sense a sacerdotal system. Divine wisdom is the whole world's only religion for the future; a religion which meets every want and fully satisfies every lawful craving of human emotion as well as intellect.

"The Divine Being is necessarily beyond the comprehension of man. Man is not equal to God, there must be therefore a mystery attaching to God for the human mind. That which is on our level we may explain, whatever is beyond that level remains unsolved; God alone understands God, as man alone can comprehend man. As Deity is infinitely above us, Deity is beyond all definition; the soundest metaphysicians never undertake to define Deity. Agnosticism is a despairing confession of honest men whose intellects are unable to solve the problem of Being. Theosophists need not conflict with Huxley or Spencer; all divine things are unknowable to the senses, but Theosophy teaches of spiritual intuition by which we can arrive at some knowledge of Spirit, though to our researches there can be no end. Intellectually we find not God but Energy, Power, Force. The word God means the All-Good, the Good One, nothing more, nothing less.

"Plato's immortal assertion, 'God geometrizes,' does not imply Plato's acknowledgement of anything more than infinite Mind; no kind, loving God appears in that sentence. Infinite power might be cruel. Many people know nothing of God though they profess to believe in God; but not until they advance beyond belief do they find the Eternal. Beliefs imply that some "school" is the custodian of special intelligence from Deity, whose testimony is to be accepted by disciples as final authority. The word Testament means something one leaves behind him when he is going away; while the testator liveth, such documents are of no effect. People who know nothing of God but what they read in the Bible, and concerning that venerable book we would indeed utter nothing disrespectful, believe in a God who has left a Testament. Practically it is so to them. Many Christians believe in a God very far from this world and in no direct way concerned with human affairs. There was, they believe, a time when God spoke to the world, but he speaks no longer; God, for them, has finished His book and has delivered the published volume completed into their hands. How utterly incongruous is this mental attitude with the teachings of Jesus: 'He hath been with you and shall be in you.' It is expedient that I go away, for when I have vanished from your sight the Paraclete will be nearer to you than ever before, and will gradually lead you into all truth. The disciples were directed not to receive truth through any written revelation, but entirely by means of the ever living presence of the Holy Spirit within them. Theosophy places every individual soul on the solid rock of experienced truth on which Theosophy itself is based. We must build our social temple on the rock of impartial equity which we can never find until we discover it in ourselves. Enlightment is a matter of individual spiritual unfoldment; God is Love and Wisdom; absolute equity is the infinite principle of Life. As we act divinely, we perceive a revelation of divine wisdom in our own lives; all knowledge of wisdom proceeds from the love of good in us which is the only divine love. Only when we act from a motive of love directed toward good are our acts truly wise.

"Man's best conception of Deity is that God is love. Love is the highest element in the human soul, and is inseparable from charity, which is love in expression.

"Henry James (an earnest student of Swedenborg, not the novelist) declares in his admirable work, Society, the Redeemed Form of Man, that in studying the problem of life one comes to see ever more and more distinctly that the only possible cause of creation is that God being pure love he can not love himself. Love must have an object, and this object is humanity. Creation, then, is the result of the Divine love seeking object and expression. By humanity, of course, we do not mean exclusively the inhabitants of this one little planet (we need not tell you that the earth is not the universe)

We mean all intelligent inhabitants of all worlds, who unitedly constitute the form of the Divine man or the progeny of God, which is without beginning and without end.

"The true hidden wisdom is to be found in our own inmost selves, not in books or scrolls. God's living word is Man, who is the highest expression of Nature. The hidden wisdom within our own souls must reach our intellects through development of our own inner self, and in no other way. Theosophy does not depend on legends, on belief in historical personalities or on the truth contained in sacred books. It rests solely on its own intrinsic value, and appeals to our moral nature. If Buddha or Jesus never lived, the teachings are no less value able to man. Precious stones have intrinsic value, and truth is aptly compared to a priceless pearl.

"All divine teaching is demonstrated through its hallowing influence on human life. Judge the tree by its fruits. Bring all theories to the touch-stone of experience. Were we to find that the teachings of the Vedas (lived up to) caused war and hatred to vanish from the earth, we should thereby know the source whence these streams sprang to be a fountain of living water, able to slake the spiritual thirst of mankind.

There is nothing of moral value in the Vedas that we do not find in the New Testament also. The teachings attributed to Gautama and to Jesus are identical. We can well dispense with controversy when we drink true inspiration. Whether we look to Guatama or any other historic light of India; or to Jesus, the historic light of Palestine; or to Osiris, the legendary messiah of Egypt, we must never forget that neither Osiris, Christ or Buddha, or what they typify, is ever dead and buried. In spirit Jesus is working now as actively as when he was on earth. The truth the Buddhas or Osiris revealed is still operating in the world.

"Why seek ye the living among the dead?" Why watch by a sepulchre when you can converse with the living spirit on the highways of life? When we liberate our intuition, the sun within us sheds around our path its bright beams of appreciable light and heat. (wisdom and affection.)

Those who bathe in the sunlight hourly appropriate its rays. Not those who have analyzed the water or tested the depth of the well, but those who drink the water of life reap its benefits. Not our historic knowledge of a revelation of truth, but our assimilation of it profits us. We must eat and drink, i. e. appropriate the living Spirit of Truth, which is ever active throughout the universe. The past has risen in the present; we must live to-day, not worshipfully regret the days of old, Our present at-one-ment with the living Christ can alone bring us into consciousness of truth. The truths of Spirit are not apprehended by the intellect, but by intuition; later on, reason grapples with inward revelation and defines it. Be guided entirely by your individual intuition; be ever honest and intensely earnest in your search for truth, and you will each one of you discover all it is needful for you to know.

Races of Mahatmas may have spent ages in ferreting out the truths of the universe, but their existence is not positively known even to Buddhists. Truth is revealed only to those who are in a condition to appreciate it. There is probably no reluctance on the part of any genuine Mahatmas to reveal themselves, but no one can create eyes in us to discover truth even if it visits us most intimately.

When Edwin Arnold was there, he held conferences with the Buddhists of Ceylon, and received from them a very complimentary address, eulogizing him as a true interpreter of the Sanscrit philosophy. "The Light of Asia," they endorsed with much affection. Conversing with them of Mahatmas, he was told that the priests knew nothing of the existence of such people; they could not be found, though they were famous in Europe and America. At the same time these Buddhists affirmed that there were many teachings in the Sanscrit which, if followed out, would develop men into Mahatmas (greatly unfolded souls.)

The Buddhists themselves think Arnold's faithful and magnificent portrayal of the career of the latest Buddha has done more than anything else to recall the attention of the Hindu people to a perception of the beauties enshrined in the Buddhist religion, and it affords them a powerful incentive to live up to these teachings.

We hear a great deal of Indian degradation, particularly of woman's degraded condition in India. It can not be disputed that many women in India are in a state of gross degradation, but this condition exists in spite of the teachings of the Sanscrit philosophy which lead logically to the elevation of all mankind, not in consequence of their religion. All the vices of Christendom are rebuked in Scripture, but tolerated in Christian communities. No charge can be brought against the Buddhist religion for the vices of Asia that can not be brought against every other religion on earth with equal force and justice.

As the religion of India is set forth in its sacred books, it is a religion of the greatest purity and noblest wisdom. No one who faithfully and studiously compares the ten great religions of the world, will fail to find Buddhism the most humanitarian, and Brahmanism the most metaphysical of all known systems. Buddhism taught that nothing and no one can come between us and God if we are loyal to each other.

We are, according to this philosophy, our own high priests, mediators, and intercessors, absolutely free to discover truth for ourselves by following in the path marked out by our own intuition which gives: "Thus saith the indwelling Spirit" as final authority. Too many people unfortunately are not contented without some external lord or master to obey; they require some one to do their thinking for them instead of appealing directly to the Lord within their own hearts, so as to receive Truth from the source of all truth. It is only to awaken spiritual thought and intellectual inquiry that we ask you to study Theosophy, not to induce allegiance to some hierarchy of India; for to the Christian world 'follow Christ' is as necessary as 'follow Buddha' can be to Orientals. I shall hope to make myself further intelligible in other and ampler essays."

After the essay, other speakers being invited to address the company, there was little time left for discussion. Mr. Templeton was deeply interested, (he always was in such matters), but Mr. Hammer's paper raised far more questions in his mind than it answered; he therefore lapsed into taciturnity on the way home, and scarcely slept the night following through revolving these great questions in his eagerly inquiring mind. Next morning the letter from his mother arrived during breakfast, word for word as Zenophon had foreseen it. Count Katolowynski had instituted legal proceedings based on the claim that Dr. Maxwell had abducted Zenophon, and the general atmosphere at 312 Sycamore avenue was highly excited though its elder inmates were quite unharrassed as they had long since learned to trust implicitly in the final victory of Right.

CHAPTER X.

A SUDDEN DEPARTURE.

"If on the mystic shores of time
I stand perplexed and sad,
t is not that my heart rebels;
For much I am most glad,
But what I know is very small,
The unknown is so vast.
I only long to reach some port,
And find an anchor cast.
I think, I dream, I sigh, I long;
The answer must come soon.
The Lord of Truth will not deny
His child the asked-for boon.
In deep humility I crave,
And as I beg, I trust
And hope 'gainst hope that some day soon
This all impassive dust
Will change to flowers beneath the touch
Of life's mysterious spell;
And I shall know with certainty
God doeth all things well."

Frequently it occurs when something disagreeable seems close at hand, if persons who are interested in averting the difficulty do but exercise their highest judgment—aided by such intuition as they may be blessed with—they can effectually convert the most perplexing affairs into occasions for rejoicing.

Some such consideration as this was coursing through Dr. Maxwell's mind the day following the excursion to Northwalk, as about 3 o'clock in the afternoon he sat alone in the library, studying out the best method of dealing with Count Katolowynski's impertinent and threatening missive which lay open on the desk before him. The Count was in a blind fury; he refused to reason, nothing but legal action would satisfy him. He had called twice during the day, and so insulted the doctor, that—long suffering man though he was—he was at last aroused to something like impatience.

Zenophon, he declared, should never with his consent, be returned into slavery, let the Count do his worst. Whatever Russian law might sanction; slavery could never be supported in any court in England or America. This the Count knew only too well, and consequently based his complaint on a charge of abduction, and went so far as to concoct an elaborate tissue of falsehood, which he had instructed his lawyer, Mr. Wilbur Nayerjust, to lay before the judge with the utmost emphasis.

But where was Zenophon? Count Katolowynski was allowed to search the house from attic to cellar, but no trace of the missing boy could he discover. "What new deviltry is this?" he fumed. "Surely you have imperiled yourself enough already by taking from under my august protection the orphan whom I have sheltered as I would protect my life. I will find Zenophon, though it be over your dead bodies, and if you seek any longer to circumvent the course of equity you will find yourselves between other walls than these. Beware, I say, how you call out the Russian bear, you milksop Americans, you conceited English puppies. I will let you see what it is to trifle with the aristocracy of a country which sends its own subjects to Siberian deserts for life for offenses which are but trifles compared with yours."

"My de r Count," protested Dr. Maxwell, "I beseech you, be considerate on your own account. As for me, I am in a land of freedom, where allusions to Siberia can only provoke a smile, but I assure you in this part of the world, Russian serfdom is not tolerated, and your 'protection' of Zenophon will soon be called by a very different name. I warn you, if you attempt to recapture your escaped victim, you may regret when it is too late, your rash resolve to play upon your claim to Russian aristocracy while in an American city."

At this the Count became so abusive that Dr. Maxwell summoned the servants to show him out, at which humiliation he became so vituperative that the police would have interfered had not the enraged "nobleman" seen the absurdity of his bragadosia just in time to hail a cab and drive pale with fury to the Hotel Meurice, where he roundly abused the waiters, entered a complaint against the clerks to the proprietor, and generally made himself odious and ridiculous. But the reader will ask, where was the innocent cause of this contention all this time? The answer is simplicity itself: he had accompanied his new friends the day before to Northwalk and was at that time reading a book of travels under the trees in Mr. Codrington's park. His situation, however, impressed him strangely; he could not account for much that he was experiencing; occasionally his thoughts turned regretfully to the old life and the master whom he loved, even though he feared him; but a sweet sense of security and bright anticipation was breaking in upon his long fettered mind as the graceful form of Heloise floated through his dream-like reveries, and beyond her power to fascinate he felt the regal influence of the mighty Azoriel who now revealed himself to the wondering child as his constant preceptor.

Zenophon's nature was intensely receptive; his sensitiveness was extreme at every point; all his emotions were intense; he could enjoy and suffer exquisitely; the smallest things often afforded him intense happiness or plunged him in abysses of despair. While under the complete mesmeric control of another, his individual life had been submerged, and often for days and even weeks together, he was scarcely himself for a single hour; but now that this spell was almost broken he would feel as though every living thing about him, flowers and leaves, as well as birds and animals, were instinct with feeling. A more singular impression can hardly be imagined than the vivid realization of omnipresent consciousness which steals over a highly organized nature at a time when the deepest feelings of the inner being are intensely aroused. Physicians may call such a state pathological hypersensitivenes—may no doubt measurably explain it, but even if it be not best adapted to our ordinary life on earth, who shall dare to say that it does not take whoever experiences it in a very real way across the border which separates the seen from the unseen, thereby revealing to the vision of a seer some at least of the actualities of the mystic universe which interpenetrates the physical as the spirit prevades the body?

Mr. Templeton was restless during all that day; an answer to his mother's letter had occupied him all the morning, but after he had posted the long missive he could settle down to nothing. Feeling an insatiable desire to converse with Zenophon he decided on going to Northwalk to visit the Codringtons, who had most hospitably implored him to consider their house one of his homes. Mr. and Mrs. Codrington were both out when he reached their home about 4 P. M. The footman who answered the door was very polite but not communicative; he was one of those thoroughbred English servants who know their place and keep it, and would no more have thought of questioning his employer's guests or visitors about their business than he would have attempted flying.

James Freeman had been with the Codringtons nineteen years. His wife, whom he married five years after entering their service, had been a domestic in the household even longer, and still retained her place as Mrs. Codrington's maid. These good people (Mr. and Mrs. Freeman) had taken a great liking to Zenophon, whose every want they anticipated; but his singular habit of meditating in the garden in preference to chatting in the house keeper's room, made them feel somewhat anxious about the boy, who had a far-away look in his eyes and seemed embarrassed. Thinking Mr. Templeton's society might be of benefit to him, the courteous and deferential footman mentioned the fact of the boy's being in the garden, and proposed sending for him if Mr. Templeton would like to see him. Declining all invitation to partake of cake and fruit (which James was instructed to offer to all visitors), he wended his way through the lovely grounds—then in their richest summer glory—and soon came to the little leafy arbor, in which Zenophon presented a picture any artist would have been glad to paint.

Dressed in picturesque Greek costume—a little scarlet turban on his raven curls, an expression of dreamy thoughtfulness rendering his mobile features remarkably attractive, his whole air one of mystic, pensive expectancy—the boy fully looked the part he had been assigned to play by a higher intelligence than that of his earthly comrades. As Mr. Templeton spoke quietly and kindly to him, questioning him gently concerning the state of his feelings now that he was in a strange house and among people who were not even acquaintances until the day before, he replied that he felt only two emotions: gratitude to all who had been kind to him, and extreme wonder as to whither the mysterious current of his strange, eventful life was bearing him.

He struck Mr. Templeton as a child "without a country," in the fullest sense of that expression. He was a Greek by birth, but so utterly cosmopolitan in all his instincts that one could never tell if he had a scrap more regard for one land than for all others. He talked freely—when in a conversational mood, but never made himself obtrusive, and often he showed a complete aversion to all conversation. At such times he was evidently in communion with states not generally perceived by mortals, for his bright, expressive eyes would show such signal animation as can never light the countenance of one who is indifferent or merely "thoughtful," and certainly such bright expressions do not accompany sad moods.

As Zenophon soon showed perfect willingness to speak freely on any topic, Mr. Templeton interrogated him closely as to the purport of his strange assertion, that the whole party were on their way to Paris, except Mrs. O'Shannon and her youngest daughter, who had decided to spend August at the White Mountains. After gazing into vacancy, as it appeared, for a few moments, he started suddenly, exclaiming, "Oh, there's Heloise again, how eager she looks. "Come at once," I see written in the air in letters of flame; she is in a telegraph office in Paris sending a dispatch; it is growing late in the evening there, the lamps are lighted. Are you ready to go? You MUST go. There are people you must meet who will shape all your future career, you cannot meet them here, only in Paris; in London also you have a work to do very soon, sooner than you can imagine. Look, don't you see the letters, they are vivid to me, you must see them, 'Come on La Gascogne, sails August 9th. Dr. Maxwell, Mrs. Finchley, Lydia O'Shannon, you and I, are all going, and we shall have lovely times across the water. The dispatch will be at Dr. Maxwell's house soon after you get back. Count Katolowynski has changed his mind, he will not prosecute, he sees it's of no use; but he will follow us to Europe. Soon after we get there, business will call him to Russia, a message from the Czar; the Count is a great nobleman, and one of the most reliable spies in the pay of the Government; the message will come from the Czar direct, he will know the cipher and obey instantly; there will be no war between England and Russia for many years, though the papers will go on declaring it imminent."

Proceeding in similar strain, passing rapidly from point to point, Zenophon outlined the future of nations as well as individuals, with an ease and apparent certainty that fairly startled Mr. Templeton, who could not understand how anybody, no matter how clairvoyant, could thus map out the future. He could understand how Swedenborg might describe a fire already burning in Stockholm while he was far away, but prediction of coming events he could not comprehend, and being pastor of a Freewill Baptist Church, he had a strong anti-Calvinistic horror of the doctrine of predestination. Seeing that Zenophon was decidedly in a "superior condition," he put this question to whatever power might be able to answer it through its agency—If God endows man with freedom of will,—and without such freedom I utterly fail to see how any man can be either virtuous or vicious in any moral sense—how can any power foretell the future without coercing human wills, and thereby nullifying the purpose of the Infinite—a result self-evidently impossible?

In soft, but decided accents, the boy made answer in these words: "Prophecy, that greatest of all spiritual gifts, is not, in any sense, as you and many others imagine, fortune-telling, not as though every detail of each human career were planned out so that it must occur just so, and at just such a time. There is, however, a clear-seeing faculty of spirit, which wherever possessed, enables whoever enjoys it to see the general drift of human occurrences, for not only must we recognize an immutable law or order in the universe, we must, if we are logical, attribute foresight to superior intelligence. Speaking of your own personal career, we discern you to be a man of more than average conscientiousness; we know you are superior to the corroding influence of monetary gain, when offers of advancement are not in the way of loyalty to sense of duty; we see the powers which are about you, we know the influences to which you are most subject, and we are also conscious that you have been selected to perform an important mission, which, however, you could put from you, were you to sin against your convictions. This, however, is well nigh impossible for you, for when a soul has awakened, as you have, to love of truth, the affections being wisely directed, there is little likehood of material interests exerting a too powerful sway over conduct. We observe further that, in your case, there will not be a strong worldly inducement for you to back-slide. Your mother, who is, at present, the woman of all others nearest and dearest to you, will be increasingly your coadjutor in every ennobling step you take on your own and other's behalf, and the lady who is to be your wife (to whom you have not yet proposed, but who is growing more and more into your ideal of womanhood, while you are fast becoming her hero, though she never thinks of you in the light of a future husband) will be, in all respects, well calculated to keep you firm in the path outlined by those who direct your steps.

Now for the affairs of Europe. The invisible world is not ruled according to the no-law theory. There is a perfect system of government there combining all the best elements of theocracy, paternalism, monarchy and republicanism, though celestial government is like no form of government now on earth. It is occasionally faintly outlined by such writers as Henry Bulwer (Lord Lytton), and others who are not simply novelists, but inspired genii. When you better comprehend this wise government, you will see something of the law, which enables the seer to foretell coming events.

After about an hour's converse on all sorts of topics, the man and boy—who had, by this time, grown to highly esteem each other—separated, as Mr. Templeton wanted to be back at Dr. Maxwell's by seven o'clock for dinner, as he knew arrangements had been made for a special seance immediately after.

On reaching the house, he found everything just as usual to all appearance, though there was a feeling of agitation in the air, as if some surprising event were about to transpire, or had already taken place. If it be true that "coming events cast their shadows before them," this was not surprising, as the circumstances of the evening more than verified all suspicions.

After dinner the party seated themselves around a large centre table in the library, in a seemingly purposeless manner. Mrs. Catsleigh was the only visitor, and she was particularly instructed to come alone; to insure this, a carriage containing Mrs. Finchley and Miss O'Shannon had gone to pick her up, just as she was thinking where she had better take her dinner (she never liked to board regularly, and in warm weather a restaurant she had visited three times always seemed stifling to her, and the food unpalatable).

She gladly accepted an invitation to dinner, and made herself very agreeable at table, and being simply dressed in white muslin, with japonicas in her hair and corsage, she did not appear so conspicuous as on previous occasions.

Mrs. Catsleigh, who had exercised clairvoyance in childhood, soon began to shudder as though a current of cold air were passing down her spine, but on being asked what she saw or felt, she answered "Oh, nothing."

Mrs. Pushing had advised her to relinquish mediumship altogether, declaring it incompatible with pure "Christian Science," and Mrs. Catsleigh had half yielded to the importunities of her instructress; but whenever she was in Mrs. Finchley's company, she felt the old sensations (not at all unpleasant ones), quite enough to remind her that it is easy to deny what one will with the lip, but far more difficult to banish experiences which pertain legitimately to the psychic department of science and human experience. As the conversation drifted to the proceedings of Psychical Research Societies on both sides of the Atlantic, Dr. Maxwell commented forcibly upon the silly attitude of many committees; some of them being strongly addicted to a narrow form of theology, which they are determined to uphold in spite of everything, while others are so completely wedded to agnosticism that they do not wish to know anything about what they have already styled "unknowable," but what is, in reality, simply the at-present-unknown.

As they were talking, a slight tremulous electric movement was felt traveling round the circle, influencing all the sitters. Mrs. Finchley was the first to give voice to the influence, which made its presence felt thus palpably.

"Dear friends," she began, "before we finish our sitting, we shall receive news telling us of the need for our presence in Europe and the blessings which will accure to us from an Atlantic voyage. Our time of absence from home will be brief but very fruitful. Prof. de Montmarte and Heloise have already sent us word; we shall receive a telegram from the Professor and a pyschic visit from his daughter this evening in this room."

Scarcely had Mrs. Finchley ceased speaking, when a clear, bell-like voice rang out in a soft, silvery peal of subdued laughter: "I've come first to deliver my message in person; papa has sent his under the ocean. You must visit us at once. La Gascogne sails on the th and that will get you to Havre by the 17th, as she makes the passage in this weather in eight days easily; then you can be at our house the same evening. This is important business, and you remember our compact; I shall always keep you to the terms of our agreement. When there's a special reason for you and papa meeting, I am to inform you by occult telegraphy, and papa's letters are to confirm the reality of my visit and the truth of what I have told you."

As the voice ceased, the door-bell rang loudly (messenger boys usually ring thus to give people a sense of the importance of the messages they bear, however lowly may be their estimate of themselves). Not liking to interfere with a seance, the page gently slipped the cablegram, which had arrived under the library door. Mr. Templeton picked it up and, being asked to open it, read as follows: "Very important business requires you here at once. Yourself, aunt and three visitors. You can and will come. Jerome de Montmarte."

No sooner had they received these tidings than an officer called at the house to inquire for Count Katolowynski, whose presence he declared was very greatly needed in Russia. This interruption to the proceedings proved an agreeable one, as Col. Ozokoff Petrovonovonska was one of the St. Petersburg celebrities, who in years gone by had been convinced of the existence of unseen forces operating on man, through his remarkable experiences with that most gifted medium, Daniel Dunglas Home. The Colonel was a high-bred Russian of the noblest type, an officer of unimpeachable integrity though well versed in all the intricate diplomacy of the Russian Secret Service.

Count Katolowynski arrived soon after, purposing to re-capture Zenophon by fair means or foul. His indignation since his last interview with those whom he called the boy's "dastardly captors," had risen to a pitch of boiling frenzy. To be thwarted in any of his designs was gall and wormwood to his imperial temper, while to lose the chief instrument in carrying out his deep-laid plans for money-making and self-aggrandizement, goaded him to lawless desperation. He carried with him a jeweled stilleto wherever he went—a deadly toy, but so fascinating in its appearance that many delicate ladies would play with it as they would with a fan or bracelet. Determining to use force if persuasion and threatenings alike failed, though not otherwise,—the Count in faultless evening attire, blazing with diamonds, his magnificent crown of golden hair scintillating like an aureole about his head, his green eyes flashing like huge emeralds of the purest water, did indeed appear a formidable adversary to encounter.

Had Zenophon been at Dr. Maxwell's instead of at Northwalk, he would no doubt have seized the boy and walked off with him quietly, had such a course been feasible, but under present circumstances he was baffled, and to be foiled was in his case an incentive to deadly revenge on his foilers. With mischief in his eyes though politeness on his tongue, he entered the library unannounced, having overawed the page at the door; but when just about to prefer his claim, a gentleman came up to him with stately courtesy and friendly familiarity combined, saying: "My good fellow, you and I are to travel together to St. Petersburg. I am going on La Gascogne to Havre; she sails on the 9th. It is the gracious will of our Sovereign that we make the journey to Russia together."

"Delighted, I'm sure," replied Count Katolowynski, though he bit his lip with inward vexation. Suddenly recollecting himself, however, he turned to Dr. Maxwell, and said rather contemptuously, though not without some simulated affability, "How do you and Zenophon get on together? I shall want my young friend to attend me on the voyage; the journey would be intolerable without him; he does everything for me that I require."

"We are going on the same steamer ourselves," responded the gentleman addressed, "so we shall all be able, I hope, to be of service to each other. I think Zenophon had better remain where he is till we sail, but I shall defer quite gladly to our new friend Col. Petrovonovonska's decision."

"I propose," said the Colonel, "that the powers beyond us decide. I am a Spiritualist, as every one who knows me knows well, and for twenty-seven years I have never been misled by any communication through my wife and daughter."

Again the voice of Heloise rang through the apartment, striking terror to the Count, but giving joy and satisfaction to all the others: "Zenophon belongs to us; he is Azoriel's protege; let any one seek, at his peril, to tamper with heaven's lightning." Other messages followed, and when Mrs. Finchley was influenced by the good Colonel's mother, the sturdy Russian was fairly overcome. At midnight they separated to their various houses, and peace reigned over all.

CHAPTER XI.

ROCKED IN THE CRADLE OF THE DEEP.

"The waves are gayly dancing,
The ship sails bravely on,
The stars, the night enhancing,
Shine large when day has gone.
The night is cool and lighted
With phosphorescent gleam,
The porpoises are gamb'ling
Beneath the moon's soft beam;
Upon the deck reclining
Are trav'lers from afar;
They meet upon the waters,
And 'neath the polar star,
Enjoy for one brief octave
A friendship which will burn
Deep in their hearts forever,
For from life's mystic urn
They've drank together golden wine,
And thus are linked to Smyrna's vine."

After the startling tidings thus mystically communicated, active preparations were hastily made for the quickly impending departure. Mr. Templeton was at first somewhat reluctant to accompany Dr. Maxwell and the others on an excursion, which was to cost him nothing—all the expenses of the journey and entertainment of the whole party in Paris being met by Professor De Montmarte, who was a man of large means and yet larger generosity. How this distinguished scientist came into possession of his wealth, and how he employed it may be of interest to those of our readers who are seeking a solution of the financial problem of the day, and can scarcely see how in the face of such awful, glaring destitution as now prevails in all the great cities of the world, a noble-minded man can live in luxury, while multitudes are in poverty about him.

We do not wish to hold up Professor De Montmarte as an ideal hero—an absolutely perfect man,—for if there is one tendency we despise more than all others, it is to so exalt some particular person that all others appear contemptible by comparison.

The De Montmartes were a wealthy family belonging to the oldest and richest aristocracy of France. When Jerome was a boy, his father lost a considerable amount of property at a time when many noble families were reduced to absolute penury, but he sought to retrieve his fallen fortunes in a truly noble manner. Being heir-at-law to a considerable tract of country in the south of France, which no one had undertaken to cultivate, as it was considered sterile even to total unproductiveness—this good and far-seeing man saw how by judicious management he could redeem the land and thereby give employment to a number of workmen who were crying out for employment, but could get no work whatever. Many of these were sturdy, stalwart fellows; some single, some married and with families. Many were too independent to live contentedly upon alms, and were only too glad to accept Clairmont De Montmarte's offer to cultivate his land for their maintenance.

Living for awhile most economically himself—confining his wants to actual necessaries—he and his family—consisting of his wife, one son and daughter, aged respectively 12 and 14 years—took up their abode at Chassonville, the nearest town to the estate.

Putting into practice some remarkable theories, discovered by himself while pursuing the study of agricultural chemistry, some years earlier, this brave man and accomplished scientist set to work to fulfil an old-time prediction literally, "The wilderness and solitary place shall be made glad, the desert shall bloom with the rose," and sure enough, after a year's hard labor, bravely borne by director and operatives together, the first positive evidence that the scheme was to be a brilliant success crowned the efforts of the noble crew.

When the produce of the land was carried to the city markets, and there sold to good advantage, Mons. De Montmarte called the workmen together and asked them what they expected for their services. During the preliminary operations they had been supplied with house, food, clothing and tools out of his private funds, but had received no wages.

After listening to the very modest request of the men, the good philanthropist gave them three times the amount they asked, thereby furnishing them with ample funds to set up in business for themselves, should they desire to do so. Not a single man left his employ. They were perfectly free to leave at any moment, but they so loved their benefactor, the thought of leaving him was most painful to them all.

Year after year the estates continued to improve, growing more and more productive and remunerative, until in 1887, when Dr. Maxwell and his friends accepted Professor Jerome De Montmarte's invitation to his Parisian mansion, that gentleman's income amounted to 800,000 francs per annum, i. e., $160,000, or £40,000, not a single fraction of which was gained at the expense of any living creature, but in a manner adding greatly to the prosperity of all the workers.

Readers of Count Tolstoi's "What To Do," if they endorse all the views of that exceptionally conscientious and benevolent, though decidedly eccentric, Russian nobleman, may object to Professor De Montmarte's exceptionally large income, and members of the Nationalist clubs, now being formed all over England and America, taking, as a basis, the excellent system advocated by Edward Bellamy, in "Looking Backward," may use the words of Paul and exclaim, "I show you a more excellent way." Possibly there is a more excellent way, and the Nationalists are certainly better entitled than any other party, at present, to claim to have found it. The point, however, we desire to emphasize is that there are certainly diametrically opposite ways of becoming rich—the diabolical way, a method utterly unjustifiable, viz.: that of enriching one's self by robbing others; and the rational, humane way of reaping advantages jointly with others, by so conducting business as to add to the current wealth of the world, by developing latent but as yet unacknowledged natural resources.

A less intelligent man than Clairmont De Montmarte would have lived on the reduced income remaining to him after his losses. He would have been poorer, but it would be difficult to see how his poverty would have enriched any poor people, as the money which had gone from him might have been directed into a channel where it would have increased the power of tyranny and monopoly, and he could have offered no offset.

But, following the trend of pure science, he took into partnership with himself a number of destitute people, the cause of whose destitution was lack of employment. These people were not brought into competition with their needy fellow creatures in a manner to increase the number of applicants for positions while the number of positions remained about stationary. Positions were not simply found, they were created for the applicants, and so created that the earth itself was made to yield up the treasures which had been for ages forming in her bosom, awaiting the time when some intelligent mind should learn the secret of how to unlock her treasure-house.

While we have been explaining something of Professer De Montmarte's theory of wealth and his ideas on permissible and non-permissible property, we have left our friends to prepare for the journey. Tuesday, August 9, 1887, was a sweltering day in New York. La Gascogne was to sail at 3 P. M. During the morning, Dr. Maxwell and Mr. Templeton went out to make final purchases and say good-bye to particular friends.

Dr. Gustav Zimmerman, a young graduate of the Vienna Medical University, had taken up his abode at 312 Sycamore avenue. Though only twenty-four years of age, this young physician could be safely entrusted with the most difficult cases; he was to remain as Dr. Maxwell's assistant, after that gentleman's return from Europe. Circulars had been sent to all Dr. Maxwell's friends and patients, informing them that Dr. Zimmerman fully represented Dr. Maxwell in his absence, even to the conduct of the Wednesday afternoon Bible Class, which was never discontinued.

All arrangements having been easily and effectively made for carrying on his work, Dr. Maxwell had no fear of things going wrong during his absence; he could therefore give himself up thoroughly to his new engagements unhampered by the stupid egotism which causes many people to feel and act as though they had so singular a commission from the Almighty that were they to pass from earth the world would collapse; while, as it is, nothing can possibly go properly except in that minute speck of territory which is the immediate scene of their personal exertions.

Mrs. O'Shannon and her youngest daughter had left the day previous for the White Mountains, glad to allow Lydia the advantage of a sojourn in Paris under such exceptionally favorable chaperonage. By reaching the landing stage at 2.30, and literally forcing their way through a crowd of people all highly excited, many of them jabbering incessantly about their luggage, which either had not arrived at the pier, or had been misdirected,—put into a wrong stateroom or otherwise improperly dealt with,—our party found themselves at length on the deck of an exceptionally commodious steamer.

Though the rates are rather higher on the best French and German steamers than on some of the English lines, many people are quite willing to pay a little extra to avoid crossing the channel when bound direct for the continent, and the difference in price is after all only apparent, as the English steamers land at Liverpool, consequently passengers en route for Paris must pay passage from Liverpool to London and thence to France; while the French company takes its passengers direct to Havre, from which port the additional fare is a mere trifle. Another reason why the French steamers are so popular is that the service is almost perfect and the cooking beyond criticism. Drawbacks there are on all lines, many inside rooms being small, and close in hot weather. These are, of course, cheaper than the best rooms, but persons who can afford it, and wish to enjoy the luxury of travel under the most favorable conditions, find it very poor economy to pay $80 instead of $100 during the busy season. Our party had been furnished with two of the very best rooms on the vessel by Prof. De Montmarte, who had ordered and paid for them before inviting his guests.

Dr. Maxwell and Mr. Templeton shared an immense room, with two spacious berths, and a sofa which was allotted to Zenophon, who much preferred it to a berth. The two ladies had one of the very finest rooms on board, containing three full-sized berths and a luxurious sofa. They were all good sailors (Mr. Templeton was the only doubtful one) and anticipated much pleasure on the voyage.

At 3.15 the steamer set sail amid a perfect babel of voices and noises of every description; tears flow freely down many cheeks, and handkerchiefs waved until friends on shore could not possibly catch the faintest glimpse of them. Soon, however, everybody settled down to the situation, though it must not be supposed that all were satisfied with their rooms or the places assigned to them at the table; and (as is usually the case) those who had paid the least expected the very finest accommodation, and complained most bitterly when they had to put up with second best. At six o'clock the gong sounded for dinner, and all the passengers hastened to the sumptuous dining saloon, where a repast was spread for them equaling anything procurable in the finest Parisian restaurants.

The chief steward,—an impressive young man, faultlessly dressed, evidently enamored of his own attractions, with dark wavy hair and a magnificent moustache,—superintended the seating of the guests, and made himself intensely popular with almost every one before the meal was over. As there were many brilliant persons on board, and French people are by no means reticent and undemonstrative like the English, the meal was a very sociable one. They did nots tolidly wait for introductions when there was no one who could introduce them, as they were nearly all entire strangers to each other; they introduced themselves, talked across the table as well as tc their neighbors, and made themselves generally entertaining. Seated next to Mr. Finchley was a lady whom no one could pass without notice, if brought into any kind of relation with her; for though as modest and retiring as the most cultured and unassuming of women could well be, there was a something about her fine expressive countenance and nobly shaped head which called forth an involuntary tribute of interested and respectful recognition. Mrs. Finchley could not help observing that this lady partook very sparingly of the delicacies set before her, and her refusal of claret was so decided as to excite great surprise among the French people present, who think no more of drinking vin ordinaire at lunch and dinner than Americans think of taking iced water.

This lady, who was very plainly but elegantly dressed, was evidently of noble birth; her features were intensely aristocratic, and her imperial eyes showed her to be a descendant of a house long accustomed to command. She appeared quite youthful, yet thoroughly mature in mind as well as body. When she smiled at a really good, clean joke, she looked about thirty-five; when her face showed displeasure at at some innuendo which she detested, she appeared much older. Though she took her meal almost in silence, she addressed a few kindly remarks to Mrs. Finchley, who evidently impressed her favorably, and once she performed a gentle act of gracious courtesy to a timid girl on her left, by helping her out of an embarrassing position, with the ease and grace of a polished diplomat; but otherwise she appeared not to seek the acquaintance or her fellow-passengers. She knew she attracted some little attention, but refused to notice it, and thereby avoided being bored with the inane questions of inquisitive tourists, whose chief object in life seems to be to practice the trade of busybody.

About ten o'clock,—the moon having risen,—a gentle breeze arose from the west, making the night delightful after the sultry day. The deck was filled with passengers, loath to leave their steamer chairs, or to cease promenading or leaning over the rails to watch the phosphorescent light upon the water, which was extremely vivid.

Mrs. Finchley and Mrs. O'Shannon gazed amusedly at some of the names on the chairs. After laughing quietly at Porke A. Hogg, Chicago, Ambrose G. Pigg, Elgin, Ill., Mrs. Fumbling Cockroach, New York, Algernon C. Bootlesheimer Cincinnati, and many others equally peculiar, they came to an occupied chair placed close against the railing of the ship, on which the name of Baroness von Eaglebald stood out in bold relief. Looking at the occupant of the chair, who was just then rising to get a better view of some particularly fine phosphorescent phenomena, concerning which the multitude were ejaculating delightedly, they at once recognized their interesting tablemate, who, bowing and smiling most graciously, made some pleasant and instructive comments on the causes of such beautiful phosphorescent illuminations following upon hot and trying days, and then, her face lighting up with a glow resembling inspiration, continued:

"I have just been reading in Cattlefield's 'Origin of Human Emotion,' that, as the fairest scenes in nature are only shown to us after some period of trying weather, so the intensest joys of which human beings are capable can only be felt after we have undergone some educational discipline involving what we often, in our ignorance, designate distress, I have had many trials, but have learned to be thankful for every one of them; but, pardon me, I am soliloquizing aloud, still I know you agree with me; I know at once with whom I can converse freely to our mutual advantage, and you are ready for more, much more than I can express. I cannot say let us be friends; we are friends, and we know it."

Though attractive when in repose and particularly winning when expressing mirthful feeling, the Baroness' face was almost that of an angel when stirred by deep spiritual emotion, and Mrs. Finchley was just the woman to call out the holiest feelings from a deep and loving nature, while Lydia O'Shannon, who was hourly ripening into a very graceful and true woman, was just the sort of girl to attract a studious, earnest women who had seen something of life in all its phases, and knew how to distinguish unerringly between the pure modesty of a thoroughly chaste nature and the simpering, blushing prudery of a deceitful make-believe.

The three ladies remained chatting for about half an hour until Dr. Maxwell and Mr. Templeton joined them; after a few polite words to the gentlemen the Baroness said she was about to retire for the night but hoped to renew their acquaintance on the morrow.

"I hope you have a pleasant room," said Mrs. Finchley, "our rooms are delightful."

"Oh yes, thank you," replied the Baroness, but with the air of a person who considered a stateroom a matter of no importance whatever.

About midnight Mrs. Finchley and Miss O'Shannon—who had retired to their berths but were not asleep—overheard a conversation in French, very excited on one side but very calm on the other. The calm voice was undoubtedly that of the Baroness who was defending her right to occupy a lounge in the ladies' drawing-room, against the clamorous importunities of the stewardess who insisted that under no consideration were passengers permitted to remain anywhere at night but in their staterooms, unless they promenaded the deck, and in that case, their feet must move silently as a cat's, or the other passengers would be made angry and broken of their rest. Despite all vociferations, the Baroness continued to recline on the sofa in the drawing-room clad in an elegant, flowing robe of white flannel with a girdle round her waist and a traveling cloak lined with rich fur over the dress; her feet were shod in easy walking boots, and in that costume and in that place she resolved to sleep; her stateroom, she declared, was execrable, illy ventilated and occupied by a woman who insisted on excluding what little air could enter through the one small window which opened upon a gangway.

Mrs. Finchley at once thought how comfortable the Baroness might be in her room, as one berth and the sofa were unoccupied—and most graciously offered her the accommodation; having quickly attired herself, she went directly to the Baroness, and in her gentlest and most persuasive manner, urged her to accept the third part of her room; the noble woman, however, though evidently much pleased and even grateful for Mrs. Finchley's kind solicitude, steadily refused; it was a matter of principle with her she said, to hold a position she felt to be right when she had once taken it, and she claimed her occupancy of a lounge in the ladies' drawing-room was hers by right when she was not interfering with the convenience of other passengers: and then smilingly declared that she really hated being cooped up in staterooms and never slept while traveling except in the costume in which Mrs. Finchley then beheld her.

Mme. Chouxfleur (the stewardess), was enraged and said the Captain should be at once informed. When that officer heard the case, much exaggerated by the greatly offended woman, he shrugged his shoulders and replied, "certainment, il ne faut pas," thinking probably that some vulgar, half drunken person had been interfering with the comfort of some one—but when he met Mrs. Finchley and heard her side of the story, his attitude changed immediately, and on being introduced to La Baronne, he was obsequiousness personified. This incident being soon noised abroad, the Baroness became the center of much interest; she hated notoriety and avoided it as much as possible; but without absolute rudeness and unkindness, she could not refuse to give information to some earnest minds who approached her on subjects in which she was greatly interested, Spiritualism and Mental Science among the number.

(She had met Mrs. Catsleigh in New York and taken private lessons from her, with which she was measurably pleased). An original thinker, of deep and versatile genius, she never failed to interest all enlightened minds. As a conversationalist she was unusually happy, and was in some respects almost the equal of those great women of France whose salons developed the art of conversation into a science.

One evening in the early part of the voyage, when many of the passengers were sick and the music-room was almost deserted, Lydia O'Shannon sat down to the piano and played exquisitely one of Heine's delicious nocturnes, while the Baroness reclined at a distance seemingly asleep. She had grown to feel very tenderly to the sensitive girl who strongly resembled one of her own nieces, the beautiful Countess Isidora di Padoma, who had married at eighteen a distinguished Italian nobleman, and was then residing in Padua, whither the Baroness herself was bound.

As the music floated out upon the evening breeze, carrying healing to the sick, consolation to the sad, hope to the doubting and courage to the faint of heart, the sweet voice of Heloise subdued almost to a whisper, but clear and sweet as a nightingale's trill, sounded through the salon like a far-off echo of some great prima donna's tones, Ave Maria, piena di grazie, sounded forth in sweet, liquid Italian, straight into the Baroness' ear; then suddenly the song ceased.

"What can this be? Who can be singing thus?"

inquired the stately lady starting from her seat, a light of pleased amazement illumining her expressive face.

Lydia, springing to her side, was in her arms in a moment, and the elder and younger ladies were united then and there in the embrace of true and fadeless friendship. Heloise stood between them. They both saw her, while above their heads they saw as well as felt an electric thrill from the unseen presence of Azoriel, which conveyed to both at once an idea which expressed itself spontaneously in these words: "We three have the same guardian and are in the same circle of souls; we can never be really separated, in time or eternity."

CHAPTER XII.

THE MYSTIC AT HOME.

"Over the mountains toward the sea
They told me was a wondrous land,
A country free from sin and doubt,
From fear and care; upon whose strand
Angelic beings talked with men,
And showed how deities devise Divinest moulds beyond our ken,
And how with magical surprise
A traveler once was led by guide,
Enveloped in a cloak of light
To reach a mystic cavern where
'Twas always day, yet always night.
A lamp perpetual shed its beam
Across the tesellated floor,
While hangings of rare tapestry
Shrouded the massive golden door;
There worked the alchemists who change
Base metals into burnished gold,
Whose secret is alone revealed
To those who are both pure and bold."

As the voyage progressed, the days and nights passed rapidly away without a ripple to disturb the harmony of those passengers who had grown to look upon each other in the light of dear friends, though their physical acquaintance was of such recent origin. About twenty persons were vitally interested in occult matters generally; about fifty more took a sporadic interest in psychic phenomena; a few prigs looked upon the whole subject with supercilious contempt; while a handful of stricitly "orthodox believers" regarded everything except their own dogmas as soul destroying heresy. It is often very delightful, entertaining and instructive to meet with large minds representing various schools of thought, out of sight of land for days together, and hear them argue in a friendly spirit, over doctrines which have lighted the fires of the inquisition and sent men to the rack in their defence. Under the calmer skies of this more liberal age, no gibbet looms in view confronting with frightful sufferings all who dare to express honest convictions at variance with the views of a reigning majority, and while travelling, one meets many more enlightened than bigoted people, as bigots are very apt to be confirmed stay-at-homes, and when they venture forth into the great world, they usually scent each other out and herd together after the manner of clanish animals, who never wander willingly into any company outside their own species. Exclusive society rules, as well as restrictive denominational customs are all relics of the clanishness of undeveloped races; while breath of sentiment, liberal education, and all the word culture rightly means, greatly enlarges the area in which man holds instructive friendly converse with his brother.

Night after night, when there were but few people in the music room, Lydia O'Shannon improvised sweet strains on the grand piano. At first she was left pretty much to her immediate circle of friends, but soon the entrancing melodies grew so well defined, her voice rose to such clear heights of almost perfect tone, that one by one men, women and children stole noiselessly into the saloon and were soon transfixed with wonder and delight at the superb performance of so youthful an artiste.

"Is she in training for opera?" "Has she already come out?" These and many like questions were constantly asked of her friends, to all of which, calm, impassive negatives were quietly given; still the impression was rapidly gaining ground all over the ship and even in the minds of Dr.

Maxwell and Mrs. Finchley, that Lydia was destined to be a great songstress; one who would not only score brilliant worldly success, charming the multitude by her sweet, clear notes and wide range of tone, but would in addition to every outward grace, touch those deeper springs of human feeling which only vibrate in response to appeals which never rise from simple loveliness of exterior form or classic purity and depth of song.

Mr. Templeton who constantly listened to the girl and watched her intently while his ears drank in rich volumes of harmony, was beginning—almost unconsciously to himself—to love her with that deep, abiding, growing affection of which only large, constant natures are capable; he could not well define his feelings to himself, he was not at all a sensuous man and he detested flirtation. Marriage he did not think of as yet, but he was beginning to realize that Lydia's presence contributed something very real, quieting and ennobling to his life; he began to feel that he could be a far wiser and happier man in her presence than removed far from her, and such a feeling is one of the sweetest and surest tokens of the dawn of pure and lasting love.

Zenophon, who enjoyed sailing exceedingly and had been much accustomed to the blue waters of the Mediterranean and Levant in his childhood, was happy as the day was long, and nothing occurred to disturb the serenity of his enjoyment or to ruffle the feelings of his new friends. Count Katolowynski had been detained on business of the utmost importance which came upon him like an avalanche, after he made every preparation for departure on "La Gascogne."

Col. Petrovanovonska had been detained by the same business, which consisted of important negotiations with the Russian Minister at Washington, and other affairs of a nature which would brook no delay; the two gentlemen had been thus forced to forego their passage, which they easily transferred at no pecuniary loss, and were now intending to sail on the Nordeutscher steamer "Teufelheute," which would set sail for Bremen on the 23d. Count Katolowynski's rage knew no bounds, for despite his cruelty on some occasions, he really loved Zenophon in the selfish way in which one person can love another who is useful to him and also a means of gratifying an ambitious and over-weening sense of self-importance. Zenophon could never decide whether he really cared for the Count or not, as when under his mesmeric sway he idolized him, but when released from the spell he felt a sense of security and rest, and enjoyed liberty as much as any released captive. Zenophon's childhood had been in some respects unnatural; he was left an orphan at a very early age and having to wander about in search of a livelihood, he was sometimes employed to sweep a church and at other times to assist the steward on board a yacht; he always had enough to eat and drink, something to wear and a roof over his head; his temperament was sunny and he had attained to something of that higher carelessness which makes people contented with few material advantages and little worldly wealth; he was usually happy, and he made people happy about him; he was industrious when work was required of him, but his natural temperament much resembled that of the best type of Hindu mystic; he was introspective and psychometric, and from babyhood had shown signs of spiritual precocity.

When Count Katolowynski met him he was in an out-door church procession strewing flowers as the statue of the Blessed Mother passed through the streets of an old Italian city on the Feast of the Assumption (Aug. 15th.) The day was very hot, but toward evening a cool breeze had arisen. Count Katolowynski, who had been educated in the Russian church, which pays great homage to the mother of Christ though not in the exact manner customary in the church of Rome, was greatly impressed with the beauty of the scene; but it was Zenophon's face that captured him. He knew at a glance that the boy (then only nine years of age) was just the one to yield to his will in everything and carry out many of his designs which lacked fulfillment because of the absence of a competent coadjutor. He then and there accosted the boy who went to his apartments that very night and began his duties as valet de chambre to the imperious nobleman who was then not much over twenty-one, but had achieved so much occult as well as secular information that the boy was his docile attendant from the very moment the imperial green eyes had fastened upon him. From that day forward the two had been inseparable. The Count had failed in nothing during the six years they had been together; and now to be compelled to bend to a mysterious, invisible power beyond his strength, was indeed humiliating to the handsome despot, who at twenty-seven had ten times the arrogance and determination he possessed at twenty-one. But we shall meet the Count in Europe, and need not now dwell further on his doings or his character.

After a delightful passage, occupying exactly eight days, La Gascogne reached Havre, August 17. Our friends reached Paris the same evening about nine o'clock. As they landed at the Gare du Nord, they observed a very handsome carriage with a magnificent pair of white horses, which they instinctively felt was intended to take them to the residence of Prof. de Montmarte. Their impression proved correct, and the stately footman, who was well known to Dr. Maxwell, at once recognized him, and in a few moments the whole party was comfortably ensconsed in the commodious equipage.

A drive of rather more than half an hour brought them to the hospitable mansion which bore the euphonious title of "Les Rameaux." This suggestively Oriental apellation marked the stately dwelling as a house apart from all its neighbors. It was approached through an ancient courtyard, and was indeed a mediæval palace containing many trophies of the time of Louis Quatorze and yet earlier monarchs; the mullioned windows were left just as they stood four or five hundred years before; nothing had been changed in the design, but the stonework had been kept in repair and modern improvements freely introduced into the interior. To describe the beauty of the court around which the house was built, would task the ingenuity of a descriptive artist; those who have seen the finest modern hotels, for example "The Coronado," near San Diego in Southern California and have enjoyed the fountains and flowers in its splendid open court, have a just conception of the design, but not of the beauty or picturesqueness of this most lovely home.

Modern buildings have a new, almost raw appearance; and suggest nothing but modern capital and enterprise; in California such structures are built principally of wood, and being only a few years old, have a glaring look of newness; moreover privacy or anything approaching to retirement is unimaginable in connection with a fashionable hotel at a watering place. "The Palms," on the contrary, though in the very midst of Paris,—scarcely a stone's throw from a crowded, bustling thoroughfare, and within five minutes' walk of several popular resorts,—was as silent as a tomb but for the distant low murmur of city life, which scarcely penetrated the massive enclosure like a faint echo from another world, hardly perceptible except one strained one's ears to catch it; and then the house and its appurtenances reminded one of bygone times as much as Oxford, Cambridge, York, or some other grand old English city where every spot is associated with great epochs in human history.

The contrast between the outside and inside of Prof. de Montmarte's inimitable mansion was perhaps its most fascinating feature, as there was nothing shocking to the most æsthetic taste in this contrast, striking though it was. The twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth centuries were all holding their own in the form of the ceilings, the shape of the windows, the paneled oak wainscots, the heavy doors, and massive stairways. The nineteenth century at its best had not turned out its predecessors, it had but heightened the charm of their productions. The massive candelabra, naturally associated with a bygone day, held their own in stately magnificence, but electric light had banished wax or candle grease, but so gracefully had it accommodated itself to its surroundings that it shed a graceful, mellow light in candle-shaped burners; the candles of the new age, retaining all the beauty but none of the inconvenience of earlier candles which often smoked and guttered, and went out in a draught. The whole house was warmed as well as lighted by electricity, which also served for cooking. Prof. de Montmarte, who had studied gastronomy as well as all other sciences, declared that food cooked by electric agency was far more healthful that when prepared in any other way, unless the direct action of the sun's rays could be brought to bear upon it; he further stated, that for the eyes, electric light, properly tempered, was far preferable to gas, candles, oil, or any other contrivance; while for heating purposes, the culture of fruit and flowers, etc., electricity was utterly without a rival,—and, strange as it may appear to those who are bound by conventional notions,—on the hottest day in summer the house was kept perfectly cool by the same electric force which warmed it completely in winter.

While giving a few particulars concerning the house and its management, we have left our friends in retirement in their rooms, preparing for the late supper which was always prepared for guests who arrived in the evening. Though very embodiments of hospitality, Dr. Maxwell and his lovely daughter never appeared to meet arriving guests, nor did guests ever see their host and hostess till they met in banquet hall or breakfast room to partake of a social meal.

The Professor and Heloise were so sweetly considerate of the refined susceptibilities of sensitive visitors, that they invariably sent kind letters ahead and a carriage to the station but never presented themselves till their guests had changed their garments, or at least removed the soil of travel. They never forgot the smallest detail which could add to the comfort of those whom they had requested to sojourn under their roof; thus, if luggage was not immediately delivered, the elegant and useful aids to the toilet and wardrobe which were plentifully supplied in all the guest chambers, enabled visitors to make themselves very comfortable and thoroughly presentable before they met their host or hostess. Five handsome rooms were prepared (all opening on to one corridor) for the party now just arrived. Mrs. Finchley and Miss O'Shannon were provided with separate but communicating rooms; Dr. Maxwell, Mr. Templeton and Zenophon had three rooms which could open the one into the other if desired, otherwise they were quite distinct. Each communicating room was provided with a bolt on both sides of the connecting door, so that under no circumstances could a person enter unbidden; and not only did Professor de Montmarte thus secure to each unmarried guest that total privacy which every human being sometimes needs if he or she is to live a truly individual healthy life, free from nervous discords; he always supplied a married couple with two rooms on precisely the same plan, as he regarded it cruel and barbarous to force or even persuade any two persons under any circumstances, to occupy the same apartment, unless in a case of absolute necessity. This noble and wise man was a practical philanthrophist; he demonstrated the soundness of his views by carrying them out in every detail of daily life; by this means he won for himself the respect due to a thoroughly practical man of science who never advocated a theory the usefulness of which he could not prove.

At eleven o'clock, an electric bell sounding in each of the chambers, was a signal to the guests that they were expected in the banquet hall. On leaving their rooms, they were escorted by pages down the massive marble stairways to a hall of such beauty they could hardly associate it with ordinary pursuits such as eating, drinking and the entertainment of company.

The banquet hall was like a fairy palace lighted with five hundred miniature electric lamps. At one end of the table sat Prof. de Montmarte, a man fully sixty years of age, but loooking less than forty, though by his own deliberate choice, his hair was white as snow; he was clad in a superb oriental robe and looked the very embodiment of Eastern goodness and wisdom. Directly facing him sat his beautiful daughter, who in flowing white robes with no ornament save lilies of the valley at her throat and in her superb dark hair, looked like some bright goddess descended from above to grace a banquet to which a few specially privileged mortals had been invited by beings of a higher race.

As their guests entered, both host and hostess rose and went to the very door to meet them, eyes and lips alike expressing the depth and sincerity of the welcome they extended. After cordially greeting the ladies and gentlemen, Prof. de Montmarte kissed Zenophon on his forehead, while Heloise placed both hands on his head and blessed him in the name of Azoriel; no sooner had the words left her lips than a living sheen of electric fire encircled them, and the glorious form of the angel was visible to all present. Dr. Maxwell and Mrs. Finchley were awed in to reverent stillness, but they were not the least afraid. Lydia O'Shannon cried gently, but her tears were of deep and grateful emotion, not called forth by dread. Mr. Templeton was startled, almost terrified. The angelic form was not materialized; it was a form of electric light without any semblance of flesh, blood, or garments; it could not be described as other than it appeared —electric light in the form of man—and such a beautiful and impressive form, so stately, wise and kind, that all who saw it must have bent in reverential love; but coupled with this wonderful graciousness was a keen, penetrative glance, which evidently read through the most secret thoughts of the heart. Not a word issued from this shape of flame, but whatever Azoriel intended his pupils should learn he communicated to them by influx into their minds. All present saw their careers marked out in that moment, but not in the manner in which fortune tellers mark out the future. It was inwardly revealed to them what their work in life was to be, they were shown their destiny, in the sense in which the word destiny is understood by the truly enlightened. Then the glorious presence vanished as it came, suddenly disappearing in a soft, mellow, rainbow-tinted cloud of lessening light. Heloise and her father smiled a radiant smile; no one present ventured to talk over the matter at that time, and as quietly as though nothing unusual had taken place, the host said to the page in attendance, "Leonidas, serve the pineapple," while Heloise remarked to Mrs. Finchley, who was seated next her, "These grapes are from our own hot house; the seeds came from Palestine."

LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

CHAPTER XIII.

HOW ARE THE DEAD RAISED, WITH WHAT BODIES DO THEY COME?

"Beloved friends, it cannot be,
This body which I cast aside
Can surely not victorious ride
O'er death, and then return to me!

"But tho' this form of gathered dust,
Shall turn to grasses, trees and flowers,
To decorate earth's garden bowers,
In resurrection still I trust.

"The soul emancipate from clay
Surmounts the wreck of mortal things,
And on glad, tireless, golden wings
Appears in garments bright as day."

After a delicious night's rest, our friends were aroused at 10 A.M. by the sounding of a sweet, clear-toned electric bell ringing in each of the rooms. As the bell rang, a tray containing coffee, rolls, butter, cream and fruit, was brought into each of the chambers by a perfectly disciplined attendant, who opened the door and put it on a table just inside, and then departed. Every one felt so perfectly at home in Professor de Montmarte's delightful residence, that when an hour later they assembled in the morning-room to discuss plans for the day, it seemed as though they had all been living there for weeks, instead of thirteen hours only. There were no inquiries after health, such as "Well, how did you rest; are you not tired after your journey?" etc.

The good professor and his radiant daughter, who always felt and looked the very embodiment of the most perfect health themselves, never suggested the thought of illness to others.

"How bright you are all looking," Heloise did say, and she meant it. They had all enjoyed eight or nine hours' perfectly unbroken slumber, undisturbed by any kind of dream, and when they awoke, were all conscious of having slept and mentally rested in some delightful, tranquil atmosphere, into which no wave of discord entered. From eleven till one they all agreed to drive in the Bois de Boulogne; at half-past one they would partake of luncheon, or dejeuner a la fourchette, as it is termed in Paris; then during the afternoon they would meet for mutual converse on the themes in which they were most deeply interested; dinner would be served at half-past six, and half-past eight would find them in a theatre; thus they most agreeably planned out their first day in the gay French metropolis, which, to Miss O'Shannon and Mr. Templeton, was an undiscovered country, full of delightful promise.

The drive was delightful, taken in a commodious drag easily accommodating twelve persons, and as four strong horses drew the vehicle, no one was tortured with the feeling that cruelty to animals was practised to give pleasure to man. The Bois was looking its loveliest; rain had fallen a few days before, refreshing the earth and removing the dust from the trees now thickly covered with their deep, dark foliage; the birds sang jubilantly in the fresh, clear air, for, though the sun was high, a breeze was blowing, bearing with it the far-off odor of the ocean, and the sweet, soft scents of the lovely country, which divides Paris from the sea.

Nowhere in all the world is nature fairer or kinder than in la belle France; the torrid heat of the extreme south of Europe is unknown equally with the dense fogs of the Channel Islands and the rigors of the Baltic coast. Paris is moreover a sweet, clean, bright, smiling city, freer, perhaps, from disagreeable features than any other of the capitals of the world; to say that it is a wicked city is no truer than to say that vice lurks wherever masses of human beings congregate, ignorant of the divine law of harmony in accordance with which all might live in peace, virtue and prosperity.

Professor de Montmarte was a whole-souled optimist, not one of those gushing sentimentalists who smile at everything and justify everything, but a grand, noble man of philosophic temper, who, beyond and within all finite encrustations and appearances, could discern the living soul of humanity revealed in lineaments divine to the quick eye of spirit, if not to the dull sight of sense. As they drove through the lovely sylvan paths on that pleasant August day, the thoughts of all the party seemed fully attuned to the harmonies of nature everywhere displayed around them; a feeling of conscious oneness with nature took possession of them, causing them to feel that they and all nature understood each other and were at peace.

On their return home they found a delicate repast awaiting them, but neither fish, flesh, fowl, wine or tobacco ever entered "The Palms." Professor de Montmarte was a vegetarian, and he never suggested to those who visited him that they might possibly require anything, contrary to the rule of his household. A member of the French Academy, a man thoroughly conversant with all the natural sciences, anthropology in particular, he invited friends to live and thrive in those conditions most conducive to health and happiness, in which he and his daughter luxuriated and in which many poor sufferers found or recovered health, peace and joy, to which they had long been strangers, or which, in many instances, they had never previously known. Vegetarian cooking suggests to many minds, ordinary poor living with meat left out; to the intelligent expert in the science of gastronomy, it means a mode of living compared with which the ordinary diet of unnaturalism appears repulsive and absurd as well as inhuman.

As it is not our present intention to compile a work on hygienic cooking, we shall not give recipes for all the delicious dishes on Professor de Montmarte's table, but we will name among them mushroom, artichoke and sea-kale patties, which are easily made, and when served with melted butter are very substantial and satisfying. Bread made from entire wheat flour, and omelettes of various kinds. The profusest abundance of the choicest fruits, and delicate beverages made from the freshest and ripest of fruits that very day, made the meal one with which the most fastidious epicure could not have been discontented. Fresh fruit beverages used instead of wine, when steadily partaken of for even a short time, permanently overcome all taste for spiritous liquors and other intoxicating drinks.

During the meal, which was partaken of very leisurely, the conversation turned to the remarkable appearance of Azoriel the evening before, the extraordinary nature of which provoked the most earnest inquiry, particularly from Mr. Templeton, who had been disgusted with some very coarse materialism he had witnessed in Boston a few years previously. In the course of conversation, he said:

"I never could be made to believe that a solid form that made the floor creak audibly when it walked, which issued from a suspicious looking cabinet and touched me with a fat, damp, intensely carnal hand, was a being from the unseen world temporally shrouded in a veil of flesh, manufactured through a gathering of a miscellaneous company of very dubious persons, whose conduct with these forms was to me revolting in the extreme; and then the money-making, circus-managing atmosphere of the whole affair repelled me even more than the particularly uninviting nature of the phenomena presented.

"I went home from two of these seances with my mind fully made up that Spiritualism was nothing but a mixture of disgusting necromancy and audacious imposture; and on the strength of such experience I warned my congregation against the whole subject. Since I have been with Dr. Maxwell and Mrs. Finchley, I have learned that there is much in Spiritualism which commands respectful attention; but I have seen nothing akin to such wonders as I saw here last night, except on one occasion when I was so completely overcome I did not know whether I was in my senses or had taken leave of them. Now what I want to learn, my dear Prosessor, is your view of materialization, and how do the radiant appearances of your angel guardian differ from those solid forms we witness at seances with American mediums, if the latter may be at any time accounted genuine?"

"My dear friend," returned Professor de Montmarte, "this subject may require ages for its complete elucidation. I have been studying it diligently for the past thirty years, but even now I feel but an infant in regard to it. I have, however, arrived at certain conclusions all borne out by personal experience, which I shall be most happy to lay before you.

"I never speak of these things save to those who show themselves earnest in their inquiry into the hidden mysteries of nature; to all such I feel it a privilege and delight to offer such knowledge as I have accumulated. But let us adjourn to the library; in its cosy, tranquil atmosphere, where I am accustomed to consider all deep subjects, I feel better able to clearly express my views; it is a pet hobby of mine to connect certain ideas with certain apartments. Of course I could not do this were Heloise and myself confined to two or three chambers; but as we have a large house which affords every opportunity, I give myself the pleasure of indulging this taste; and I really find it a useful one, as no end of people come here suffering from various disorders, who are made whole while sitting in my office. I have two offices, an inner and an outer; into the outer I admit all applicants whom I receive at all; into the inner I only take those persons whom I feel are ready for something subtler than a little good advice and a simple atmospheric electric treatment."

"Are you then a practicing physician?" pursued Mr. Templeton, eager to learn something of the life of this remarkable man without being inquisitive.

"I practice where I know I can be of service; under no other circumstances do I ever exercise the healing gift. As to pecuniary recompense, I need none; my estates are large, my income more than sufficient for all the uses to which I need to put money. I, however, counsel the wealthy, who receive a blessing, to consecrate a portion of their worldly means to the assistance of the needy; and, above all, after receiving light, to let it shine for the illumination of those in darkness."

Heloise rose and led the way to the spacious library, where Prof. de Montmarte conducted his scientific experiments and did a vast amount of literary work, including much correspondence of the highest importance with influential persons in all parts of the world. The apartment was as large as a good-sized chapel, the walls were covered with bookshelves all round the room, from floor to ceiling, except where the windows (seven in all), of Gothic design, filled with colored glass, occupied the space. The books were classified as in a great public library; a light iron gallery ran around the room, facilitating the approach to the upper shelves. On the catalogue 37,373 books were designated, ranging over every conceivable subject; many of these were curious, but none were valueless, as they had all been carefully selected and arranged in their respective departments with a view to simplifying, as far as possible, the scientific and literary labors of the privileged students who, from time to time, were permitted to enter this sacred enclosure, dedicated to all knowledge helpful to mankind. Several old manuscript volumes were so rare that their only duplicates could be found in the British Museum, while others, more priceless still, had no known duplicates on earth..

Always of a studious turn, Mr. Templeton was enraptured with this massive and marvelous collection of the greatest thoughts of the world's great thinkers, so much so that it jarred upon him to hear Heloise remark that she cared very little for the best of books, as they became unnecessary when one outgrew the need for reading and could launch out upon the ocean of ungathered and unlimited information in a purely psychic and unfettered way.

"My daughter is a seeress of the old Chaldean type," smiled the professor, "she can procure for me in one of her astral pilgrimages more knowledge than I can receive in years by dint of hard study. Azoriel is her preceptor and I am her pupil."

"Oh! don't say that, my darling father, I am your child, and from you I have learned more than I ever put in practice; but let us not discuss these questions now, I will take my old place at your knee on my favorite footstool, while you tell Mr. Templeton all you deem wise to tell him about the astral body and its appearances."

As she sat at her father's feet, her eyes beaming with affection, she looked like a simple, artless child, very pure and lovely, but, in no way, removed from the ordinary type of girlhood, except by reason of her almost supernatural beauty. Seeing her thus, Lydia O'Shannon, who was of a most affectionate nature, and had often enjoyed the society of an intimate friend whom she called a chum, sat down on another stool next to Heloise and felt perfectly contented in her position till she ventured to lean her head against her new friend's shoulder, when suddenly she started to her feet as though struck by lightning. Heloise laughed good naturedly and said in her sweetest voice:

"Had I thought you were going to apply for such a severe shock, I would have warned you, but I'm never terrible unless some one purposes evil, so you may feel quite easy; you are stronger for the thrill that went through you; they call me living lightning, you are not yet prepared to come in contact with my body without feeling the current almost too forcibly. I allowed a very sweet girl to sleep with me one night, because she wished to, and while I was asleep, she was deposited on the floor six times in succession; at last she went into an adjoining room and felt no more electrical disturbance. I account for this only on the score of my being so highly charged with electric force that I convey it to any one who approaches me quite without intention; but I confess when I wish to make persons feel it, I can do so readily. But my dearest Lydia, you must not let this incident estrange us or cause you to be afraid of me; I am, I assure you, quite harmless where you are concerned, and I am not satisfied with being harmless in your case, I am resolved to be your friend in deeds as well as in words, before long you will learn how we can be of use to each other."

The gentle Lydia, gazing with almost awe struck eyes on the beautiful, queenly figure so graciously smiling upon her and reassuring her in such kindly accents, felt that Heloise, indeed, might be an aid to her all through her life, but she could not foresee how, under any circumstances, she could be of assistance to her vigorous, talented and strangely influential friend; but so turn the tides of human affairs not seldom, that those who deem themselves the weakest often find how necessary they are to others, who, to all appearances, are the least dependent of mortals.

Continuing the conversation between Prof. de Montmarte and Mr. Templeton, the elder with much gravity, but not the slightest shade of arrogance, spoke as follows:

"I can say much to you which I should not wish to say to ninety-nine out of every hundred persons who question me on these subjects. The bane of Spiritualism has ever been that it has by its very attractiveness and other worldliness, invited lovers of sensation who are neither religious or scientific, but flippant and unreliable in the extreme; also many adventurers who sought to bend it to their own unworthy ends. By sensationers, hystericists and tricksters, much havoc has been made; and you, I judge, have seen far too much of the dark and not enough of the bright side of the subject to enable you to clearly discriminate between its chaff and wheat; materialization seems especially perplexing to you. Now I refuse to affirm that all that passes current for genuine phenomena is genuine, and I equally refuse to admit that it is all fraudulent. Some persons are helped in an indirect manner by ocular demonstrations; I do not, however, deem it advisable to court such manifestions as almost invariably take place under suspicious circumstances. The moral and physical atmospheres of the places where they occur are often highly impure, and as to the people who gather constantly to witness them, their minds are not usually in a satisfactory condition. That intelligent entities, apart from physical organisms, can gather together atmospheric emanations and condense them into similitude of flesh and bone, I do not deny; but Azoriel has given us a far different philosophy, and has taught us to look, not to the carnalization of spirit, but to its expression on a higher plane than that of gross matter.

"My researches in electrical science have convinced me that electricity is the basis of all expressions of life; 'the germ of all life is electricity,' is a correct statement; but I beg you to understand that by electricity I do not mean simply those lower forms of its expression, which illiterate people consider its all-in-all and frequently denominate galvanism, when they employ it in medical practice. Electricity cannot be generated; it can, however, be attracted, brought to a given focus and used for specific purposes; then, when we have made use of this omnipresent, all-vitalizing energy it returns whence it came, and concerning it, the words can be fitly spoken, applied, in the New Testament, to the wind and the Holy Spirit: 'Thou canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth.'

"Spirit appears only in electric form; the spiritual body is an electric body, and when it is shown to man on earth in its purity, it has no resemblance to a fleshy structure, it is a shape of light. The form is perfectly, radiantly, gloriously human; but despite all that can be said on the other side by carnalizers of a spiritual idea, there is neither scientific or scriptural warrant for belief in a resurrection of a material body, nor is there much to be gained by affording conditions for what is vulgarly termed materialization. As you, Mr. Templeton, will soon be called to teach scientific religion, genuine theology, not a series of deductions from creeds, articles, and catechisms, formulated to veil rather than to reveal the spirit, I ask you to carefully study the stories of the transfiguration of Jesus, and the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the faithful at Jerusalem, with a perfectly unbiased mind, without commentaries, and with all predilections due to your training for the ministry, banished from your thoughts. In these sublime narratives especially, and in many others in somewhat less degree, you will find a full recognition of the understanding of the early Gnostics, who were all deeply versed in the science of spirit and its revealments. When the church externalized itself and sought temporal dominion, it carnalized through misinterpretation, the Scriptures it continued to venerate; from before the time of Constantine to the present moment, a disguise has been thrown over the record. Among deeply versed clergy, this inner truth, to which I am referring, is known, at least, in part; to the mass of the clergy it is quite unknown, so their bald exotericism has, at least, the virtue of honesty. In your denomination (Baptist) there is not probably one preacher in five hundred who has the least conception of the tell-tale histories on the shelves in my library, as all such books have been from the first interdicted and excluded from divinity schools as impious, while they really set forth the only possible basis, on which science and religion can stand and thrive together in future generations.

Modern Spiritualism is not yet systematized; its later developments will throw much light on the anachronisms of earlier days; it is, moreover, difficult at present to get people to investigate the subject impartially. I, as a man of science, rather than a theologian, having arrived at conclusions through force of actually demonstrated facts, repeated most convincingly over and over again in my own home, when only my daughter and myself were present, cannot be expected to feel as those feel who have darling hypotheses to sustain, dogmas to defend, and personal interests to serve. I invite facts and let them speak for themselves. I have no opinion where I lack information, and as to prejudice I despise it. I will not say that any of their editors and contributors are other than sincere; but when I glance over the pages of the many spiritualistic, theosophic and metaphysical publications which I regularly receive from all parts of the world, written in all languages and displaying all grades of thought from driveling imbecility to dignified sagacity, I can but smile and wonder how the general public is likely to fare at the hands of such a strange multitude of conflicting counselors.

"Azoriel instructs us not to 'answer' anything, however false, vituperative or ridiculous. We, however, communicate anonymously through strictly impersonal articles of a scientific nature with several European and American periodicals. We never take sides, pay compliments or enter complaints. When we have facts to record we relate them with no more addition than a brief, explanatory comment when this is needful, in consequence of the singular nature of the subject matter.

"I could relate to you hundreds of instances of our receiving tidings of events happening in the remotest parts of the world, telegraphed to us with lightening dispatch and recorded in this office, hours, days, and even weeks, before the Paris or London journals received an inkling of the affair. Were I to publish a hundredth part of what we verify every year, this house would be beseiged with requests for every kind of unlawful information. That is why we do not offer to instruct the world at large in the art of electrical divination; for were we to do so, all the Porke A. Hogges, from Chicago and everywhere else, would be offering me hundreds of dollars a sitting if I would tell them how to increase their millions by adding further rascality to their already nefarious traffic in human souls and bodies; and then, on bended knee, offer their hands, hearts and fortunes, to my pure, high-minded daughter, who detests the very air they have polluted with their disgusting presence."

"Porke A. Hogge," broke in Mr. Templeton; "that is a name we saw on board the steamer on one of the chairs. We were introduced to the owner before the voyage was over. His views on 'the new Democracy' were at least amusing. He must weigh at least three hundred pounds, is fully as wide as he is high; has no hair, a smooth-shaven, shiny face, eyes like little black beads, and the gait of a rhinoseros. Pardon my uncomplimentary description of a suitor for your daughter's hand, but the offer strikes me as too ludicrous. Surely it can not be that that man proposed to her? Count Katolowynski, I know, was dismissed from her presence abruptly for some impertinence, but he is young, handsome and stately. I could imagine his making her a proposal, but Mr. Hogge, never."

"Mr. Hogge," rejoined the young lady's father, "is the proud possessor of $17,000,000. What matters it to match-making parents and misguided girls that the man is odiously vulgar, shamelessly ignorant, and unmentionably immoral, or that his wealth was literally stolen from his employees; and also gained by a barbaric disease—engendering occupation? My daughter has happily learned to place her affections on far other treasures than those which money can purchase and thieves remove. And besides all this, you probably are somewhat acquainted with her peculiar mission, and have divined that for her earthly attachments can never be of the ordinary kind. For dear Lydia another destiny is prepared. Marriage will bring to her and the man she blesses with her love, and whose home she graces with her talent, more than usual happiness. Zenophon is appointed to a work removed from the ordinary. You, my friend, have much yet to learn, but your mind and heart are opening to the truth, as flowers open to the sunshine. It will not be long ere you return to your pulpit to proclaim what will be indeed glad tidings; the very near future will reveal your true work, its nature and scope. You have questioned me on many themes which I can not deal with all at once; you must grow to understand through intuitive perception, or you can not profit by the statements of another to any great extent."

As the Professor ceased speaking, a gentle, tremulous thrill pulsated through the room and strongly affected Mr. Templeton, who instinctively grasped Prof. de Montmarte's right hand, while Heloise took his left; then slowly rising into fulness of majestic form, in grandeur inexpressible, appeared Azoriel, this time without causing Mr. Templeton the slightest dread; though as the radiant presence darted knowledge to his brain and showed him Lydia O'Shannon and himself, as man and wife, working side by side with his beloved mother, in the old home amid the green hills of Vermont, he was too overcome to articulate a syllable. At that moment a flood of life coursed through his veins, such as he had never felt before or even dreamed of ever possessing, as his constitution had never been robust; and some of his friends thought they detected symptoms of incipient consumption. From that hour he had a new lease of life; the subtle process of electrical regeneration had then and there commenced. The inrushing tide of force from the angelic sphere, of which the angel was the center, started a physical condition which no other treatment could commence; and thus, in the three-fold manner in which a genuine spiritual revelation ever appeals to humanity, this honest seeker after truth found moral, intellectual and bodily strength and purity flow together in one electric stream from the divine beyond, calling forth the divine within.

CHAPTER XIV.

A PARISIAN SUNDAY.

"We left our beds at dawn of day,
We drank our coffee, ate our bread,
Then hastened to the sacred fane
Where the most holy MASS is said.
Our duty to high heaven done,
We wandered gently to the Seine,
There took a boat and sailed away
Beneath the sun to yonder plain
Where emperors and kings have met
And great, decisive battles fought.
The air was restful, all was calm;
We gave ourselves to pleasant thought,
We dined beneath tall, spreading trees
Whose arms for centuries have spread
Kind shelter over multitudes
Who, by their love of natural led,
Have found a Sabbath in the air
Conducive both to praise and prayer.
The day was hot, the night was cool,
We sauntered home at dying eve,
And felt when we retired to sleep
Our souls could heaven's high arches cleave.
That was our Sabbath; say my friend,
Had yours more grace or holier end?"

A Sunday in Paris will, doubtless, suggest to some of our readers experiences far more pleasant than the mention of a Sunday in England, while to those of Puritanical type (if such there be) associations not so agreeable may be conjured up. Whether the French nation be frivolous in spite of religion, or religious in spite of frivolity, or not at all religious, or not at all too frivolous, must be left to analytical essayists; suffice it for our purpose to affirm that, in spite of all drawbacks, the continental Sabbath is far preferable to the puritanical, though neither is ideal. One day out of seven devoted to rest, recreation, social and moral enjoyment, must commend itself to all workers as a boon not lightly to be esteemed. But London and Edinburg, and even New York and Philadelphia are apt to be altogether too rigorous in their mode of Sabbath observance; not that in any of thoseci ties people get too much rest, but every once in a while we are made to feel that certain types of Protestants are a little too fond of a union between church and state calculated to imperil the freedom of citizens and their children in the innocent enjoyment of the beauties of nature and of art on the only day on which they can all enjoy them together.

In Paris one feels free, to say the least; there is probably no city on the globe so entirely free as the gay French metropolis, and yet there are many sad drawbacks to the perfection of Parisian life. But with these drawbacks we are not now concerned. The few brief, happy days between their arrival at Prof. de Montmarte's delightful home and the first Sunday Mr. Templeton and Miss O'Shannon had ever spent out of America, had passed all too quickly, but very profitably as well as enjoyably; and now at 9 o'clock on Sunday morning all our party were in the library discussing plans for the day. They had reserved all church visiting till now, as the strangers naturally wished to visit some of the grand old buildings during the imposing services common to Sundays and festivals, and hear the fine music, from which they expected to derive benefit as well as pleasure. The Octave of the Assumption was not completed, as the day was August 21st, the churches dedicated to the Blessed Virgin were consequently the most desirable to visit, though in all the great churches and many of the smaller ones the services would be very fine.

In Paris there is a paper called Le Semaine Religeuse, which gives a detailed account of the services for the current week at all the churches in thr city; it is a most useful guide both to residents and visitors, as it enables people to go just where they can derive the greatest pleasure and profit and exactly at the right hour. All visitors to Paris want to see the interior of the grand cathedral of Notre Dame, and be present, at least, at one service, though the fact can hardly be disguised that the music is much finer at the Madelaine and St. Roch. High mass at Notre Dame commences about 10 o'clock, and thither Prof. de Montmarte, Heloise, Mrs. Finchley, Dr. Maxwell, Mr. Templeton, Miss O'Shannon and Zenophon wended their way on foot; it took them just thirty minutes to reach it from "The Palms." When they arrived, a preparatory service held only in metropolitan churches was in progress; the pleasant but monotonous chanting of the choir, to the accompaniment of a fine organ, was well in keeping with the subuded magnificence of the massive pile, which does not owe its celebrity to any gorgeousness in decoration, but to the perfect symmetry of its proportions.

Notre Dame is an architect's heaven, every line and curve is exquisite; the design may be pronounced faultless, and it is carried out in every detail; nothing is left unfinished anywhere. After paying the twenty-five centimes (five cents) apiece, which is expected for the use of chairs in the Nave at the high mass, to the polite and kindly woman who conducts visitors to seats, they had just time to give one all-round glance at the stately building, when the immense organ in the gallery pealed forth its glorious tones and the procession entered to celebrate the grand mass. Mr. Templeton, who had never been deeply impressed with any Catholic service at home, and had not expected any enjoyment from the ritual at Notre Dame, however he might admire the building, was unexpectedly thrilled with delight; not only was the grand music unspeakably inspiring, there was a sense of deep spiritual fervor all about him, which lifted him from thoughts of earth to blessed realization of far nobler things.

As the beautiful Gregorian music proceeded, the incomparably rich voice of Heloise rose and fell as though in transports of adoration; it was not, however, till the Sanctus that the superlative effect was produced. A boy in the choir whose clear, treble tones had led all the other voices again and again through the high sustained melodies of the Gloria and Credo, faltered slightly as he touched G, and almost broke as he was taking A. Heloise, grasping the situation instantly, threw her voice into the choir and sang with the little fellow in such perfect union that none but those familiar with her voice and knew her power could have suspected anything unusual; her voice was, however, so much finer than anyone in the choir that many comments were heard after the service, such as: "Who was that boy who sang so divinely; we never heard so sweet a voice before."

The day was lovely, and all felt disposed to enjoy a portion of it in the air. No thoroughly healthy people are poor walkers, whatever nation they belong to, and all our friends being in excellent physical condition though the day was very warm, when they left the church, took a leisurely stroll along the banks of the Seine for a full hour, which brought them in due course back to "The Palms." At 3 oclock they were in the Madelaine, where they enjoyed another rare musical treat, and though there was no occasion for her coming to any one's assistance, Heloise, who loved to sing as the birds love singing, again added to the superb effects in the choir by remaining motionless on her prie dieu, while her voice sounded from behind the altar, where the fine choir occupies stalls around the organ. At Benediction her face gleamed with something more than earthly light, and it was several minutes after the lights were extinguished on the altar before she rose from her knees. When she did so, her face had a far-away expression, and as they were going down the steps, she whispered to Lydia O'Shannon, who, despite the electric incident, was always at her side and growing to love her devotedly, "You and I have been to two churches this afternoon. I wonder if our companions had any idea of our taking such a long voyage in so short a time?"

Overhearing this singular remark quite incomprehensible to the ordinary understanding, Mr. Templeton, who was now betrothed to Lydia, said in an apologetic voice, "Pardon me for hearing what may not have been intended for my ears but the experiences I am now undergoing are sharpening all my faculties, and whatever concerns my affianced bride interests me deeply. I understood you to say that both of you had attended two churches this afternoon, while we had only been at one. May I ask an explanation of this new mystery? Do we understand you to say that while the service was proceeding in the Madelaine, a service in which you showed the deepest interest and during which you manifested peculiar devotion, you were both conscious of being somewhere else, and, therefore, oblivious to your earthly surroundings? Had you appeared sleepy, rigid, motionless, or even indifferent, I could have believed you were in a clairvoyant trance, but, Miss de Montemarte, you sang seraphically; were you unconscious while singing?

"Not by any means," responded both young ladies at once, "we were never so vividly conscious as when we were in the two churches, while you were only in one; the second church can only be described as a church above a church, reached by a ladder of light; our bodies remained with you, and our spiritual essence seemed to elongate itself so that we were large enough to be in our places beside you and, at the same time, in a far larger and much more beautiful edifice; we cannot imagine how far off when measured by earthly distance; after the benediction we stayed to join in a magnificent Te Deum in the grander church. When the song ceased there, we felt ourselves returning to our ordinary dimensions, picked up our parsols and accompanied you down the aisle of the beautiful earthly temple, where we had all been worshipping together. The universal church is a subject upon which my father wishes to converse with you very soon, certainly before you leave us," continued Heloise, "and while our experiences do not at all accord with any orthodox theories, and also throw iconoclastic Spiritualists into convulsions of impotent fury, I am certain you will be glad to hear them explained, and be quite ready at the right moment to make them the basis of your future religious operations."

Walking slowly homeward, discoursing, as they went, of the future of the French Republic and, then, of the coming commonwealth of nations, which Professor de Montmarte declared "could not be delayed much later than 1950, though the full glory of the new age might not flood the world till 350 years later, their conversation turned to the supposed impending conflicts between France and Germany and England and Russia. Such conflicts," he declared, "will not take place; there will be rumors of wars, but no wars, at all events for a number of years to come; and then, if war there be, though fierce, it will be short; it is not through a clashing of swords, or firing of cannon, but through a conflict of ideas the new cycle will be ushered in.

"1881 was the first year of preparation; we are now on our hands and knees, at least, most of us, creeping through the narrow passage into the King's Chamber of the Great Pyramid. Professor Smythe and others have seen an outline of what is coming, but they are too hampered with literalism to give the matter the universal exposition it demands. I now have a work in manuscript in my library, which gives accurate instruction how to decipher every portion of the Pyramid; but such a work would be pronounced profane by the theologians, so I shall not show it to them; they think every one a heathen, unless he be outwardly Jew or Christian, consequently they cannot accept God's revelation to the earlier Ayran races; peoples who were as far above the Jews of the time of David and Solomon as our modern civilization, is ahead of the savage customs of untutored aborigines."

Thus they talked as they walked, first upon one theme and then upon another, until they reached their own door, where a pleasant surprise awaited them in the person of the Baroness von Eaglebald, their pleasant acquaintance of the steamer. Having received a most courteous note of invitation from the Montmartes to call upon them at any time, she thought Sunday after vespers a good time to find them in. She had just come from her favorite church, the beautiful St. Augustin, and was anxious to show the professor, in whose judgment she felt great confidence, an essay on the VEDAS, written, apparently with automatic ease in her presence, by a delicate girl, only twelve years of age, whose educational advantages had been confined to the ordinary curriculum of a home school room, presided over by an English clergyman's daughter, who served in the double capacity of governess and lady's companion. The essay read as follows:

THE VEDAS.

The name Veda has grown to be a familiar one in the ears of this generation. Every educated person among us knows it as the title of a literary work, belonging to far-off India, that is held to be of quite exceptional importance by men who are studying some of the subjects that most interest ourselves. Yet there are, doubtless, many to whose minds the word brings but a hazy and uncertain meaning. For their sake, then, it may be well to take a general view of the Veda, to define its place in the sum of men's literary productions, and to show how and why it has the especial value claimed for it by its students.

The Veda is the Bible of the inhabitants of India, ancient and modern; the sacred book of one great division of the human race. Now, leaving aside our own Bible, the first part of which was, in like manner, the ancient sacred book of one division of mankind (the Hebrew), there are many such scriptures in the world. There is the Koran of the Arabs, of which we know perfectly well the period and author; the Avesta of the Persian "fire worshippers," or followers of Zoroaster; the records of ancient China, collected and arranged by Confucius, and others less conspicuous. All are of high interest, important for the history of their respective peoples, and for the general history of religions; yet they lack that breadth and depth of consequence that belongs to the Hindu Veda. This is what we have to explain:

The Sanskrit word Veda signifies literally knowledge; it comes by regular derivation from a root vid, meaning see and so know. Here is found a first intimation of the relation of the Vedas to us; for this root vid is the same that lies at the basis of the Latin video, I see (whence our evident, vision, etc.), of the Greek oeoà, I know, and of our own Germanic words wit, wot, witness, and so on. It is a sign of that community of language that binds together into one family most of the peoples of Europe and a part of those of Asia, showing their several histories to be, in a more peculiar and intimate sense, branches of one common history.

In the following table is given a little specimen of the evidence that proves this:

English,	two	three	mother	brother.
Germany,	zwei	drei	mutter	brudder.
Slavic,	dwa	tri	mater	brat.
Celtic,	dau	tri	mathair	brathair.
Latin,	duo	tres	mater	frater.
Greek,	duo	treis	meter	phrater.
Persian,	diva	thri	matar
Sanskrit,	diva	tri	matar	bhratar.

We know enough about the history of human speech to be certain that such correspondences as these—and their like are scattered through the whole vocabulary and grammar of the languages in question—are only explainable on one supposition, viz; that the tongues which contain them are common descendants of one original tongue; that is to say, the dialects of German, Slavonian, Celt, Roman, Greek, Persian and Hindu are the later representatives of a single language, spoken by a single limited community, somewhere on the earth's wide surface, sometime in the immeasurable past;

where and when, we should like very much to know, and mean to find out, if we can; but as yet we do not know anything definite about it. We call this great body of related languages carrying with it, by inference, a relationship, also, of the peoples speaking them—the Indo-European or Aryan family; and we acknowledge something of kinship with every member of the family. It is not, perhaps, a very lively feeling; cousinship loses much of its charm, when expressed in high numbers; yet, as we have a certain warmth of sentiment in foreign lands toward even an unrelated countryman, so, in wandering up and down the wastes of human history, we cannot but feel drawn toward those who really speak our own speech.

One great division of this family of ours we find in Asia, occupying Iran (Persia, etc.) and India; the Aryan division, according to the best uses of this name, since the ancient people of both of these countries, and no others, called themselves arya. Their oldest dialects of which we have any record, those of the Avesta and the Veda, are hardly more unlike one another than are English and Netherlandish; and as in the latter case, the narrow North Sea separates the two parts of an only recently divided people, so in the former case, the highlands and passes of the Hindu-Kush do the same.

As the English crossed the sea from Low Germany, dispersing the Celts, so the Indian branch of our kindred stole into India (doubtless, earlier than 2000 B. C.), through the same gorges that now connect and hold apart India and Afghanistan, and began the conquest of the great and rich peninsula. There we see them still, occupying, with their own dialects, only the northern part of the country, while the aboriginal "Dravididus" still hold the south, but permeate it all with their influence and institutions, grown to number many scores of millions; possessed of a civilization of native growth and high grade; with literature and arts and religions that have overrun a great part of Asia—in short, a leading factor in universal human history. All this, and how it came about is a matter of only recent knowledge. By a strange fate, this easternmost branch of our family has fallen within the last century or two, under the dominion of one of the westernmost members, the English.

The story of its subjection is well known and need not be more than alluded to here. The wisdom and wealth of India has always been the admiration of the world; it was not, however, curiosity as to the wisdom that brought knowledge; rather, greed for wealth. Almost everywhere in human history the lower motives are immediately efficient, and a band of adventurous traders, seeking material profit, threw open also the intellectual treasure-house of India. The wars and intrigues by which the English commercial company became masters of the destinies of the country, turning their charge over later to the English crown, form a striking chapter of modern history. For nearly 900 years India has been the prey of foreign conquerors and oppressors. The English are merely the last, and, by far, the best of their long series. They found in this immense and highly civilized country a host of varying languages, dialects of more than one great family, with abundant literatures. They also found one language, the Sanskrit, reputed of immemorial antiquity, held sacred by the real Hindu everywhere, read by the educated, and even spoken and written by the leading class, the priestly caste of the Brahmins. Precisely so might the Mongols, had they completely ravaged Europe in the Middle Ages, have reported to their countrymen concerning the diverse tongues and literatures of that region, and the Latin as common dialect of the learned, especially of the Romish hierarchy; the analogy is a close and instructive one. This was a sufficiently notable condition of things; but the interest of the world was greatly heightened, when it was discovered that this learned and sacred idiom of India, the Sanskrit, is related to nearly all the languages now spoken in Europe, and with the ancient ones that we most value (Greek and Latin), and it is, in many respects, entitled to the leading place among them; for it casts more light than any other upon their common history and origin.

In the excitement of such a discovery, many scholars lost their heads and extolled the Sanskrit and its literature far beyond their deserts, even holding that this was the origina tongue of our division of mankind, and the source of literary culture for the rest of the world; and the echoes of these errors may be heard dimly reverberating here and there among the nooks and corners of literature even of our own day. But,—thanks in no small measure to what the Sanskrit itself has taught us—such matters are much better understood now. Languages are certainly changing, and hence we could never find the original Indo-European tongue, except in documents coming down from the very period of Indo-European unity; and that lies, perhaps, thousands of years back of the time of the earliest Sanskrit. We have no reason to believe that any culture was carried from India to nations beyond its borders until the missionary period of Buddhism, not far from the Christian era.

But the study of Sanskrit, chiefly as the mainstay of Indo-European comparative philology and of the general science of language, has become an integral part of the system of modern education, a department of classical learning standing with Latin and Greek, and ranking next to them in practical importance. All this is a necessary introduction to an understanding of the value of the Veda. We need to note what are the relations to us of the people to whom it belonged and of the language in which it is written. The opening of India, as we say, gave us the ancient Sanskrit language as an instrument of linguistic research, and laid before us the immense Sanskrit literature, as a part of the archives of our division of the human race, to be studied and comprehended. A task, this, of no small difficulty, and the more since the element of history is wanting in this literature. The Hindu is great in constructing systems of absolute truth, but he despises a record of facts; he has a scheme of astronomical cycles reaching back almost into infinity, and can tell precisely how many days ago the creation of the universe was completed; but he cannot give the real, prosaic date of any event, civil or literary, back of our Middle Ages. We are left in the main to work out, by internal evidence, the order of succession of the parts of this literature, and then, with help of the chance notices of foreign visitors, to determine what we can as to their absolute date; and the problem is yet far enough from being solved. At what time were composed those two tremendous epics, the "Ramayana" and "Mahabbarata," in comparison with which the "Iliad," or the "Odyssey," is but a ballad? No one can tell, but it was certainly a very long while ago.

How old are the laws of Manu, from which certain people stoutly maintain that Moses must have derived his legislation for the Hebrews? That is equally unknown. Of the latest and best authorities some set them before Christ, others a little after; and the period of the leading dramatic poet, the author of "Sakuntala," has been reduced from 100 B. C., as claimed by early students of India, to 5–600 A. D. But it is, at any rate, possible in this literature, as in every other, to lay out in a broad and general way the history of growth, divide it into successive periods, and determine what is oldest in it. Everywhere throughout it the Veda is acknowledged as its beginning, is regarded as a revelation on whose authority everything else reposes.

The sacred literature of Christianity does not point any more clearly to the Bible as its foundation than the sacred literature of Brahminism to the Veda. It was a considerable time, however, before European research had cleared the way for dealing directly with the Hindu revelation. The name Hindu Veda to the Hindu signifies a very extensive and heterogenous mass of writings, covering a space of time and growth like that from Moses to Christ; and the later parts of it are those which the modern Hindu best undertands and most values, as being nearest to his own age and thought.

Manuscripts of its older parts were comparatively rare, and less freely furnished to the curiosity of the stranger; yet they gradually gathered in European hands, and in 1805, some thirty years after the opening of Indian literature to the knowledge of the world, the illustrious English scholar Colebrooke, in an essay since become famous, was able to give a comprehensive and fairly correct survey of the whole vast field, without, however, at all fully comprehending the relation of its parts, or realizing the supreme importance of some among them.

Yet a generation passed before anything further of consequence was done; then the word fell into the hands of the great German scholars, whose names will be always associated with it—Rosen, Roth, Bentley, Weber, Aufrecht, Muller—and a new era was inaugurated in the study of Indian antiquity and in that of the antiquities and religion of the whole Indo-European race. As a matter of course, the Hindus have all sorts of strange stories to tell about their sacred literature—that it is of divine origin, revealed from all eternity, miraculously preserved and re-revealed at each new destruction and recreation of the universe. Few Oriental people have failed to claim as much as that for their scriptures. Then they tell of a certain holy rishi or sage named Vyasa, by whom the mass was collected and put in order. Vyasa means arranger; so it is as if people were to hold that a saint named Editor brought into shape the two testaments and the writings of the fathers for the after-use of the Christian church. But the Hindus have done their full share by handing down to us, with a reverential and painstaking care that has not its equal anywhere else in the history of literature, their sacred books, not at all comprehending their historical relations and only in part understanding their contents; ours is the task to bring true order and intelligence into the chaos.

We find the whole body of inspired writings divided into four parts, each of which is called a Veda—Rig Veda, Sama

Veda, Yojur Veda, and Atharva Veda. Each division has its schools of more special votaries, by whom it is handed down; each has its assortment of works, in prose and verse, devotional, ceremonial, expository, and theosophic. But at the head of each stands a collection of sacred utterances, chiefly poetic, which we have no difficulty in recognizing as their oldest part, the nucleus about which everything else has gradually gathered; all the rest presupposes these, as plainly as the Talmud, the Old Testament, or the writings of the fathers, the New. They are in a language in many respects peculiar and evidently older, a more primitive dialect of the primitive Sanskrit. Among these four collections, the superior interest of one is seen on the briefest examination; it is the Rig Veda, an immense body of hymns to the gods, of sacred lyrics with which the remote ancestors of the present Hindus praised the divinities in whom they believed, accompanied their sacrifices, and besought blessings. We cannot compare them with our hymns, because these imply so much that is earlier, out of which they have proceeded. The Vedic songs are more like the Psalms of David. There are more than a thousand of these songs, and they contain over ten thousand two-line stanzas —a body of text about equal to the two Homeric poems taken together, or twice as much as the great German epic of the Nibelungen. The collection is an orderly one, arranged in ten books, chiefly according to a tradition of authorship that appears to be genuine; hymns of the same author, or clan, or school of authors are put together. But the last book is a kind of appendix to the rest, containing in part material of a peculiar character, later, more superstitious, and with some miscellanies of quite exceptional interest. Inside the divisions, the hymns are arranged chiefly in the order of the divinities.

The two gods most often worshipped,—their praises together fill almost the majority of hymns,—are Agni and Indra: Agni (Latin ignis), the fire, the medium of sacrifice, the divinity on earth, in bodily presence before the eyes of his worshippers, the messenger between earth and heaven, who bears the oblations aloft to the other gods, or about whose flames the gods gather to receive their share of the offering; and Indra, the Thunderer, god of the storm, who drives his noisy chariot across the sky, and hurls his lightning missile at the demons that are keeping the refreshing and fertilizing waters imprisoned in the hollow of the clouds.

Hymns to Agni come first, those to Indra follow, and after them those to other gods. As specimens of the general content of the Rig Veda, we cannot do better than quote a hymn to each of these two divinities. The hymn to Agni, an ordinary and undistinguished one, is the first of the whole collection; its stanzas are composed each of three eight syllabled sections, with iambic cadence. In all the Vedic meters, the first part of each section is of very free construction, as regards quantity.

TO AGNI—REG. VEDA I, 1.

1. Agni I praise, the household priest, the heavenly lord of sacrifice, the giver most bounteous.

2. Agni, by bards of olden time and bards of our day, should be praised; he shall bring hither all the gods.

3. By Agni treasure may be won, and welfare, too, from day to day; in honor rich and numerous sons.

4. Agni, each sacred offering thou dost shield from harm on every side, that surely cometh to the gods.

5. May Agni, priest, with insight filled, faithful, of favor most glorious, come hither with the other gods.

6. What favor on thy worshiper, Agni, thou willest to bestow, that failest not, O Angiros!

7. Unto thee, Agni, day by day, at morn and eve with worship we approach and our obeisance bring.

8. Presiding o'er the sacrifice the shining guardian of the right increasing in thine own abode.

9. As father to his son, do thou, Agni, be gracious unto us; and for our welfare cleave to us.

The selected hymn to Indra is a more than usually vigorous one. The verse sections are of twelve syllables, also with iambic cadence.

TO INDRA—REG. VEDA. X, 38.

To us, O Indra, in this conflict glorious,
The toilful din of war, be helpful, that we win;
Where in the foray, 'mid bold warriors ring adorned
The arrows fly hither and thither in the strife.
And open to us, Indra, in our own abode,
Wealth rich in food, flowing with kine and full of fame.
But we, thine allies, when thou conquerest, mighty one,
Just what we wish do thou, our friend, perform for us.
And to the godless men of Aryon or of barbarous race.

All exclaimed, "How marvelous a production for a girl of twelve. Is she a seeress?"

"Really, I don't know," responded the Baroness. "The little creature is staying with her mother and governess in the pension, where I am boarding. I took a liking to her immediately, and she to me. May I invite her to one of your reunions?"

"Certainly," replied both the Professor and his daughter. "Let us send our carriage for you this evening. We have a few delightful friends, including two or three of your fellow passengers, coming to us at 8. Bring the young lady's mother with you, and the governess, too, if you think it desirable; but unless they are exceptional people, they may be startled."

"I thank you a thousand times for your kind invitation, and for myself and little Florence, I gladly accept it. I must be going now. Au revoir till 8 o'clock." And the Baroness departed.

CHAPTER XV.

AN EVENING WITH THE MYSTERIES OF SPIRITUALISM AND THEOSOPHY.

"To Hindostan I gladly flew,
To learn of nature's mystic store;
I conned the Vedas o'er and o'er,
But little of their import knew.

I dwelt amid the spicy trees
Of fair Ceylon, where hermits dwell;
Their strange, weird tales I heard them tell,
But magic ne'er my soul could please.

Then homeward wended I my way,
With disappointment strong and keen;
I felt I most unwise had been
To waste my youth's most brilliant day.

Within my berth with limbs at rest,
What is that fleecy form I see,
Bending in kindness over me?
A voice I hear, Go, teach the West.

How shall I teach? I have not learned,
I answer with quick coming breath;
'Thou shalt pass through the mystic death,
Wherein illusions all are spurned.'

I see it now; within my soul
I find the answer to my quest;
The East is now within my breast,
So let old ocean westward roll."

Eight o'clock came, and with it the Baroness von Eaglebald, attended by her young friend, Alicia Florence Kittens-comb, who had acted as amanuensis for whatever intelligence dictated the singular paper introduced in our last chapter. Alicia was a small, slender child, rather backward in her studies, of a retiring, diffident nature, but not at all nervous or irritable. Having taken a great liking to the kind and handsome Baroness, she gladly accompanied her wherever she was pleased to take her. The child's mother, widow of the late Rev. Theodosius Kittenscomb (an English clergyman of liberal views, but no great force of character), was a gentle, negative woman, enjoying very limited health and quite at the mercy of Miss Laetitia Newmanhoff, who served her in the double role of companion to the lady and governess to the child. Mrs. Kittenscomb would have greatly enjoyed visiting the Montmartes, but her head, she declared, was not equal to it; a vinaigrette, a fan and a book of sermons were all she could stand that evening.

Miss Newmanhoff was glad of the opportunity to attend evening service in the English Church, so Alicia went alone with the Baroness to "The Palms," where they were most hospitably received. Heloise, who was exceptionally kind to children, though rarely very strongly drawn to any particular child, set little Alicia completely at her ease before she had been in the house five minutes, while her father, in his usual gentle, courtly manner, removed the last trace of her embarrassment, when he took both of her hands in his own and said, with his accustomed knightly grace:

"You are a very valuable addition to our party, my young friend; your essay shows that you possess a very remarkable gift. God bless you and keep you always pure as you now are."

While the Baroness and Heloise were chatting freely on the subjects which interested both of them, about fifteen guests arrived, so that before nine o'clock the salon was well occupied. The gathering was a very interesting and truly remarkable one. Mme. la Duchesse de la Couronne Hauterne led the list of nobilities; she was a very distinguished looking woman, about fifty years of age, magnificently dressed, with an imperial air and many a sign of deep intelligence, as well as noble birth; with her came Count Noumenoff Azakotoff, a talented Russian litterateur, as well as nobleman. Mrs. Freshfield, Miss Bluegrass and Miss Cuthay were American ladies traveling together, and deeply interested in Theosophy. Mrs. Delman Trice O'Neil was an Irish woman of rare wit and the keenest humor, whom every one appreciated as a brilliant talker, though her tongue was often called sharp and not without reason. Mr. Puggie Terry looked as though some tailor had sent his dummy to advertise wares and style; he was, however, honestly good-natured and had a serious penchant for Spiritualism. Mr. Claphand Knowles and Captain Dasher Dogshead were English gentlemen who had traveled in India and knew more about fakirs than would fill a dozen volumes. Last, but not least, came Mrs. Oman Caliph Kolokoon, a woman of the world, who had written eighty novels, knew seven languages, had lived in twenty countries, been received into eighteen religious denominations and was now balancing between the Catholic Church and Aryan Theosophy. In such a company, one would naturally expect fine conversation and no dearth of subjects to discuss, but so affecting was the atmosphere of "The Palms," that after a few commonplace remarks, the whole company subsided into unbroken and seemingly unbreakable silence.

After the spell had rested over the company about ten minutes, Heloise and Lydia rose simultaneously and walked, the one to the organ, the other to the piano. Heloise struck off a few grand chords from Haydn's imperial Mass, when suddenly the theme changed completely, and weird, sobbing strains wailed from the instrument, as though some shipwrecked mariners, in deepest distress, were calling for relief, first to heaven and then to earth; Lydia, at the piano, answered the call, which was again and again repeated by the organ, which occasionally imitated peals of distant thunder; when, at last, the storm seemed to have subsided, and relief to have come, the two instruments sounded together the introduction to Pallegrini's "Te Deum," which glorious hymn of praise the two girls began to sing in swelling, soaring harmony, when suddenly there burst upon the wonder-struck ears of all in the salon, a full triumphal chorus of male voices; it seemed as though the roof itself, as well as everything in it, swayed and kept time with the melody.

When the song had ceased, a vision greeted the eyes of all, seen distinctly by some, indistinctly by others, which completely defies description, so heavenly was it in all its parts. A cloud of light seemed to rest in the air, about midway between the floor and ceiling; on this cloud were seen seated a company of bright forms of dazzling beauty, in number exactly agreeing with the persons present. From out this cloud, one of the luminous forms reached down and touched the special object of his charge till the whole room was enveloped in the sheen of these supernal visitors. In that moment the secret thoughts of each heart lay bare; disguise was impossible, each person saw himself as he really was inwardly, though no one saw his neighbor's condition. All were moved beyond word, and few could bear the test without some feeling of fear or humiliation. The scene soon passed away, and all the company sat motionless, awaiting whatever new marvel might be reserved for them, when Heloise, looking more lovely than ever, her eyes burning with an intense light, her whole frame quivering with a fervid inspiration, addressed the gathering collectively and individually, almost in the following words:

"Children of the rising day, it is not by accident that we are all here to-night; this moment is propitious for the foundation of an order, which shall add another link to the many which now forms the unseen chain, which binds the Orient with the Occident. I cannot initiate you, nor need my father do so; your initiation is over, and henceforth you belong consciously to the order of "La Stella Israfel;" we do not countenance such secret orders as impose upon their members the use of signs and passwords, for such external usages belong not to the customs of any order in which the spiritual welfare of mankind alone is sought.

"Unlike as you appear in many things, and varying as your unfoldment is, you are all members of the same circle of souls; you are each other's in a very near and blessed manner, and you will be useful to each other in many ways; some of you, in times of danger and in far distant lands."

Speaking, then, to each one separately, she raised her hand above the head of whoever she might be addressing in fervent blessing, causing the electric fire, which issued from her finger tips, to arouse to activity the special mental quality, to which that portion of the brain corresponded over which her hands were raised. Speaking to Mr. Templeton, she was particularly earnest and explicit, and to him this act of hers, following upon the revelation to sight, which had preceded it, was a veritable ordination, far surpassing in solemnity and depth of meaning the ceremony which had inducted him as pastor of the Baptist Church, Saddlerock, Vermont.

Life now seemed to hold new meanings and to bristle with new purposes for all who were thus assured of their relation with each other, and the breadth and unanimity of feeling which must henceforth guide them in all their undertakings. After giving words of direction to all the older people, Heloise seemed guided to speak with even greater earnestness and feeling to Zenophon, and then to Alicia; to the little girl the scene seemed quite familiar, and when the ceremony was at an end, she enquired smilingly and confidently:

"Isn't your angel guardian the teacher who comes to me at night and takes me off with him to heaven, and then sends a pupil of his to help me comfort mamma, when she's sad, and do lots of things to help poor people?

"Yes, indeed," responded Heloise, "you are like many other little ones, much nearer the spiritual kingdom than those of maturer years, who, in the pride of intellect, rebel coldly and heartlessly against all they cannot reduce to the limits of their small calculating reason. Self-sufficiency is the leading vice of the present century, and to it alone do we rightly attribute the blatant materialism, frigid atheism, hopeless pessimism, and the many other disastrous ills, which threaten to so eclipse the soul that the world is left almost without moral sunshine. You, my little prophetess, are one of the little ones to whom it is given not only to know, but to reveal the mysteries of heaven; not a dim, far-away place of which man cannot conceive; but a warm, living estate of happiness and peace here and now to be realized by all the truly faithful."

As Heloise ceased speaking, the face of Alicia Kittenscomb grew radiant with an ineffable light, as though she saw an angel. Stretching out her delicate white hands, she seemed to spring from her mortal body into some ethereal realm, where beloved friends were waiting to receive her; then falling back upon a sofa, as though she were fast asleep, her form became rigid, motionless as a statue, so still that it almost alarmed those who were not familiar with the phenomenon of electric trance. In this motionless condition she remained until considerably past eleven, when some of the visitors began to talk of going home. Just as the Baroness' carriage was announced, and she was looking askance at the host and hostess, not knowing whether it would be safe to try and arouse the child, the girl awoke of her own accord, saying,

"Mamma expects me now; I must go home; but to-morrow I have a message for Mr. Templeton, let him call at our house, Avenue de Poissonarde 71, about noon. I can only say that it concerns his mother and the place where she is; I have had a vision, but I cannot tell it now."

Though usually most retiring in manner, even to shyness, she now spoke with all the firm assurance of a stately man or woman in middle life; and so altered was her appearance that she seemed much taller and stouter, and in every way far more robust than when she had entered the house three hours earlier. This remarkable change, which was the commencement of a complete reconstruction of her physique, can be scientifically accounted for, if the reader bears in mind that though instantaneous regeneration of the body is very rare, even the greatest works which take the longest to complete, have a definite moment of commencement, as the foundation stone of an immense and most durable edifice is laid at a particular hour; under favoring auspices, all necessary conditions being present, a foundation can be laid in less than an evening, for a building of perfect symmetry and strength in place of a weak and almost nerveless organism. The trance in its highest phase is due to an unusual uplifting of consciousness; indeed, it is the result of consciousness being completely transferred to another and higher plane. This transfer of attention is vitally connected with a radical change in psychical relations, a change so complete in many instances that all the ordinary habits of the individual are superseded by completely new desires. This state of entrancement is never induced by drugs, fumigations, or other questionable methods; it is only to be brought about by a supreme attraction to a higher condition of being. This fact is realized by many mental healers, but it is very seldom that one encounters a person who understands the modus operandi of the results in which he glories.

Explaining to the Baroness the great benefits accruing to such sensitive natures as Alicia's from the hyper-æsthetic conditions, Professor de Montmarte rigorously combated the superstitions of abstractionists and explained logically how soul acts on mind and mind on body.

"Soul," said he, "is a pure spark of deific fire, an electric atom, an imperishable germ of life, which nothing can ever destroy, containing within itself infinite possibilities; mind is its creation, the instrument it forms and uses to gain expression. This mind, in its derived consciousness, often feels and acts independently of the soul, from whose wise and loving guardianship it often proudly strays; at such times it is like a wayward child, foolishly rebellious against a tender and watchful parent; at other times the mind is entangled in the meshes of the thought threads issuing in every direction from the innumerable mentalities which throng the air, and constitute what the New Testament styles 'principalities and powers of the air.' Whenever any mind gets entangled with other minds, or runs off obstinately from the parental guidance of the soul, the body suffers, physical disease being nothing but an expression of mental inharmony. Sleep, when profound, recalls the wandering mind to its rightful allegiance to the soul; but sleep is worse than useless, it is positively dangerous and attended with the most disastrous consequences, if fallen into under the influence of violent emotions, such as rage or fear, which often produce intense exhaustion. Sleep, induced by opiates, being quite unnatural, is rarely, if ever, beneficial, as the sleeper does not rise out of surrounding conditions, but is benumbed, while held in them.

"Dreams are ordinarily no more than floating images, and confused pictures of external things, the astral prototypes of which are always in the air about us. The art of sleeping properly can be acquired, but only by the pure minded or those who purify themselves by earnest striving after higher things than affairs pertaining to the body. Human electricity, when judiciously administered by a true savant, introduces the patient into the sphere of the healer; and there, if congeniality of desire is aroused, connections are made which snap the links of the chain binding the darkened mind to error. The intricate directions necessary for neophytes commencing to tread in the higher way, are, in reality, exceedingly simple, though minute. Such are never fully revealed, except to those who are sincerely anxious to attain to a more than usually excellent order of life. The average worldling would scorn them, as the figurative swine trample on the pearls foolishly thrown to them by the unwary, and like these same degraded animals, they would rend, if they could, the very hand which gave them such precious goods.

"It is worse than folly to seek to coerce the human will, as all endeavor to proselytize but makes the sinner more obdurate in his ungodliness. Let your light shine everywhere, but do not seek, by forcible means, to turn back the wilfully closed eyelids of those who love darkness rather than light; such must be left to the fruits of their own perversity. Doubtless in the cycles of eternity every prodigal will return home, but though most kindly welcomed when returning, the desire to return must originate in his own breast."

"But, my dear professor," exclaimed the Baroness, who seemed in no hurry to leave, though her carriage was at the door and had been waiting twenty minutes, "do you not think we ought to make an effort to bring the truth home to the minds of all whom we meet. I have felt it both a duty and a privilege to circulate a great deal of spiritual literature, and I am now translating the remarkable inspirational discourses and poems of Mrs. Katzenheimer, of whom you have, doubtless, heard, into French, German and Italian, as I meet so many people of those nationalities. I hope you and your lovely daughter are not going to tell me I am wrong in so doing; my motive is pure at any rate."

"I do not think you are doing anything but what is perfectly right and very useful, provided you use discretion and give your books to people who evince interest and desire to learn. Books are silent messengers and can be laid about, so that people with leisure and literary tastes can read them, if they feel so inclined, without being compelled in any way by any one; then in traveling you, doubtless, meet many who talk to you on serious matters, if you give them an opportunity, and ask you for help and light. I only advise caution and discretion. There are probably not more than a thousand people out of the more than two millions now in Paris, who would be really prepared for much that you would rejoice to become acquainted with, and even in the single thousand, of which you are one, I should not find, by any means, all ready for the results of our deepest researches.

"My daughter and myself are happily quite indifferent to the opinion of society; the sneer of a popinjay is no more to us than the scream of a parrot, or the jabber of a mocking-bird; but we give polly a cracker and say, 'pretty poll,' when we pass the cage. We do not attempt to teach our dogs mathematics, our horses geology, or our cats astronomy. And though human beings have, even at their lowest, powers far beyond the animal, until their aspirations for higher things are developed, they must play with the toys of intellectual and moral childhood. I do not censure the church for veiling its mysteries from the vuglar; I do, however, most strongly disapprove of any attempt to force back a rising tide of honest inquiry. No child ever asks a question in sincerity before he is ready to profit by a decent answer, which is not an insult to his dawning reason.

"Heloise knew the secret of her birth at seven, and wrote an essay on the vital functions at nine, which I preserve among my literary treasures; but she was an exceptional child. Her mother was a Chaldean, descended from the purest and most prophetic race of ancient days; her work on earth was finished, when our child was five; she passed away in a trance of rapture after completing a work displaying such erudition that scholars have offered me fortunes to be allowed to copy it. Heloise sang the old Chaldaic jubilations of the resurrection in the original tongue to the ancient melodies she had never heard, while kneeling among the lights and flowers which surrounded the lovely recumbent form, dressed as a bride, before committal to the sacred flames; when the obsequies were ended, she spoke to me in her mother's voice and her mother looked at me through the child's eyes, and immediately after, the form of Azoriel enveloped her. From that time forward she had none of the customary ills of childhood, and when a terrible fever raged in one of the vilest parts of the city, she visited, with me, dens which no one but priests and sisters would enter. In not a single case were her ministrations unsuccessful; but after the most careful questioning, she assured me she had never seen a squalid dwelling or a wasted face; she persisted in her declaration that she only fanned soul sparks which were feeble, to keep them from going out.

"When a priest entered an apartment where we were, and administered the sacraments to those who were supposed to be dying, she would kneel motionless and tell me afterwards that a presence entered brighter than Azoriel; but I am positive she never saw the outward form of anything about us. Some one told her one day, when she was only a few months over six, that her mother was dead and she should go out to her grave and pray for her. The beautiful child's face turned to the woman who addressed her, and she said with loving sweetness and wisdom far beyond her years:

" 'Poor woman, I see you are unhappy; you are seeking the living among the dead; my mother and I pray together, sometimes in church, oftener among the roses in the garden; your mother is not dead, you may pray for her, but it is better to rejoice with her; don't go to the cemetery to find her; she's here with you.' And then my treasure went on to tell her all about her mother; she took away her fear of purgatory, explained everything which seems so impenetrable to most people, and then sent the woman away to comfort others, with the good news she had told her so sweetly and lovingly. I know you are very much attracted to Heloise and she is to you, so we can talk about her childhood together, as I see it interests you. To the world in general my daughter is a gifted young lady, well educated and particularly healthful, but nothing further. Alicia is now quite ready to go home with you, and it is almost midnight. Bring Mrs. Kittenscomb to see us next time you come; we would gladly call on her, but her chronic invalidism can be broken up much more quickly in this atmosphere. Miss Newmanhoff will understand nothing and oppose everything; she is a good, high principled woman, but the narrowest interpretation of Anglican theology is all she can tolerate; let her come, if she likes, but don't urge her. Dr. Dynaspherus Nuovomotor, President of the Muscovite Hermetic Lodge, lunches with us at two to-morrow, at four he will read a paper; as you are interested in these matters, I invite you most cordially to meet him. Two P.M., not a minute later, please. Mrs. Kittenscomb had better come in the evening, when there will be no strangers present, and I can set her right in less than a fortnight, if she wishes it."

The Baroness and her young charge reached their apartments at a quarter past twelve; Mrs. Kittenscomb was sleeping peacefully, she had retired at eleven with a greatly modified neuralgia. Miss Newmanhoff pleadingly lifted anxious eyes to the baroness, and murmured:

"Illustrious lady, I pray you to contemplate the indiscretion of keeping a child out to this hour; our good clergyman, Mr. Training Vyne, preached such a solemn sermon this evening on youthful dissipation; it impressed me deeply, and our pet is not strong."

"My good woman," answered Lady Eaglebald, "I know far better than you or Mr. Vyne either, what is the best for Alicia; her mother confides her to me gratefully, and if you will but allow yourself to see matters as they are, you cannot deny a great improvement in Alicia during the past week. I beg of you not to impress the child with your lachrymose ideas; they are far worse for her than the latest hours, or even the fashionable frivolties which your clergyman so justly discountenances."

"Sad, very sad, pitiably sad," whispered Miss Newmanhoff under her breath, and with a soft crooning, "tired lamb, weary dove," she led the animated, though rapidly sobering, child to the little iron bed, which, unfortunately for the child's best welfare, was in the governess' room.

The following afternoon the baroness attended the reunion at the Montmartes and met some delightful people, among them Dr. Nuovomotor, who was the principal spokesman; he was a writer of considerable ability, and favored the company with an essay. The following paper, which had been prepared for a widely-circulating English magazine, he read to the company by unanimous request; it was entitled: "The Gist of Theosophy."

"While an immense amount of floating opinion is, at present, circulating on the subject of 'theosophy,' there are comparatively but very few persons who have set themselves the task of so simplifying the tenets of theosophy as to make its main doctrines clearly intelligent to the western mind. The word theosophy, which signifies neither more or less than divine wisdom, is, by no means, exclusively confined to ancient Hinduism; it is a term properly applicable to all that can legitimately be termed knowledge of the spiritual universe. Theosophy, in its modern form, is constantly associated with the name of H. P. Blavatsky, because that most industrious Russian lady did more than any other individual to ransack the treasure-houses of eastern scripture to bring forth the truth therein contained for the edification of Europeans and Americans.

"Most students of Asiatic lore have been either Christian apologists or confirmed sceptics. Their previous training and fixed habits of thought have, therefore, largely disqualified them for an unprejudiced performance of their task. Mme. Blavatsky, on the other hand, has searched the records, not with a view to prove certain foregone propositions, or to discover fraud and folly in the documents under review, but to honestly express the information therein contained. Her latest work, the Secret Doctrine, amply proves the honesty of her endeavor and the ability she brings to the work. But some of our Christian friends will inquire, Why go to the Vedas for the truths we can find so perfectly revealed in the New Testament? Why speak of Gautama, when we have before us the example of Jesus? The answer to such inquiry is twofold. First, The New Testament deals almost exclusively with ethics. Its moral code is, indeed, unsurpassed, but on questions of science it is silent. Now the Hindu records are not simply moral text books, they are scientific treatises, as any one who intelligently peruses them will soon discover. Second, There is a widespread feeling in Christendom that beyond the pale of Christianity all is heathen darkness. Such a belief renders well nigh impossible any effectual carrying out of the fundamental basis of theosophy—the universal brotherhood of man.

"Theosophy does not require of any one who embraces it a surrender of the Christain religion, so far as its basis in the New Testament is concerned; at the same time it can not allow that any one book, people, or system, can embody all the divine wisdom known upon earth. The Bible, from Genesis to Revelation, teaches the cardinal doctrines of theosophy without amplifying them very clearly or extendedly. These doctrines certainly include what are commonly called 'Karma' and 'Re-incarnation,' teachings which simply need clear and cogent statement to make them appear what they are, thoroughly rational and scientific, and, above all, consistent with man's highest conception of divine, impartial equity.

"The Oriental wisdom-religion does not acknowledge any fall of man in the orthodox Christian sense. It teaches the involution of spirit and consequent evolution of matter, and in the exposition of this theory, it accounts for all the anomalies visible in the external world by attributing them to the experimental efforts of intelligent spiritual units seeking to make their powers manifest. In consonance with the teaching of the Kabbala and other occult works of olden time, theosophy teaches that the external universe is an expression of finite intelligences, necessarily limited in power and wisdom, but continually subject to the law of progress. These intelligences begin at the foot of the ladder of expression and work their way diligently and gradually to the top; thus the theory of transmigration is inverted in a manner very favorably regarded by Rev. J. F. Clarke in his "Ten Great Religions," and many other liberal and learned authors.

"Re-incarnation is usually ridicuously misunderstood. People who utterly fail to comprehend it, talk an unlimited amount of nonsense concerning another spirit usurping the body of a new-born child, and much similar folly, while theosophy explains how a soul awaiting embodiment introduces itself into earthly expression at the moment of conception by itself breathing the breath of life into the primal germ. In other words, conception is the result of spirit seeking expression through an appropriate material medium.

"Karma only means sequence or the unvarying operation of the law of cause and effect. Our present Karma is the effect of all our past career, remembered or seemingly forgotten. Whatever trials and difficulties we now confront come to us or try us, because of our moral, mental and physical condition being what it is, and it necessarily is what it is at any given moment as a result of all our past thinking, speaking and acting.

"The doctrine of Karma is not fatalism, for it does not teach us that all our lives are mapped out for us by the sovereign decree of inexorable fate; it simply declares the universal law which ordains that certain effects must ever proceed from certain causes; thus, while we cannot evade the operation of Karma, we can, as we increase in knowledge of the law, so frame our conduct, so govern our thoughts and affections, as well as our speech and behavior, as to sow nothing but good seed and consequently reap nothing but an agreeable harvest.

"Nirvana, or the state of supreme blessedness, is a condition in which we know no care and suffer no pain. When we have reached that celestial altitude, we are proof against all that could possibly afflict or disturb us; we are then above the recognition of sin, sickness and death, and in a state so exalted that for us Karma no longer operates.

"Theosophy does not allow that the penalty due to transgression can ever be evaded. To forgive sin is to deliver the mind from the bondage of evil desire. This can be accomplished by purely educational processes.

"Spiritual Healing is acknowledged by theosophy, only so far as it can be scientifically demonstrated as a means of awakening the higher consciousness by appealing to the nobler principle in man; phenomenal spiritualism is regarded as a legitimate subject for honest painstaking investigation with a view to ascertain the true source whence the phenomena proceed. The true theosophist lays the utmost stress on the culture of the higher self, not on the suppression of the lower instincts nearly so much as on the cultivation of the higher; and on the basis of this conviction, it is reasonably claimed the elevation of humanity can be successfully conducted.

"Theosophy is religion, but it is not any limited system or view of religion; it is science, but it does not confine itself to any particular department of research. It is, in a word, compendious anthropology; it teaches man to look within, to study his own permanent selfhood, to outgrow dependence on external sources of information and authority, and find within himself the true, perpetual light. Armed with the testimony of the ages, with malice toward none and good will towards all. Theosophy claims as its mission the unification of all human interests, and the establishment of a perfectly natural and yet highly spiritual church of humanity unconfined by party, race, color or belief."

The paper was received with many tokens of approval and called forth very little criticism, though Prof. de Montmarte entered more deeply into the history and development of the central thought.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE POWER THAT MAKETH WHOLE.

The dying stars proclaim the sun
That weaker eyes could not behold,
And lower lights had not foretold:
Then die upon a bed of gold,
Because the grander light is born!
The highland rills that seaward glide
May vanish in the mountain side,
And, sinking through the voiceless earth,
Within the cold, dark caves abide;
But naught can stay their "second birth,"
Or dim their resurrection morn:
Sometime, somewhere, in stronger tide,
And warmer light and broader sweep,
They rush to swell the distant deep,
That turns its awful palms to heaven,
That girdles with its mighty bands
All kingdoms, empires, realms, and lands,—
Within whose all-embracing rim
The fleets of Nations sink or swim
Like fire-flies in the mist of even,
And on whose all-receiving breast
The Ages lay their dead to rest.

You cannot blind my inner sight:
I see the dawn behind the night;
Beyond the dawn I see the day;
And through the day I see the Truth
Arising in immortal youth!
The sunbeams on her forehead play;
The lillies in her tresses twine;
The Peace of God dwells in her face
And rolls the clouds of war away
Around her feet the roses grow;
Her tender bosoms swell and flow
With healing for the stricken race,
And in her eyes seraphic shine
Faith, Hope, and Love, and every grace!—
The Old recedes, the New descends!
Earth clasps the hand that Heaven extends—
The Lion and the Lamb are friends!

—James G. Clark.

LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY

Mrs. Kittenscomb called on the Montmartes the same evening, in company with the Baroness and Alicia; she was literally dazzled with the quiet splendor of their mode of life. Having seen a great deal of the nouveaux riches, both English and American, of whom not a few spend a good deal of time in Paris, it was a new revelation to her to find persons of the highest and truest culture surrounded with all the brilliant accessories of wealth, and, above all, was she delighted with the utter absence of all "superior airs" among these truly superior people. Dinner was just over, and the whole party then domiciled at "The Palms" was in the library, to which elegant and luxurious apartment the new arrivals were at once conducted.

Professor de Montmarte looked very courtly in his peculiar style of evening dress, which was purely oriental in design, and suggested such perfect ease and comfort for the whole body that the fops who consider no man a gentleman, unless he makes himself a fright before he sits down to dinner, actually wished they had the independence of character to set decent fashions, instead of following idiotic ones, set by no one knows who. Heloise, always lovely, never looked more of an enchantress than when simply attired in a plain white muslin dress with forget-me-nots at her throat and in her hair; her age was a topic of dispute among all the gossips; sometimes she looked less than twenty, at other times she appeared so mature and displayed such wisdom that superstitious persons were wont to declare that her father was a wizard who had lived through centuries, and his daughter a woman of extreme age, whose youth had been miraculously preserved by means of the fabled elixir vitæ of the alchemists. Such conjectures were, however, rumors without the slightest foundation, save to this extent, that the professor, at sixty, was more youthful and vigorous than any young man of his acquaintance, in every respect; while Heloise, though a very young woman in years, was, indeed, wiser than gray-haired sages, and possessed of such exuberant vitality and marvelous recuperative ability that a strain upon her strength, which would have prostrated any ordinary young woman (even the strongest), had scarcely a moment's effect on her most extraordinary but thoroughly natural temperament.

Physiologists and others talk a great deal of nervous, bilious and sanguine temperaments, but completely ignore the electric temperament; therefore, they utterly fail to account for the marvellous powers of endurance and recuperation displayed by many persons of fragile frames; for not understanding human electricity, they can assign no adequate reason for the presence of the spleen in the human anatomy, nor can they declare its functions with any degree of definiteness. In this respect, as in many others, popular tradition is ahead of schooled ignorance, and thus we have such words as spleeny and spleenish in our commonest vernacular, and these words are rightly applied even by the most illiterate persons. Whenever people are constantly losing their temper or moderating force, and find difficulty in returning to an equilibrated condition, it is on account of electrical disturbance in the system. These electric storms in the human organism are invariably brought about by some mental discord; thus, persons who practise "mind cure" are generally right in their premises, though sometimes faulty in their methods and unsuccessful in their attempts, owing to their ignorance of the means whereby electrical disturbances can be overcome and prevented for the future.

Mrs. Kittenscomb had "seen trouble," her affections were quickly aroused and easily wounded; she had loved her husband, and he had been very good to her according to his light, but he never fully met the intense demands of her acutely sensitive nature, which demanded understanding and responsive love. Mr. Kittenscomb loved his wife, but he did not fathom the depths of her nature; he was a kind, liberal-minded man, but lacked in penetration as well as in executive ability. Since his passing away, his widow had been left to the care of Miss Priscilla Newmanhoff, who was of Anglo-

German parentage, and though very religious, by no means a comprehensive or comprehending woman; she understood neither Mrs. Kittenscomb nor Alicia; she was an efficient governess and a faithful companion, if one needs nothing beyond a mechanically accurate discharge of perfunctory duties in a perfunctory manner; but in her hands the two gentle, loving creatures who stood in need of what she could neither supply nor appreciate, fared badly indeed. Professor de Montmarte had not talked with his visitor two minutes before he knew exactly what ailed her, and told her plainly before all his guests that all she needed was a complete change of environment during her convalesence, which would be rapid if the necessary conditions were complied with.

"Make Miss Newmanhoff a handsome allowance and send her to visit her relatives in England or Germany, as she may prefer, and spend three weeks with us; we shall be delighted to have you and Alicia under our roof, but the governess-companion is better off elsewhere; we have no sympathies in common; you and your daughter are in our circle. Did I not discover this by intuition I should not offer to take your case and conduct it to a successful issue. We shall never see justice done to the ailing until physicians acknowledge the law of adaptability; bunglers with drugs and minerals kill more than they cure, but poor fellows, they are oftener blind than culpable; still a degree of responsibility does attach to a man or woman who undertakes a case, and holds out promise of benefit to the patient, when he or she feels no assurance whatever that the treatment will prove advantageous. Oh! for the blessed time (now rapidly approaching) when selfish greed and the hard, bitter struggle for the necessaries of material existence will no longer veil man's moral insight and stupefy his intellect so that self-interest instead of philanthropy controls the relations of man with man; but moralizing aside, to come directly to our point, you, my dear madam, are what people facetiously call 'a bundle of nerves,' you are a martyr to neuralgia, and what is neuralgia but nervousness? From the Greek neuros, nerves, we get the English word neuralgia.

"Neuralgic affections are often called toothache when pain is felt acutely in the face; spinal complaint when the seat of suffering is in the back; liver complaint when the right side is painful, and heart disease when the trouble is with the left side. All such designations are evidence to me that people learn nothing by symptomatic indications, their diagnoses are invariably false. I have personally met during the past ten years as many as two hundred persons who have had sound teeth extracted in numbers to cure an affection of the nerves which the dental operation greatly aggravated; while the multitude who are dosed almost if not quite to death for ailments to which they have no tendency—though the statement is made ex officio that they are dangerously ill with such diseases—is growing larger annually, so much so that no honest physician can venture much longer to experiment with the human frame on the basis of a superficial regard for symptoms. As to dishonest doctors, the public are finding out their devices rapidly, and indignantly exposing them. I should probably be denounced by many devoted 'Christian Scientists' for employing electricity in treatment, but I should care nothing for such denunciation, knowing it proceeded from simple ignorance of electrical action on the human frame.

"Mrs. Eddy I regard as a very useful woman in many ways, but though I am more of a metaphysician in one sense than she is, I do not undertake to make abstract metaphysical statement all-in-all in my practice. I shall give you one remedy and only one; I agree with Marie Corelli, or her preceptor, that there are twelve forms in which this one universal life-giving agent can be applied and manifested, but I should have to enter into zodiacal therapeutics and expound the 'tree of life,' mentioned both in Genesis and the Apocalypse, to make my meaning clear and illustrate my subject, were I to expatiate upon the twelve-fold demonstration. Suffice it to say, that electricity is the unitary manifestation of spirit; only in electric guise is spirit ever revealed, and while electricity is both the "savor of life unto life, and of death unto death,' in electrical therapeutics, the savant invariably works with the constructive current, if he be true to the irreversible commandment of divine law; 'Resist not evil, but overcome evil with good;' the constructive current is, however, transformed into an agent of destruction, when it expels foreign material from the frame, the bacteria concerning which there is, at present, so much glib prating, are driven out never to return, their vacant places never to be reoccupied by similar disturbers of the peace, when the element of life enters in as the superlatively strong man to evict the relatively strong, who is, of necessity, comparatively weak, when contrasted with the stronger. If you ask me how I explain the modus operandi of regeneration, I can only answer in brief that new cells and tissues, all vigorously healthy being formed, the old, decayed cells and tissues are removed by natural expulsion.

"I believe, indeed I will add, I know, that mental treatment can be so given as to be all inclusive, but in such cases, electricity is the agent employed by unseen operators in rebuilding the frame, though, in many instances—probably in most,—quite without the knowledge of the mental therapeutist."

"Excuse my interrupting," broke in Mr. Templeton, who had been an eager listener to the Professor's speech, "but are we to conclude, once for all, that Jesus and the apostles healed by electrical means, and that what you term human electricity issued from the hem of Christ's garment, reaching and healing the woman who had suffered twelve years from a painful malady which baffled all medical skill, and that the same force entered into the handkerchiefs and aprons which, according to the testimony of the Acts, were laid on sick persons, and did this same force extend even to Peter's shadow and permeate the anointing oil recommended by James, when applied by the elders of the primitve church?"

To this the Professor replied:

"I answer unreservedly, yes; but I may possibly take a somewhat different view of some of these narratives to the one you, doubtless, entertain, judging by the style of your interrogations. Now, in the case of the woman first referred to; what did the Great Healer say to her, were not his words on several such occasions, 'Be of good cheer, your faith has made you whole,' or a statement to that effect? Now faith has three distinct elements: first, a sincere disposition toward right; second, confidence in the right perceived; third, open spiritual vision, or unusually keen discernment of principle. To say, 'your faith has made you whole,' is, therefore, equivalent to the declaration, 'you owe your restoration to health to your faithfulness of disposition, your confidence in divine truth, and your spiritual perception of what is needful for your welfare.' Had I the time and opportunity this evening to explain the 'way of salvation' as I understand it, I am sure I could settle your mind with regard to many mooted theological questions, which still embarrass you; I will endeavor, in a very few words, to explain what I understand by salvation.

"The great and holy teacher, Jesus, was in his terrestrial embodiment a perfect human being, radiating constantly an untainted electric emanation; this absolutely healthy life-essence reached out to all receptive minds and drew them to him; in him they found all the assistance they needed to lead them to live a healthy life. But be cautious here, and beware lest you attribute to an emanation from a physical form what originates in the unseen realm of spirit, and only ultimates itself in the perfect human physique. The power exercised by Jesus was a power which delivered from the love of sin; his influence excited an ardent love of righteousness, and led the suppliant for earthly benefit, to seek first the heavenly kingdom of righteousness, following upon the discovery of which, earthly blessings could be fully realized. I am not intending to discuss dogmatic theology, which is often a belligerent as well as a fruitless theme. I am inviting you to glean from the New Testament practical help for daily use; therefore, I emphasize those passages which teach the latent possibilities of every human soul. What think you mean the words so often quoted, 'The works which I do, ye shall do also?' Whoever uttered such a sentence was a true scientist, a genuine teacher of men, one who explained the road along which we all must travel, if we, too, would reach the heights he had already scaled. Some persons were not at all benefitted by personal association with the Christ; the ever execrated Judas Iscariot had been as near the person of his Master as the beloved and ever faithful evangelist John; the people who caused Jesus to marvel at their obstinate incredulity, were as near his body, and could have touched hs garments as readily as those whom it appears were instantly relieved of their infirmities.

"What constitutes the difference between a receptive and a non-receptive state? You may as well ask wherein a closed window differs from an open one. People often open their windows when they wish for light and air; they close and barricade them when they are afraid of breeze and sunshine. We need not go far to find analogies in the field of daily experience. I am invited often to the homes of poor, misguided worldings who offer themselves and children in sacrifice to the moloch of fashion and display. See those unhealthy, wretched women, clad in indecent garments which torture the 'human form divine,' into a hideous caricature of nature; witness the poor, deluded worshippers of the upholsterer's creations, whose sitting-rooms have the odor of tombs, and whose children are pentup in gilded cages, deprived of the rightful freedom of youth, for fear that carpets may be faded or soiled and complexions grow ruddy through exposure to the light and air. Were Jesus on earth to-day, many a 'Christian' woman would be insulted and turn indignantly away, when she found that tight-lacing, foot-pinching and complexion-making were not permissible in 'the church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven.'

"We cannot disobey the law of God made manifest throughout the illimitable field of nature, to gratify the serpent of our lowest instincts without paying the penalty. I would offer the sternest rebuke to those pseudo Christian Scientists who teach the outrageous falsehood that we can become superior to the effect of all external things while we pamper illicit appetites and then presumptuously deny that anything material can affect us; such travesties of gospel teaching need to be scorched with the fire of truthful teaching until they wither into ashes. I grant fully that when people live as the gospel teaches them to live, they cannot be harmed by poisons, serpents or aught else noxious under other conditions, but the impudent lie which affirms immunity from consequence while error is indulged, is the vilest falsification of the gospel ever fabricated by 'mortal mind' in its most ignorant degree of degradation. I do not read in gospel or epistle that any one was ever permanently saved from suffering who was not redeemed from the love of error, and what error is so gross, or affection so degrading as that which enslaves the reason in the chains of carnal appetite and frivolous desire for the world's applause, while in the same breath we are told to ignore all things material and all personal concerns, and trust entirely in Infinite Spirit?

"The absence of the jewel consistency, from any crown, will rob the diadem of all abiding lustre; I do not wish for a moment to speak disparagingly of 'Christian Science,' but I do see rotten timbers in the vessel now launched upon the waves bearing that inscription. But with regard to the handkerchiefs, aprons, shadows and oil to which you have called my attention, I should unhesitatingly pronounce many ancient beliefs decidedly superstitious, and I can readily see how many people in an oriental country would approach spiritual life through the veil of their preconceived ideas and practices. I do not accredit garments, oils or shadows with power to heal the sick, but I do know that there is no shadow without some substance to cast it, while wearing apparel is not, in the cases referred to, valued for its own sake, but solely by reason of its connection with an owner or wearer who inspires confidence and esteem; and the very fact of the oil being ceremoniously administered by persons in high standing among the gnostic brethren of the first century, is to my mind, sufficient proof that these outward things were nothing in themselves, but only serviceable as they enabled very crude and undeveloped intellects to lay hold of a truth whose naked beauty they could not at once discern."

"Still," continued Mr. Templeton, "granting all you say, and I most cordially thank you for your exceeding plainness of speech and clearness of doctrine, is there not, after all, something solid in the claim of the animal magnetist, or certainly in that of the psychologist, mesmerist or electro-biologist to whose instrumentality we undoubtedly owe some cases of complete, and many of partial restoration to health?"

"I do not see," resumed the Professor, "that I need to alter my base, or in the slightest degree vary my position to admit that a healthy state of mind overflows in a torrent of healthy magnetism. I claim always that animal magnetism is not what we should seek for; too often it is most grievously polluted and is not at all an agreeable or a safe thing to handle when in a tainted condition. I put it to you as a reasonable man, does it seem feasible that an unhealthy body should communicate pure vital force to another frame? Of what character and in what condition are the bulk of magnetic healers and those who practice massage? I do not suggest that they are below the average man or woman, but are they above mediocrity in any direction? Anyone can give magnetic treatment, but can anyone heal the sick by laying on of hands? Echo answers no! Now, if we allow that many people whose outward methods are defective, accomplish good because of their goodness of heart and sincerity of purpose, I will agree with you that all schools enjoy a limited amount of success, and in this connection I beg you to note that ninety per cent. of those who heal by such methods are Spiritualists and claim to be mediums. Their own theory then, demolishes belief in what is animal, and lifts the healing gift into a purely psychic realm, where it is made to depend on the intelligent action of unseen human beings.

"Mrs. Richmond, of Chicago,—whose inspired addresses I often read with much pleasure,—though not by any means friendly to certain phases of the Christian or Mental Science movement, takes this latter ground and defends it forcibly. Now, as I cannot deal with pluralities, such as laws and forces, continually without confounding those who come to me for instruction, I bring everything to a point of unity and speak of law and force in the singular. I am often provoked to laughter by the absurd statements of many conceited sciolists who, ignorant of the very first principle, to say nothing of the latest discoveries in chemistry, inform the readers of some small newspapers that because modern chemists tell of somewhere about seventy primates, therefore, nature does not proclaim unity. To such unenlightened dabblers in science, I would like to say that there is not a chemist of any repute on either side of the Atlantic or Pacific who does not maintain that all primates must be ultimately reducible to one absolute primary. This essential primary I maintain, is electricity, which, in its turn, is but the outward garb of pure spirit, itself ever invisible, the unseen cause of all things, known only through its manifestations."

As the conversation proceeded, Mrs. Kittenscomb had fallen into a profound slumber, from which she awoke suddenly after about an hour's enjoyment of most perfect and refreshing rest, exclaiming:

"Oh, I see it all now; I have been grieving for the loss of my husband's body, and now I am to blend my efforts with his in enlarging the sphere of his present ministry. To do this, to co-operate in his endeavors, I must forget self and disembarrass my mind of all concern for material welfare; dear little Alicia, how often have you told me your papa was with you in spirit, and I could not realize it; now I have seen him and he tells me that you must grow up as the flowers grow; I am not to tax you with stated lessons, and oh, he bids me thank you sincerely, kind, good Professor, and you, my lovely young lady, for the blessed offer of a twenty-one days' sojourn in this delightful home. I have not rested for twenty years until this evening; I have slept often for many consecutive hours, often forced into unnatural slumber by poisonous opiates; now I shall recover, I know I shall; I shall live not only for my daughter's sake, but for humanity; we shall travel together carrying tidings of comfort to the sad, pointing the weary to the true fountion of refreshment. Oh, how can we repay you for all your goodness, dear, kind friends? The Bible talks of entertaining angels; we are being entertained by angels, and you are among the fairest heaven has commissioned to abide awhile on this dark globe to draw its erring children nearer to heaven's light."

"My good friend," replied the Professor, "give God the glory; do not extol His humble instruments so highly; it is 'more blessed to give than to receive;' therefore, at present, ours is the greater boon; but as in the march of the cycles, whatever good is given to others returns in blessing to those who gave it forth, never fear that you or we shall not be quits. Now throwing aside all thought of reward, which we do not crave, your presence in our house will add to our pleasure and that of all our guests; your rooms are already in order, if you will remain to-night; should you prefer to sleep one more night in your old quarters, you can prepare to be our guests (remember we take no one to board) by one o'clock to-morrow. I know you would say that I am a physician and you will insist on paying my fees; I am nothing of that kind; my income is ample and derived from other sources. You are Azoriel's guests, as such we rejoice to be privileged to entertain you. Now let us consider this matter settled and adjourn to the music-room, where my daughter and her friend, Miss O'Shannon, will give us some delightful music."

The party having assembled near the organ and piano, the two young ladies took their seats, each at her respective instrument. Heloise's masterly manipulation of the great organ whose jubilant and plaintive strains alternately rose and sobbed through the spacious apartment, was greatly enhanced by the sweet, sympathetic responses and blendings of harmony, which issued from the superb piano whose keyboard Lydia Shannon's gentle fingers swept with all the skill of an accomplished master's hand. At last their voices rose together in a faultless rendition of the beautiful hymn, "Holiest breathe an evening blessing, ere repose our eyelids seal."

The singular charm of these renditions was that the extempore melodies were played and sung together in as perfect accord by the two performers as though they had practised for days together to insure perfection. A power greater than practice made practice in their case unnecessary. The Baroness and the Kittenscombs bade their adieux shortly before midnight, and silence once more wrapped "The Palms" in its embrace."

CHAPTER XVII.

KNOWLEDGE APPLIED, OR POWER IN ACTION.

"Even so would I act,
That, when this life is o'er,
I may face up its fact
Upon th' eternal shore,
Without a conscious blush
For duty left undone—
Without a tearful sigh
For battles yet unwon.
Even so would I rise
Beyond this fading sphere
Into the cloudless light
Of heaven's pure atmosphere."

A period of unexampled profit and pleasure had drawn to an end for our friends so delightfully domiciled at "The Palms." During that time no one was perhaps so greatly benefited as Mrs. Kittenscomb, who had completely recovered all her original buoyancy of spirits and frame, and more than her former love of life and keen appreciation of the beautiful, under Prof. de Montmarte's spiritual electric treatment.

Miss Newmanhoff had departed in tearful dudgeon, and yet with secret joy, to spend six weeks or longer with relatives in Germany. That pious, but bigoted, lady had been once to "The Palms," on the occasion of her kind employer's removal thither. Impressed though she was, and that forcibly, by the sumptuous magnificence she oberved there, and particularly fascinated by the perfect and charming courtesy of Heloise, she still remained firm in her impression (poor benighted creature that she was, in spite of her piety) that to attempt to heal the sick, except in accordance with the stereotyped methods of fossilized medical colleges, was to fly in the face of Providence, and call down a curse on all who dabbled in the "black art," as this Christian-heathen blindly, but blasphemously styled the method advocated in the New Testament on the highest conceivable authority.

"Beware of the wiles of the devil, Satan is appearing to you in masquerade; you think him an angel of light, while he is the prince of darkness. Oh, my dear, dear lady, beware how you imperil the interests of your immortal soul, as you vainly strive to revivify your poor fleshly body in a manner forbidden by the Almighty!" remonstrated Miss Newmanhoff.

"My good friend," responded Mrs. Kittenscomb, "you have most strangely misconceived the situation. What you term 'forbidden of God,' I maintain is expressly commanded in the gospel. I must say the electric agency employed is new to me, but there is the only point of difference I can see between the apostolic mode of healing and the system practiced by Professor de Montmarte; but you, who believe in medicine and consult physicians, cannot be unaware that the highest medical talent of to-day favors in some form electric usage. I am not sufficiently well informed on the nature and application of electricity to venture anything of an opinion on its curative efficacy; but, when it comes to the purely spiritual power of the Professor's treatment, a glance at your Bible ought to convince you that regular physicians (not metaphysicians) are advocating practicing what no prophet nor apostle, nor Christ himself, ever sanctioned. If your view of the case is the scriptural one who among the sacred writers endorse it? From a child I have been a Bible student, and have held many conversations with eminent divines and celebrated physicians attached to the Christian faith on these very matters, and I must say I never received any satisfactory reply from any. My dear husband, in the last sermon he ever preached, uttered the following words which have rung in my memory thousands of times during my illness, when medicine seemed to make me worse rather than better, and no one but Alicia could ever soothe my aching brow or give me a moment's respite.

"In my opinion and that of many of the most distinguished bishops, clergy and laymen of our beloved national church, there is in the present revival of religion in England a cloud, as yet, perhaps, no bigger than a man's hand, arising in the East, betokening a downpour of healing rain, which will revive the gifts of healing exercised in the primitive church. Is it not sadly probable that our present lamentable destitution of spiritual evidences is due to our rigid formalism, coupled with the still greater danger of a devoted mammon worship? I pray God this hopeful prediction may be speedily fulfilled!"

Miss Newmanhoff who well knew by much past experience that augument never convinced Mrs. Kittenscomb when her lamented husband's views were in dispute, wisely refrained from continuing the attack. She, however, firmly persisted in her old way of thinking and remained obstinately deaf to every persuasion and entreaty to investigate this subject for herself.

Persons of her type are better left alone; they are not prepared to digest any different spiritual or mental food from that which they so eagerly relish, and while they entertain erroneous opinions on many points, despite their narrowness and perversity of sentiment, they are often thoroughly conscientiousness people, in whom genuine goodness of disposition more than atones for lack of sympathy with more advanced ideas.

During Mrs. Kittenscomb's residence at "The Palms" she had seen and heard many things almost too wonderful to relate, and as her experiences were many of them private and personal, specially connected with her family affairs, a narration of such would hardly interest the general reader, especially as we have already introduced accounts of phenomena fully as wonderful.

On the 2d of September the party were all sitting in the library, about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, when Zenophon showed extraordinary signs of restlessness; he paced the floor like a fierce animal in captivity, and kept exclaiming:

"Oh, my dear master, nothing shall ever separate us again now we are once more united!"

Professor de Montemarte and Heloise were actively engaged in writing at their respective desks in the spacious apartment, and, being completely absorbed in their work, hardly noticed the boy's singular conduct, which greatly impressed all other members of the company.

Mr. Templeton and Lydia, who had by this time begun talking of their approaching wedding, and who had grown together into an understanding of the various signs which denote mesmeric influence, paused in their conversation about the new life they were to live together to beg of the boy to refuse to permit himself to be controlled by the will of Count Katolowynski, who had that very day arrived in Paris from Southampton, at which point the "Teufelheute" had recently deposited him. Speaking to the lad was evidently quite useless, and he continued to mutter to himself words of submission and endearment coupled with occasional outbursts of sorrow for having ever permitted himself to be torn from the embrace of his only true friend, and the only person on earth to whom he could ever become sincerely and permanently attached, and whose companionship he declared would constitute his heaven in the life beyond. At length, he assumed a defiant attitude, and with hands outstretched in evident malediction toward his kind host and hostess fell on the floor in a deep swoon, trembling violently. At length he became cold as ice and rigid as marble. Shortly his features relaxed and a triumphant, though sinister smile lighted up his marble features; then, reaching out his hand to some form unseen by all save himself, he breathed softly, "Now we are each others for eternity."

In this passive condition he remained till dinner was announced, when he suddenly sprang to his feet, rushed into the garden, and took refuge in the summer-house a favorite haunt of his, whither he often resorted to read, write and paint at leisure.

All save the Montmartes, being painfully struck with the unwelcome change in the boy's manner, were eager to inquire into its cause; but, as it was a law at "The Palms" never to ask questions on personal matters in the presence of servants, even though they were not supposed to comprehend English they impatiently deferred their comments till the meal was over.

A storm had been gathering all day, and the party had scarcely left the table when peals of thunder rent the air, lightning flashed vividly, and rain began to descend in torrents. Fearing Zenophon might be frightened at the storm, Heloise who feared nothing and never caught cold, attired in an appropriate outer garment and encasing her feet in goloshes, ran to the summer house to bring back the boy or keep him company. Weat was her surprise to find Zenophon prostrate on the floor covered with the Count's magnificent traveling coat of Russian sable, the Count meanwhile singing a strange, weird melody which Heloise at once detected as an Indian song of the far-famed serpent-charmers.

As she approached, the Count abruptly ceased singing, and bowing with mock deference said tauntingly: "So, my fair enchantress, I have called you to me as well as my Greek slave. Where is your protector now? I want nothing of you, and you know it; but if you attempt to interfere in the slightest degree with my moving Zenophon forever from your father's house and guardianship, I will strike you dead where you stand, and not a physician on earth but will declare you were struck by lightning."

As he spoke, he drew from his apparel a small magician's wand, in reality an electric contrivance of considerable medical or surgical utility, but a deadly weapon when used with deliberate, foul intent by a desperado. Rising in the majesty of her royal dignity, the imperial girl, whom nothing could daunt, confronted the haughty and vindictive Russian in tones of such stern and positive defiance that for a moment he winced under the lash of her burning words; then stooping over the sleeping form of Zenophon, she addressed him in tones full of kindness, but penetrative with the voice of indubitable authority.

"Awake, thou art forever freed from the tempter's snare." The boy moved restlessly, as though in an uneasy dream, then turned his face in the direction of the Count, who immediately breathed in his nostrils and said:

"Zenophon, you are mine forever; now come with me, and heaven on earth shall be your portion."

The boy rose instantly to obey, when a more vivid flash of forked lightning than any which had yet appeared, illumined the summer-house as though with a blaze of lurid fire; instantly a crash of thunder followed, making the frail building shake as though rocked by an earthquake. The lightning had struck the summer-house and passed directly by the side of the now thoroughly frightened boy; his hair was singed, one of his fingers smarted sharply, and his whole frame quivered with fright and pain; he was not, however, seriously injured; in his terror, he clutched the garments of Heloise, and shook himself free of the Count's touch as though that handsome, but unprincipled nobleman had been the sole cause of his alarm and suffering. Seeing his prey thus escaping from his grasp, the mesmeric trance entirely over and the powers guiding and working through his opponent on the verge of victory; rendered desperate with anger not unmixed with fear, he dared to use brute force to recapture his victim; in seeking to drag the boy from her, he struck Heloise a smart blow on the face, an indignity she had never in her life suffered from anyone.

A scene followed which words are powerless to describe; the noble daughter of old Chaldea rose in the majesty of her more than simply human strength, and with one touch of her finger on the Count's forehead, caused him to fall prostrate on the ground.

"Who is struck by lightning, now?" she queried of the motionless form at her feet; "stir at your deadly peril; Azoriel whom you despise, is mighty in righteous indignation when sinners trample justice and human liberties in the dust; I warn you, should you attempt to touch that boy, or lay a finger on me, your beauty will be withered and your power taken from you, never to be recovered on this side of the grave. Zenophon is now a member of an order into whose sacred precincts such minds as yours can never enter, nor even know of its existence, till purified by bitter suffering, from the veil of error and selfishness which now beclouds them. Live for good, use your gifts for the elevation of humanity, and this shock will but add to your endowments by relieving you of much that has kept you back from the ardent dream of your life; but attempt again to employ vile sorcery to others' detriment, and as surely as justice reigns on High, shall your power be taken from you, and as but a wreck of your former self shall leave this place to-night."

Professor de Montmarte and Mr. Templeton arrived at the spot at the moment Heloise was declaiming justice on the offender; her superb scorn, manifest in every feature of her expressive face and every accent of her ringing voice, made her appear a princess of an ancient temple, calling down vengeance on an unrepentant criminal who sought the destruction of one whom she had sworn to defend from all peril. The Professor though usually so calm, at sight of Count Katolowynski on his premises, evidently bent on mischief, was about to rush upon the intruder and deal with him as he deserved, when in an instant his daughter turned to him with flashing eyes, firmly uttering the words:

"Father, he is Azoriel's prisoner; leave him to a higher power than thine." Then speaking to the Count, she said:

"Go! now and forever, and remember the warning, 'Sin no more lest a worse thing come upon thee.'" Docile as a child, utterly subdued though unrepentant, the humiliated Russian who had bribed servants to effect a clandestine entrance through the Professor's grounds, moved out through the garden in the drenching rain, speechless, amazed, confounded; while Zenophon, already recovered from the shock, said in clear, decided tones:

"Count Katolowynski, farewell forever; you and I can never cross each other's path again." Without a word or single backward glance, the once master of the now completely liberated boy, strode rapidly through the enclosure and out into the storm, to recover as best as he could from a blow which had humbled his pride to the very dust, and deprived him of the only ally he had ever found capable of so fully responding to his will as to furnish him the assistance indispensable to the carrying out of his most treasured schemes for self promotion through the banishment of his fellow countrymen to the awful wilderness of Siberia.

The storm subsided, quickly as it had arisen; the thunder sounded faint and distant, the rain passed off in a quiet shower, and soon ceased altogether; the stars shone forth one by one, like eyes of angels watching the inhabitants of earth; a lovely night set in, made vocal with the songs of nightingales, and perfumed with the breath of countless flowers which always breathe their sweetest fragrance after a grand upheaval of the elements, as though to return thanks to Heaven for deliverance from the tempest, praise to the Power Divine which, through the agency of nature's most dread convulsions, purifies the earth and opens the way for fairer days, providing healthier conditions for all things living.

The two gentlemen, Heloise and Zenophon, returned quietly to the house and related something of their strange adventure to the ladies awaiting them, who were more fascinated than awed by Professor de Montmarte's guarded but accurate recital. As soon as this was ended, Lydia went to the piano, and under a decided and beautiful inspiration, sang that lovely melody "Zion" by Rodney, the refrain of which is—

"After the storm they rest in peace,
Where there shall be no night;
After the toil they find release,
After the darkness light,
Ended life's weary quest,
Never again to roam,
After the strife at rest,
After the wandering home.

The song was hardly finished when the postman brought letters for Mr. Templeton and Mrs. Finchley, bearing the American postmark. Before they were opened, Heloise, who seemed to be in no way injured or upset by her recent encounter, said the moment they were delivered, "Dear friends, we shall miss you all very much indeed, but the time has now arrived when you must recommence your work in your old homes, but for two of you how different, how much larger the scope of the work and how much happiness in each other's company. As you are Americans, and non-Catholics, we have spoken to the American minister and you can be married next Monday morning in the American Chapel, then you must start for home. Dr. Maxwell, who has been closeted with my father, when not shut up in his own room perusing rare manuscripts, during the past three weeks, will prepare you while on the voyage for all you have to undertake when you reach your homes; you will continue to see a great deal of each other, and the fruits of your visit here will be apparent immediately you reach America."

The letters, when opened, were to the following effect: Mrs. Templeton wrote to her son saying the parish was in great need of him, especially as the Rev. V. Mewle was making most unwarrantable attempts to annex the congregation of the Saddlerock church to his own, by dictating to them what pastor they should elect in the event of Mr. Templeton not returning. (Mr. Mewle said privately, Mr. Templeton never would return, as he was "shoveling in more shekels elsewhere"), Mr. Mewle continued to vociferate against every liberal idea, and used his utmost influence to keep back progress in every shape in the community. This honorable and reverend gentleman had a nephew freshly graduated from Yale, whom he desired to see in Mr. Templeton's place, and three-fourths of whose salary he wished to claim on the plea of influence and continued maintenance.

Mr. Mewle was one of the elect that could not err; perfectly sanctified, a conductor of holiness meetings, and an advocate of the hideous heresy that those who had once discovered that they were God's chosen people, could do no wrong, however they might violate every just law of earth as well as heaven. Alas, for the ridiculousness of self-conceit at any time! but deeper woe to those whose spiritual pride and arrogant self-importance lead them to mistake their own insuperable vanity for complete evidence of the Almighty's special interest in their small, mean selves. Mrs. Templeton wrote with a heart full of gratitude, and a mind clearly awake to the benefits her son had undoubtedly received from his sojourn with such truly enlightened friends, first in New York and then in Paris; she was very reluctant to tear him away from such good company, but trusted she might have the pleasure of welcoming Mrs. Finchley and Dr. Maxwell to her humble but pleasant home amid the green hills of Vermont. Though not exactly glad to take a second place in her son's affections in future, she was prepared to welcome his bride with motherly affection, and would vow faithfully never to be that bone of contention in a family a meddling mother-in-law ever is; she was sure Lydia and herself would be the best of friends, and trusted Lydia's mother would reciprocate the feeling she was desirous of extending to the kind-hearted Irishwoman, whom she had seen only once, and then for not over five minutes, amid the hurry of train departure at a junction between Saddlerock and New York. The letter ended with an outline of her own experiences, which were intensely interesting and peculiarly gratifying to her son and daughter-in-law-elect.

Mrs. Finchley's letter contained no very striking news, but an urgent appeal to herself and nephew to return to New York as soon as possible, as the gentleman left in charge of the house and business had been suddenly summoned to return to his parents in Germany, who were in great need of his presence and assistance; he would not leave till Dr. Maxwell returned and relieved him of all obligations; but being a firm believer in Mrs. Finchley's clairvoyant gift, he begged her to advise him what to do, and telegraph a response if there was anything urgent to communicate. Dr. Maxwell at once assented to the idea that their mission of delightful experience in Europe was accomplished for the present; they had seen wonders transcending those of fairy lore, and could take the words Nunc Dimmittis appropriately upon their lips as they wended their homeward way.

Mr. Templeton had most peculiar reasons for gladness and thankfulness; he had emerged completely from under the old shadow which had hung over his life and threatened to entomb him in its embrace; he had secured as his affianced wife, a girl who was hourly developing into his ideal of womanhood, and for whom he entertained no rapturous, fleeting passion, but a deep, earnest love, which with every new day grew holier and more intense. Mrs. Kittenscomb, accompanied by Alicia, was to join the returning party, as the lovely child had seen in her visions an outline of the work she was to fulfill in coming years, and her mother was wishful to escape from the scenes too closely connected with the buried form of her beloved husband, and the influence of relatives who had never understood her.

Professor de Montmarte and Heloise heartily concurred in the arrangement, and wishing all God-speed in their new departure, made unusual efforts to make the closing days of their friends' stay in Paris exceptionably agreeable. Having consummated the special purpose for which they had been brought to "The Palms," there was now nothing to be done but enjoy the beautiful summer scenery and the delights of unalloyed and ever-strengthening friendship. The last Saturday and Sunday in the gay French metropolis were days ever to be remembered as landmarks in their career, veritable openings of the doors of heaven. The opera never seemed so entrancing as on that last evening at the Comique, when Arabella Von der Stael took the Parisians by storm in her superb impersonation of Clarice in "Le Singe de Mon Cœur,' the latest and most amusing creation of the ever enjoyable Oufenstahl.

Monday morning at eleven o'clock, in the American Chapel, the Rev. Clovis Herron of Chicago, made Onesimus Templeton and Lydia O'Shannon man and wife. After the formal ceremony, which was witnessed by only twelve people, the party returned to "The Palms," and there participated in nuptial exercises pertaining to higher spheres of perception than the average mind can grasp.

END OF PART I.

ONESIMUS TEMPLETON.

A PSYCHICAL ROMANCE BY W. J. COLVILLE.

PART II.

CHAPTER I.

HAPPY HOURS IN LONDON.

"Oh, wherefore must we say good-bye
To scenes surpassing bright and fair?
Why should not nature for us all
Forever radiant graces wear?
Does not our life forever tend
To realms of light and joy divine,
Where through unnumbered happy years
We shall in God's own image shine?
Be this the truth; yet still our way
Toward such glad and shining light
Must ever be through duties done,
Till duty turns to sweet delight.
Thus every daily task appears
Lit with the beam of heavenly spheres."

The day for their departure from "The Palms" came all too quickly for the happy party who had spent such an unspeakably happy month beneath the hospitable shelter of that truly magnificent but unspeakably homelike mansion. Onesimus Templeton and Lydia O'Shannon being now man and wife, Dr. Maxwell and Mrs. Finchley being needed at their home, and Zenophon on the high road to success and usefulness as an assistant to the good doctor, there was no valid reason for their longer sojourn in Paris. So the Montmartes, who ever put duty before pleasure, until duty became at length pure delight, with many affectionate and heartfelt adieux speeded the parting as they had welcomed the arriving guests. It was a lovely summer morning—though autumn was fast approaching—when, having taken refreshment at an unusually early hour, they rode to the Gare du Nord to take the train which connects at Calais for the steamer to Dover. Wishing to see something of England, and having a few days to spare, they resolved on visiting London and then returning to America on board one of the magnificent Lloyd steamers which receives passengers at Southampton. Arriving at Dover on a Saturday afternoon they at once took an express to London and reached there about 6 P. M., in ample time to refresh themselves with a good dinner at the Hotel Metropole, and then attend the promenade concert at Covent Garden Opera House. These concerts—which are given nightly on a superb scale during the off season, when, according to "upper tendom," there is "not a soul in town"—present to the great public, consisting of between four and five millions of bodies who cannot get out of town, a most exquisite and varied programme of the choicest vocal and instrumental music for 1 shilling (25 cents). There are higher-priced seats for such as desire to occupy them, but the general admission is only 1 shilling to floor and upper circle, and frequently from three to five thousand persons—sometimes even a larger number—will be present on a single evening. The beautiful Floral Hall, which joins the opera house proper, is opened and beautifully illuminated with fairy lamps and incandescent electric lights, making the whole scene a fairy paradise.

The concerts begin soon after 8, and seldom conclude much before midnight. The programme is so arranged that people go in and out all through the performance and promenade constantly without causing the slightest interruption, except when some fine soloist is performing. Then a complete hush falls over the vast throng; promenaders gather round the band stand, and when the solo ends, a burst of applause rises almost sufficient to shake the building, massive though it be.

Our party, arriving about 8:45, found themselves immediately in the midst of a scene fully as gay and inspiring as any they had witnessed in Paris. The red coats of the Life Guardsmen contrasting brilliantly with the dark attire of civilians, coupled with the numberless hues of the ladies' dresses, cloaks and bonnets, made a grand scene of beauty and variety hard to match in any miscellaneous crowd. The large orchestra in scarlet uniforms, sitting in an embowered enclosure around which tropical plants blossomed in all their native luxuriance, made the raised stand a pleasing cynosure of all eyes; while standing in front of the musicians (most of them singularly fine and handsome men) stood a petite girlish figure dressed in snowy muslin, the very beau ideal of an artist's dream of innocent grace and loveliness. This charming young songstress was none other than the seraphic Signorina Lavinia Maria Ferranita, who for one season only delighted the British public with a voice and style of unexampled purity and sweetness, and then passed out of the musical sky like a comet whose destination is beyond the orbit of human vision.

This delightful young cantatrice was warbling in the purest Italian that gem from "Faust," Le Parlate d'Amor, so deservedly a favorite selection all over the world. On her lips every syllable was a pearl. Her delicate throat and bosom heaved with deep natural emotion as she sang the touching words in the beautiful tongue of her lovely native land. When she finished singing, the house, breathless while she sang, literally rose to its feet and pelted her with flowers. Compelled to respond to a deafening encore, she rendered in pure English, rendered all the more attractive by reason of her piquante Italian accent, Karl Ambruster's majestic yet pathetic ballad, "The Silver Shield." As she came to the words

"If we but knew What hearts are false, what hearts are true," the vibratory quality of her rich, penetrating tones pierced to the very roof of the building and rang out into the corridors, as though some angelic soul, awhile embodied on earth, were petitioning heaven to endow a blind, often misguided race, with such penetration as would enable truth, here and now, to triumph once for all over dethroned and vanquished error, falsehood and wrong. Every one was moved (many to tears), and the recall which followed came unmistakably from the hearts' depths of the vast concourse of men and women, most if not all of whom doubtless felt somewhere in their inner natures an intense longing, which no words could voice, to know absolutely how far they could dare to trust some one to whom their affections went out, but of whose sincerity they were at times, at least, painfully in doubt.

The sweet, modest figure returned and bowed gracefully, as Italia's daughters only can bow; but, after this recognition of the plaudits of the multitude, no amount of noise and clamor could bring the lovely Signorina again before the audience. When asked in private why she never responded to more than one encore, she answered: "Singing does not fatigue me more than it does the birds who sing nearly all day. But the programme is long. There are a number of my fellow-artists to appear, and I have no right to take their time so that when they come on the audience will be tired and about to leave." This true, womanly sentiment of regard for others marked all her conduct. No one could accuse her of the slightest tinge of jealousy. She gloried in the triumphs of others, and was pained at their defeat.

One evening, when a timid little English girl had been treated coldly by a supercilious mob, and had retired sobbing to her dressing-room, almost heart-broken at the rude repulse and overwhelmed with grief at the manager's refusal to re-engage her (she was a true and conscientious artist, had an aged mother and crippled sister to support, and no other means of livelihood), Signorina Ferranita, who had made a success that night enough to turn the heads of all the maidens in the United Kingdom, threw herself at the manager's feet with a passionate outburst of woe, crying, "Oh, you cruel man! If you send away Miss Carrol you will break my heart." Then, addressing the wounded song-bird in her most caressing accents, said, "Darling, you and I shall triumph together before the end of this evening's concert. I am down to sing again, and when they call me back you and I will respond together and sing that lovely duet, "Maying," by Gounod, which we practiced for Lady Ambleside's soiree at her house last week. "Oh, I could never face those people again! They are too dreadful," wailed poor little Miss Carrol. "But with me, whom they love, you will feel quite safe," exclaimed the prima donna. "Now, remember, they call me 'La reina asoluta,' and absolute monarchs insist on their commands being obeyed. Now, la reina commands you to sing with her to-night, and she will not be disobeyed."

When the fair young Italian next appeared on the stage, the house which had frozen Miss Carrol greeted its bright particular star with such thunders of enthusiasm that the accompanist had to stop and the fair debutante to bow repeatedly before she was allowed to proceed. Her selection was a long and very difficult selection from Traviata, in which she struck high C thrice. This feat capped the climax of all former efforts. The audience became frantic with delight, and when, after an absence of at least three minutes, she returned, leading Miss Carrol by the hand, and the pianist sounded the prelude to the forthcoming duet, a perfect shout went up from the vast assembly. In the very height of her triumph, tears raining down her cheeks, she publicly embraced her young friend (older by two years than herself), and as their voices rose and fell together the rich soprano of the one and deep contralto of the other blended so harmoniously as to move to penitence and contrition the very cruelest of the brutes who had hissed when an hour earlier a few good-natured people had tried to get up an encore to encourage the shrinking little Englishwoman.

In Miss Carrol's interest Signorina Ferranita gladly waived her ordinarily inflexible rule never to return and sing twice after any selection, and tripped back joyfully with her arm around Miss Carrol's waist, and as nothing else in the way of a duet had been rehearsed between them, they gave Glover's grand old composition, "What Are the Wild Waves Saying?" in a manner to win for that good old favorite a higher reputation than it had ever known before. Miss Carrol's reputation was by this time thoroughly made. The manager, who had just before threatened her with discourteous dismissal, now craved her pardon humbly on his knees, and to show the sincerity of his conversion, there and then doubled her salary and signed a contract with her for the remainder of the season, which Signorina Ferranita witnessed in due form.

Hearing this beautiful and touching story of the charming songstress from an elderly gentleman in the Floral Hall during an intermission, Dr. Maxwell expressed an earnest desire to be introduced to this truly noble and selfless girl who cared more for a stranger's welfare than for any honors lavished on herself. He at once received the answer that she allowed no gentlemen to be presented to her, except through Lady Ambleside, whose guest she was and at whose place in Croydon she was then staying. Dr. Maxwell, being a thorough gentleman, respected her still the more highly for taking so wise a precaution against the formation of undesirable acquaintances, and frankly said to the elderly nobleman with whom he was speaking (his companion was none other than Lord Ambleside, though he was not aware of it).

"I should not think of pressing myself on any lady whose true womanliness prompts her to thus protect herself against intrusions which I have reason to fear are not altogether unwelcome to many stage favorites; however, as my aunt and a young married lady who is with her are both fully as anxious as myself to form Signorina Ferranita's acquaintance, she may, perhaps, be willing to allow the two ladies to enjoy a moment's interview. Do you know any one who might be willing to introduce them?"

"I will do so myself most gladly, and you too, my dear sir. I know before I have exchanged six sentences with a man on the subject of a young lady what sort of a fellow he is. You, sir, are a gentleman, every inch of you. I would trust my daughter over the world in your care, and that's not too much to say, though I have known you only ten minutes."

"I cannot sufficiently express my gratitude for your high opinion, but can in all modesty assure you your confidence will never be misplaced, if ever you honor me with any delicate commission. But I fear we shall not see much of each other, as I and my friends are returning to New York on Tuesday, and when we shall be next in England I have no idea. I am a physician, and cannot easily leave my home practice frequently; just now I am returning from Paris, where duty more than pleasure called me to make a brief but most delightful and profitable visit. Many people think Paris holds few save the ultra-frivolous; but it has been my good fortune to find in that gay city the best friends and most distinguished scientists I have encountered anywhere."

"I am somewhat acquainted in Paris myself," continued Lord Ambleside; "do you know a Professor de Montmarte, a wonderful man with (if possible) a yet more wonderful daughter? They live in a gorgeous place with an English name; he is the greatest electrician in Europe, if report speaks truly. They live very quietly, in spite of all their wealth, and are very little known outside a small circle of immediate friends. Madamoiselle de Montmarte has been the sole instructor of Signorina Ferranita. I have tried to coax the young lady, who bears the romantic name of Heloise, to visit England, but she won't leave France except for Italy, and her father is probably as obstinate, though in his younger days he was a great traveler, and has, I believe, spent some time in Syria."

"Why, we have all come from 'The Palms' this very morning. We have been the honored guests of the Montmartes for the past few weeks. It is indeed a pleasure to meet one who knows our dearest friends and benefactors. My name is Maxwell; you may have heard the Professor speak of me. I know he talks about me when my back is turned, and I cannot help it," laughed the doctor, merrily, knowing how flattering were Professor de Montmarte's expressions concerning him.

"Are you Dr. Maxwell, Mrs. Finchley's nephew? Well, I am delighted to meet you! Indeed, I have heard about you. Well, the cat's out of the bag now; I'm Lord Ambleside, my wife is Signorina Ferranita's chaperone. Come now, call your ladies, and as the concert is nearly over and our carriage is waiting, be presented to la reina, as we all call her, and then come out to-morrow afternoon to Croydon and dine with us quietly en famille. We must get acquainted. How sorry I am you must leave London so soon! Can't you defer your voyage a week? Croydon is very pleasant at this season; we have a big house and hardly anybody in it till November, and we can accommodate a regiment if necessary."

Thanking the whole-souled peer of the realm for his cordial offer of hospitality, which he was compelled, though regretfully, to decline, Dr. Maxwell led his new friend to his aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Templeton, and Zenophon, who were in a group listening to a fine Wagnerian selection by the band. After the introduction, which in this case was quite informal, Lord Ambleside, with a kindly "delighted to meet you all," conducted the party of five to his young "lioness," who was just then adjusting her cloak and hat in readiness for departure. Off the stage she appeared small and quite fragile. People were often heard to remark, "How is it possible such a little body can give out such a volume of tone!" But, immediately she smiled and displayed delighted animation at meeting people who knew and loved the preceptress whom she almst idolized, Dr. Maxwell at once detected the infallible signs of well nigh perfect health, which are ever present in a thoroughly electrified organism, no matter how frail its build may appear to be.

In private, this latest idol of the British concert-going public was a simple but charming and highly intelligent Italian maiden, speaking English with a piquante foreign accent, which greatly heightened the charm of the Anglo-Saxon tongue. No one thus meeting her could have connected her in thought with the distinguished heroine of a great opera house, whose praises were sounded by all the newspapers without an exception, Lionized by the public, caressed by the nobility, this child of nineteen summers had lost nothing of the gentle, unassuming sweetness which characterized her every movement when her voice led the maiden choir in the chapel of Santa Cecilia, attached to the great cathedral at Milan, where first her lovely voice, then very inferior to its present excellence, had attracted the ear of Heloise, who was assisting at evening devotions one beautiful night during the November of the previous year.

Adding her petition to that of Lord Ambleside, that they should all dine together at 5 P. M. the following day, the charming cantatrice waved her hand in graceful adieu as she entered the carriage bound for Croydon, while Dr. Maxwell and his party returned on foot to the Metropole, where they had engaged delightful rooms at a very reasonable figure, and meals on the wise European plan of paying for what you eat when you eat it, instead of following the American practice of paying a fixed rate for board, as well as room, which usually means paying for five meals a day if you eat three, as three are charged for at the hotel anyway, and you generally eat one there and two in other parts of the city, or its environs.

London grows instantly quiet on Saturday night directly the bell on St. Paul's tolls the hour of 12. As though by magic the previous noise and bustle ends, and Sabbath quietude commences its not unwelcome reign over the weary city and its teeming populace. Of course, one hears the rumble of carriage wheels in the streets more or less all night, if one is awake to hear it, but by comparison with other times, Saturday night ushers in an era of unbroken calm, though excursion trains and an enlarged omnibus and tram-car service are making constant inroads upon the time-honored custom of resting practically, as well as in theory, one day out of every seven.

A good English hotel, with a French name, is apt to be very comfortable, and none we know of is more so than the Metropole, which is very conveniently and centrally situated near to the proverbial "everything"—a word which bunches together churches, theatres, concert halls, shops, railway stations, etc., ad libitum, in one comprehensive word elastic enough to be both a noun and an adverb, to suit existing circumstances.

Rising about 9 A. M. on Sunday, our friends assembled for breakfast a little before 10, and over their coffee discussed their church plan for the morning. Perusing a long list of services printed in the journals of the day previous, Dr. Maxwell and Mr. Templeton were struck by the announcement of a familiar name, as their eyes rested on the order of services at Clarendon Square Chapel (Free Church), "Martindale Fischer-Bennett will preach at 11 A. M. on 'Babylon and its Downfall in the Present Era.' Strangers cordially invited."

"Let us go and hear him by all means," said the doctor; "why, he must be the very radical son of the very conservative father, who was your father's successor and your predecessor at Saddlerock, Onesimus—but what say the ladies?"

"Oh, let's go, certainly," assented Mrs. Finchley and Mrs. Templeton, in a breath.

Chapter II.

WHAT IS THE MODERN BABYLON?

"How long, O Lord shall waiting souls
Wait on to see the promised day?
How long shall thine own image grieve
While pent within these walls of clay?
O hasten, Lord, the glorious hour
That bids all doubt and error flee Revealing truth in all its might
And drawing man more close to Thee."

Zenophon, who greatly preferred a Catholic service, was "dropped" at the door of a large Catholic church near by, where the worshipers were assembling for high mass, as the others made their way to the inviting, but unpretending, chapel, where Mr. (not the Rev.) Fischer-Bennett officiated. It not being the full season, the chapel was considerably less than full when the four new-comers entered, and were conducted to a gallery pew exactly facing the pulpit, the regular occupants of which were then at Brighton. Arriving five minutes before 11, they had ample time to observe the building and its appointments before the service opened, and though nothing of an imposing character met their gaze, they were all struck with the exceedingly neat simplicity of the whole. The chapel was evidently not a new building; it had probably never been remodeled to any great extent since its erection, as far as architectural design; but the fine organ, which faced the congregation and reached from the floor almost to the ceiling between the galleries and behind the pulpit, as well as the handsome open pews of polished oak, fitted with blue cushions, were recent additions or improvements. The walls were tinted a pale blue; the old-fashioned square windows were scrupulously clean, those on the south side (the chapel fronted west) were screened with blue shades, those on the north side were open, admitting plenty of fresh, cool air, but not creating a draught. As soon as these details had been digested and another hundred people or so had gathered on the ground floor, and about fifty more in the three galleries, swelling the entire congregation to a total af about 350 (the chapel could seat 1,000, if necessary), the organ pealed forth a grand voluntary, as exactly on the stroke of 11 the minister ascended the staircase of the handsome, rather high, walnut wood pulpit, which exactly faced the gallery, in the front of which our friends were sitting.

Mr. Martindale Fischer-Bennett (who always signed his full name) was a young man about 30, with an earnest countenance, fresh complexion, clear blue eyes and chestnut hair. Decision marked his every motion, though his views on many topics were regarded as altogether too indefinite by many who had attended the chapel during the pastorate of the much more orthodox Rev. Hiram Oldenwheel, whom Mr. Bennett had succeeded.

As the voluntary ceased, the music changed into another key, and the choir sang in good time and tune an anthem from the service book, which bore the title, "Common Prayer, revised for the use of unsectarian congregations, with a preface by Martindale Fischer-Bennett." This book contained most of the essential portions of the Church of England liturgy, though much of the phraseology and doctrinal teaching was largely altered, and in the morning service many parts of the original service were entirely omitted. The service throughout was bright and impressively rendered, the music of the "Te Deum" and "Jubilate" was really fine; the hymns sung were from Dr. Martineau's Collection, though Clarendon Square Chapel never would allow itself to be called Unitarian, despite the fact that the Unitarians as a body insisted that the difference in theology was like a controversial tweedledum and tweedledee. As may be expected from the subject announced Mr. Bennett's sermon was not an ordinary one. As late-comers are the rule rather than the exception everywhere, the audience reached 470 when the text of the discourse was given out: "And a strong angel took up a stone, as it were a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying: Thus with a mighty fall shall Babylon, the great city, be cast down, and shall be found no more at all." Rev. XVIII. 21, (revised version.)

"Probably all my hearers," commenced Mr Bennett, "are familiar with the oft-reiterated protests against the iniquities of the Church of Rome which many preachers base on this prophecy; but with these worn theological acrimonies I wish to have nothing to do this morning. I consider Babylon the monopolistic, competitive system now prevalent all over the civilized world, and from a strong text which has long been handled by protestant fire brands to denounce Roman Catholic persecutors I shall aim to extract a new and universal lesson, peculiarly appropriate at present, as we must all be feeling more or less distinctly the convulsive throes antedating a social eruption which promises to accomplish more than any previous upheaval recorded in history. I unhesitatingly affirm that unless a peaceable reconstruction of the industrial fabric is completed within the next 50 years at most, the streets of our great English cities will run with blood and the case will not be much, if any, better in America. Compromises and concessions cannot stave off the impending crisis much longer; it will soon be found impossible to bolster up the decayed and antiquated structure of our present system, which needs not razing to the ground through the ferocious attacks of anarchy, but abandoning, as the masses betake themselves to a new and healthy building adapted to their ever growing needs. The angel who will accomplish the destruction of our modern Babylon will be the angel-side of our really good but terribly maligned human nature, and as this angel-element in humanity is evoked and encouraged to build a New Jerusalem on earth, so will the Babylon of selfishness be destroyed by the co-operative industries of a harmoniously unselfish people. I am no agitator of the alarmist type; I consider it my sole mission to point to righteousness, and seek to foster the better and truer side of those to whom I can appeal; but not wishing to cry peace when war is imminent, I raise a cry from this pulpit from week to week not to induce hot-headed fanatics to attack monopolists, but to urge intelligent workingmen and women to club together for mutual work and welfare."

In the course of his remarks,—during which he often became glowingly though not feverishly excited,—Mr. Bennett mapped out an entirely new order of affairs, which, though utterly at variance with most existing opinions, he declared would be rendered actual on both sides of the Atlantic during the next half century. As they were leaving the chapel the comments they heard passed upon the sermon greatly interested our party. To the majority of working men of the mildly radical type Mr. Fischer-Bennett was a hero whom they wanted to get into Parliament. To the smaller tradespeople, many of whom attended his chapel, he was "a mighty fine gentleman, but very deep in his harguments." To most young men of progressive ideas he was "a live preacher, wide-awake; none of your drones, don't you know." To the orthodox frequenters of other chapels in the neighborhood, he was "a stray sheep—worse, a false shepherd"; while Mr. Mule-herd, the Baptist preacher on the opposite side of the square called him "a man of sin," on a Sunday evening, in a sermon to young men concerning the Devil, with whom he seemed on very familiar terms, and to whom many people ventured to assert he showed a slight family resemblance. Mr. Templeton was completely carried away with Mr. Bennett's forcible delivery and advanced sentiments, and was on the point of presenting himself at the vestry door, when Mr. Bennett himself walked up to them (they were standing just outside the entrance waiting for Zenophon to join them), and with a very gracious bow and pleasant smile, said:

"I see you are strangers in this neighborhood. Is there anything I can do for you, or any place to which I can direct you? You, sir (addressing Mr. Templeton), are a minister, I see, by the cut of your cloth. I hope our service was not too dreadfully heretical in your eyes. The Congregational Union refuses fellowship with us entirely, though it has many members who share my views exactly. And as to the Methodists and Baptists, they think we are too shocking to be mentioned without a shudder. Among Broad Church clergymen I have several colleagues in general home missionary work. The Unitarians are anxious to claim us, but I can't be other than unsectarian myself; and, if a free church, in the fullest sense of the word, is not an institution which can live in London, well, there are other fields opening to me."

Your case seems very much like my own," responded Mr. Templeton. "I am—as you will probably know from my accent if not from my appearance—an American; and, if I am not mistaken, you are the son of the Fischer-Bennetts with whom my boyhood days were spent in Saddlerock, Vermont."

"What! are you Onesimus Templeton, the quiet, studious, diligent, thoroughly orthodox and correct boy, of whom my parents used to write to me so often? How comes it, then, that you also are so much of a heretic? I think it must be that we are living in days of new wine, when an imperative necessity is felt for new bottles among all thinking people, for the old bottles are exploding so rapidly and disastrously under the pressure of the fermentation of new wine. Cannot you come home with me to lunch, all of you? My sister, who keeps house for me, is at Brighton, with the hirers of the pew you occupied this morning. Being quite alone for the next, as I have been for the past three weeks, I have taken up my abode at the Metropole, where the cuisine is excellent."

"The very place we are stopping at!" exclaimed Dr. Maxwell. "Oh! here is Zenophon, just from mass at St. Gabriel's. We will now all go together and refresh the inner and outer man at our inn with good food, and, I hope, still better conversation, Let's have dinner together in our private sitting room; and, as you are only one and we are five, you cannot refuse to be our guest."

"In these circumstances," genially assented Mr.Bennett, "as I see you desire it, I will accept your offer to-day with the distinct understanding that I can reciprocate to-morrow."

"Well, we have so much to discuss between us all, I dare say," broke in Mr. Templeton, "we can well afford to waive matters of ceremony and proceed at once to the subjects of greatest interest to us all alike."

"Before we talk about anything, I insist on ordering lunch," persisted Dr. Maxwell, when they had reached the hotel. "Now, aunt, you do the honors of the table, just as when we are at home. Here is the menu. Make your own selections, and I will tell the waiter we want luncheon at once."

CHAPTER III.

"HOME SWEET HOME."

"Oh, call it not a foolish dream,
That aspiration of my heart,
Which leads me to diviner things
And bids me try a higher art.
Say, are there not deep meanings yet
To be discovered in God's law?
And who shall dare to claim that he
The whole at any time can draw?
Truth is my solace and my goal,
And will be while the ages roll."

Luncheon always proves a very pleasant meal when partaken of in good company, and on Sundays in England, where it is customary to dine early on that day, the midday meal is usually a very pleasant time for meeting friends and enjoying the pleasures of hospitality. Half past three or four p. m. is a fashionable time for attending a second church service, though many people spend the afternoon quietly at home and go to evening service at 7. Mr. Fischer-Bennett's chapel was closed in the afternoon, though during the greater part of the year the Sunday-school met in the school-room from 2.30 till 4, but this did not resume its sessions till the month following, so his time was quite his own till the hour arrived for evening service.

As they rose from the table, and all who were going to Croydon began to make preparations to catch the 3.45 train, Mr. Bennett proposed escorting them to Victoria station, if they felt they had time to walk.

Cabs are cheap in London, which is one of the most convenient features of the city; you can at any time hire a comfortable conveyance for two persons and ride a long distance for one shilling; if the distance is beyond the shilling limit, the fare is one shilling and six pence, or thirty-seven and a half cents American money, and that sum will almost invariably carry any two persons to any terminus or place of public resort, if their quarters in town are in any way central. Notwithstanding this fact, and the innumerable omnibuses, and great facilities offered by the underground railways, pedestrianism is quite a feature of London life, and to this fact alone the uniformly superior health of the population may be safely attributed.

Mr. Fischer-Bennett was a very practical religionist. He attached sufficient, but not extravagant, importance to religious exercises. His chief desire, however, was to help people to live more nearly to nature, and thus develop a healthy and hardy manhood and womanhood, without which he declared pietism degenerated into sickly sentiment, which instead of ennobling, enfeebled character.

Mr. Templeton was greatly pleased with Mr. Bennett's frank convictions and vital interest in every leading question of the day; but when more spiritual themes were broached, Dr. Maxwell felt inclined to chide him gently for displaying so much incredulity.

As they walked through the delightful district which lies between the Hotel Metropole and the Victoria Terminus, they conversed upon the marvelous phenomena of Spiritualism and the singular tenents of Theosophy, in which Mr. Bennett displayed a certain intellectual interest, as becomes a student and a scholar, but it was clear to see that his affectional nature was not at all touched by the sentimental side of Spiritualism, nor was his intellect enamored of the mysteries of Hindu occultism. He was a man fitted to lead in all social questions, but his spiritual insight was not particularly keen. As the conversation glided from one topic to another, Mr. Voysey's utterances on Spiritualism became for a few moments the subject of discussion, Dr. Maxwell thought them shallow and unworthy of a man in any sense great. Mr. Bennett considered Mr. Voysey's position quite tenable, and failed to see how M. A. Oxon, and other distinguished Spiritualists who had replied in "Light," had met the case.

"Still," said Mr. Bennet, "I am not a scoffer, all I want is truth; and, if any of you who believe more than I at present can, are able to convince my understanding, I shall only be too happy to listen to all you have to say and to carefully observe all you have to present to my senses and my reason.

"As to your experiences in Paris, I can say nothing. Such things are quite beyond my ken, and while they may be true, pardon me for suggesting they may not be true; but if, as you say, Professor de Montmarte and his daughter are to be reckoned among the most exemplary people you have ever met, I can scarcely let incredulity swing over to the extreme of credulity, and believe evil of others without the slightest foundation. The cures you report to me are the most wonderful of all. We hear of nothing like them in London. There are, indeed, many alleged cases of healing by mesmeric and magnetic means, but they are mostly of a dubious character; and, by the way, I was introduced to a lady, recently from Chicago, the other day, a Miss Dominus, a particularly intelligent woman, with a frank, serious face and great command of excellent language. She is the guest of Lady Steepleheight, and is teaching what she calls Christian Science. I shall avail myself of the first opportunity to listen to some of her instructions. I am convinced she is honest, and that is saying a great deal now-a-days, when we meet so many charlatans who are making money and position everything, and shamelessly sacrificing principle in every conceivable manner to exalt their personal caprices. Miss Dominus teaches gratuitously, which is remarkable, and, unless she had some private means, would, I should think, be impossible. And, by the way, there is a Mrs. Catsleigh here; she arrived only yesterday from New York—a decidedly stagy woman, traveling with a fellow who must have been at some time a theatrical agent, where bounce goes further than breeding. Monsieur Alphonse de Kabriet influenced me against the whole affair. He was so persistent that I should spend five pounds for a ticket admitting to one course of twelve lessons, that I plainly told him such prices would not succeed in England, upon which he rudely asked me if I thought people could live on air, and whether preachers weren't paid higher than anybody else. I refused to parley with him, and decidedly declined the ticket. He left me, muttering, 'stingy cuss,' and that was the last I saw of him. His diamonds were blinding, and Mrs. Catsleigh at dinner looked like a second-rate star in the role 'Camille'—a woman too stout to look the part, but determined to act it, nevertheless. Her manners are very taking, and she is a fluent talker, but the box-office air about both of them (the agent in particular) repulsed not only me, but several whom they have been trying to bring into their classes. They are staying at the Owlshead Hotel, three streets from the Metropole.

As time was passing rapidly and nearing train time, their conversation was abruptly terminated at the station gates.

The party for Croydon had just time to secure tickets and seat themselves in a comfortable compartment before the train started. A few miles delightful riding brought them to Croydon, where they found everything in readiness for their welcome reception, Lord and Lady Ambleside being delighted to receive and entertain them. Lord Ambleside has already been introduced to our readers. His wife impressed all who met her in a friendly manner, as a woman of unusual intellect, self-reliance and strength of character—a trifle masculine, perhaps, but, for all that, possessed of a sweet, womanly tenderness of feeling. She could rule with a hand of iron, and quell insubordination with a glance or gesture. Still, she was loved by more than feared her, as her genuine disinterested, intelligent regard for others' welfare stamped her as a noble and true benefactress to all who sincerely sought counsel to aid them to a higher life. The lovely Signorina Ferranita almost idolized her; being an orphan she could not measure the depth of her affection for the stately lady, who had taken her to her capacious heart and home, and was now beginning to cherish the hope, in which her husband fully coincided, that the gifted damsel might prove to her a daughter indeed, by soon becoming the wife of their only son, Lord Currisbrook Clive, provided she could overcome her first scruple against marrying an Englishman and a Protestant.

Sunday dinner at the "Darning Needles," as the Ambleside's Croydon house was named, was a delightful six-o'clock affair, sans ceremonie; it was over before 7, just in time to allow of the fair cantatrice attending vespers at the beautiful church of St. Dominic, which is one of the features of Croydon architecture, and renowned everywhere for its splendid music. Whilst she was absent, the conversation was very much about her—her past and her future. She was an intensely romantic girl, but so conscientious and high-principled that the faintest shade of prevarication in another disgusted her. Kind and generous to the utmost extreme as she had proved in the case of Miss Carroll, and in numberless other instances, she was high-spirited, though very gentle, and so enthusiastic a devotee of art that her profession was to her as sacred as ever his calling can be to the most devoted preacher of the gospel.

About 8 o'clock, while they were chatting together in the peaceful twilight, a servant announced a visitor. In the fading light they did not clearly see who was approaching, but, on distinctly hearing the rattle (we cannot correctly say rustle) of stiff brocaded silk skirts, Lord and Lady Ambleside knew they were once more favored with the never-unwelcome presence of their elderly American friend, Mrs. Fumbling

Cockroach (pronounced Koroche for twenty-seven generations.)

The little lady who had been on the steamer with Dr, Maxwell and his party, (no one except the stewardess had really seen her except at the landing stages at New York and Liverpool) was at least 75, and looked every day of her age. Still, she was an active little body, kept fashionable hours, wore a dark brown wig, dressed in almost juvenile costume, and wished every one to know she was as much in the world as any matron of 40, with marriageable daughters. Spiritualism was Mrs. Cockroach's pet hobby—you could not call it her religion, for she took it more as a pastime than seriously, and enjoyed nothing more than an innocent joke or a harmless bit of gossip with some familiar sprite who entertained her at the strictly private seances in the residences of the nobility, which she was often invited to visit, being a very popular old dame in many quarters.

"My darling Lordship and Ladyship, how glad I am to find you in! I was afraid you might be at church, though I never go in the evening. As usual, I have come for a cup of your most delicious Formosa tea, some of your unequalled bread and butter, and a talk with our dear spirit-friends, who never seem so near me as in your presence. But I see you have company. Any one I know?"

"Some of your fellow-passengers from America, I believe. Let me introduce Dr. Maxwell, Mrs. Finchley, (his aunt) and the Rev. and Mrs. Onesimus Templeton" responded Lady Ambleside.

The new addition to the group caused the conversation to flow in a more lively strain than before; and to those unacquainted with the ins and outs of English high life Mrs. Cockroach's narrative must have been indeed instructive, as well as amusing. But as soon as tea and muffins had been disposed of, nothing would do but they must hold a seance with Mrs Finchley as the medium.

Signorina Ferranita was a wonderfully gifted clairvoyant, and often in private made wonderful revelations to her intimate friends; but she objected to the kind of Spiritualism in which Mrs. Cockroach reveled. Therefore, when that lady was in the house, she often retired to her own appartment while a seance was in progress. Mrs. Finchley, being such a very different type of woman, and the girl having taken a great liking to her at Covent Garden the evening before, the servant was told to invite her into the drawing-room as soon as she returned from church and had removed her walking apparel. Zenophon had accompanied her at her request to St. Dominic's, greatly to his own happiness, as he was of a nature to almost worship artistic genius, wherever it might be discovered, and the fair singer was one who never held herself aloof from others unless she saw or felt some good reason for so doing. With a lad as truthful and pure-minded as the little Greek, she was thorougly at home in a single instant.

They talked together of their singular experiences on the way to church and back, and found nothing in each other's startling career to occasion surprise in the other. At Benediction the beautiful singer reminded Zenophon so strikingly of Heloise, as he knelt beside her, that he was convinced something more than fancy caused him to see his beloved Parisian friend and hear her voice joining in "Tantum ergo."

Returning to the "Darning Needles" about 9 o'clock, they found Mrs. Finchley speaking with rare eloquence and feeling to all in the room; and as they listened to her inspired words, they felt a communion of souls such as they had rarely felt before. Though usually very shy of mentioning her own affairs to any one—particularly to a stranger—and never seeking to consult clairvoyants on matters where her own affection and reason must, in the very nature of things, be the only proper judges, she felt constrained, as soon as there was a pause in Mrs. Finchlay's eloquence, to inquire, "Do you see anything in store for me outside of my musical career, in which I take so much pleasure, and which I never wish to relinquish?"

"Your true position is in this house," answered the good lady impressively. "And, as you question as to your future, I answer unhesitatingly, you would not do well to refuse the offer of a hand which is accompanied by one of the truest hearts in England. As Lady Clive you can still use your musical gift for the highest ends, but a public operatic career is not your destiny for longer than one year at most. I know your religious feelings as well as I know my own. I will not trouble you with theological controversy, knowing how painful it is to you. I will only say, ask your beloved friend and preceptress, Heloise, to advise you in the matter of your marriage. We both know her far too well to harbor the faintest suspicion that she can be capable of giving any other suggestions than those prompted by the far-seeing angel who guides her life, and whom I have recently seen in my own visions as a being of particular brightness and glory. Perhaps we may receive some message from Paris this evening. You have no doubt received communications yourself from Heloise in a manner resembling that in which we were accustomed to get them in New York."

To this suggestion of Mrs. Finchley's the lovely singer at once replied: "Oh, I should be so glad to hear her sweet voice trembling on the air, as I heard it once in my dressing-room at Covent Garden. It was the first night I appeared before an English audience, and I was very nervous, the ground seemed quaking under my feet; then I heard the sweetest song to which I have ever listened vibrating in my ear, and quickly a star appeared before me, in the center of which I read the words traced in letters formed of electric light, 'Follow the star within, respond to the voice of the Great Central Sphere of Being; so shall your success be assured forever. Heed not the opinions of the world. Sing to God and to His angels, and men will rejoice in the echo of your song.' I was no longer timid. All fright vanished instantly, I scored my first triumph, but never saw or heard the audience till a gentleman handed me a lovely basket of roses and japonicas, then I heard the whole multitude recalling me. I responded to the recall, but again while I was singing I saw only a star shining before my eyes; I felt the star was a veil hiding the radiant features of invisible helpers and listeners. Since that day I have never heard the voice, but whenever I call for the star it shines before me. I think the Star of Bethlehem must have been a light seen by the shepherds and the wise men in some such way, rather than one of the orbs in the sky."

While Signornina Ferranita was thus speaking, and Mrs. Cockroach listening with all her ears, a low, sweet Gregorian chant sounded through the room: "Credo in unam sanctam Catholicam et apostolicam Ecclesiam."

"Oh, do listen to the dear spirits; what are they singing? Why, this is just like Mr. Higginbotham's dark seances, only it isn't nearly so dark here. We shall get materialization directly. O dear, how beautiful! It sends the cold shudders all through me," exclaimed Mrs. Cockroach, who could not in the least distinguish between the silvery tones of the voice then sounding and the harsh guttural tones produced through a cardboard tube at the home of the illustrious Higginbotham. Any way, she appreciated anything and everything which seemed to her to emanate from the spheres invisible, and thus enjoyed a great deal, and doubtless derived much solid comfort, though as an expert in discrimination she was a decided failure.

"Why does she sing from the 'Credo?'" queried the young Italian, who at once detected the voice of Heloise.

Instantly a voice penetrated the room, though no one saw anything and the voice said: "Do you not remember, carrissima Lavinia, our conversations on the spirit and the body of the church. Multitudes are in the body of the Roman fold who are quite outside the universal church of the spirit, while many Protestants and some agnostics are fully in the circle of the true church of the Spirit. The man who loves you and wishes to make you his bride is a Catholic in our sense of the word, if a Protestant in yours. You can marry him fearlessly, but let your heart dictate to you and not our judgment, Still, as you love him, and this fact you cannot disguise from yourself at any time, say yes when next he presents himself as suitor for your hand, he already possesses your heart."

The voice ceased suddenly as it had commenced speaking, and the beautiful girl found herself held tightly in the embrace of Lady Ambleside, while Lord Ambleside pressed on her snowy forehead such a kiss as fond fathers bestow only on dearly cherished daughters.

"Be a good wife to our boy, and heaven reward you in this world and forever," said the stately gentleman, who loved Lavinia as though she were already his child in every sense of the word.

"Let me pray over it for a week," responded the pure-minded damsel, and next Sunday, if Lord Clive honors me with a repetition of his proposal, I shall know how to answer him."

With these words, (too deeply affected for further speech) she hastily quitted the room and sought the privacy of her own chamber, where for three hours she knelt before the ivory crucifix her mother had loved devotedly, and entrusted to her child while dying, and committed her life and all its concerns to the Eternal Parent, who seemed to speak to her inmost soul when prostrate before the representation of His infinite goodness in opening a channel of grace so directly between Himself and those of his children who now inhabit this dim, frail planet, as the crucifix outpictures.

Night fell apace, all the household were wrapped in slumber; Mrs. Cockroach had been long since called for by her maid, and was sleeping serenely in an old-fashioned four-poster at Laburnum Villa; when at length a definite answer seemed to come to the earnest petitions of the young suppliant at the Throne of Grace. She saw a life of happy usefulness outspreading before her in a charming country house, the ancestral home of many generations of Amblesides and Clives; and when at length she betook herself to her pretty couch, surrounded with pink and white curtains of muslin and satin, and gazed upon a beautiful Parian statue of Our Lady of Lourdes at the foot of the bed, it seemed to her as though the placid features of the impassive statue faded out, and her mother's form, warm, sentient and vital, stood before her with hands extended in blessing.

The sun was high in the heavens when the rising bell rang through the house next morning, and then three quarters of an hour later summoned all the guests and inmates to breakfast. It was a very happy, yet a serious rather than a merry party which gathered round the table in the comfortable dining-room, discussing the events of the preceding evening, and talking over the future prospects of all the party. It was with many a regret that Dr. Maxwell and Mrs. Finchley felt compelled to decline all offers of prolonged hospitality from the Amblesides. But with these good people DUTY BEFORE PLEASURE was a constant life motto, and duty soon becomes pleasure when pleasure is surrendered to it. After many warm protestations of undying friendship on all sides, the visitors left the Darning Needles about noon, took the 12:30 train to London, arriving at Victoria about 1:15.

Having many things to do and much to see, time sped by on rapid wings, till Wednesday morning at 8:30, found them en route for Southampton, on the special express connecting with the Lloyd steamer just arrived from Bremen on the return voyage to New York. A Lloyd steamer is a floating palace. Persons desiring cheap accommodations when crossing the Atlantic may find themselves comfortably suited on the Hamburg-American packets; or, if their means allow a little higher rate, very nice accommodations can be secured very reasonably on the Red Star line, whose steamers land at Antwerp. But if one can afford one hundred dollars for each person's passage, then the Lloyd is not only unsurpassed, but probably unequaled, particularly if the intending passengers are lovers of good music and an unexceptionable cuisine.

The band was playing merrily and loudly on deck, handkerchiefs were waving and tears were falling, as the good ship steamed out of Southampton water at 1 P. M. precisely. Mrs. Kittenscomb and Alicia were on board, accompanied by Mrs. Catsleigh, who had grown tired of London in a very few days especially as she and her agent had squabbled over the monetary arrangements, which to her, were far from satisfactory, and the highly self-important Alphonse had secured a position exactly to his liking as business manager to a new star, a wealthy young American lady, whose uncle was willing to put up any amount of money to bring his aspiring darling histrionic fame.

Mrs. Kittenscomb and her little daughter had arrived at the Metropole while Dr. Maxwell and his party were at Croydon. She had met Mr. Fischer-Bennett, with whom she was charmed, and at once requested him to introduce her to some suitable lady, as she felt quite lost without Miss Newmanhoff, from whom she was now finally separated, and must find some one to fill her place. Mr. Bennett escorted her to Clarendon Square Chapel to the evening service for on learning he was a preacher and acquainted with her friends, she expressed a great desire to hear him, and declared she was so strong after the treatment she had received in Paris that she was not the least tired after her journey; neither was Alicia, who struck Mr. Bennett as the lovliest child he had ever met.

CHAPTER IV.

"The swift years pass and on their wings
They bear our brightest dreams away.
If we can but illusions spurn
We need not fear the future day.
But rather with exultant hope
Look forward to that dazzling good
Where higher love than earth can yield
Will satify the undying soul,
In patience we our lives possess
And gaze toward future blessedness."

As they were leaving the chapel, Mrs. Catsleigh, who had attended the service alone and had sobbed into a lace handkerchief during an affecting portion of the sermon—came up to Mr. Bennett, to whom she had been previously introduced, requesting an interview, and complaining that all her London projects were a failure, and she did not know what to do in England nor how to get back to America. She was so distracted, she said, she must tell her sorrows to some one that very night or she would lose her reason. Had dear Mrs. Finchley been at home she would not have troubled a gentleman, but she felt (and here she smiled through her tears in her most entrancing manner) that so good and large-hearted a man as Mr. Martindale Fischer-Bennett—so eloquent a preacher and truly a man of God—would not be offended at the tears of a poor stranded woman, whom fickle fortune had cruelly abandoned in the wilds of the modern Babylon.

Mrs. Kittenscomb, whose feelings were very tender, at once implored Mrs. Catsleigh to come to her apartments, and tell her everything, for she felt sure some way out of present difficulties could easily be found. Mrs. Catsleigh was only too ready to accede to such a proposition, as she was boiling over with rage and disappointment, and hated nothing so much as to have to repress her overwrought feelings. Good-natured Mrs. Kittenscomb who was in love with the actress within half an hour—told her all her private history, and literally importuned her to accompany herself and daughter to America, at the same time taking from her purse a considerable sum of money, which she insisted on her new acquaintance accepting without a murmur, "just to pay necessary bills, you know, and provide a few trifles for the journey."

"Well," said Mrs. Catsleigh, shrugging her shoulders, and pursing up her lips expressively, "if you insist I would be ungrateful to refuse. I haven't a penny in the world, and this loan will really tide me over the worst place I ever did get into. As soon as I get on my feet again, I shall return it to you, as I could not accept a gift from one to whom I have rendered no service."

By this time Alicia was on Mrs. Catsleigh's knee, with her arms round her neck. Few children could resist the perfect portrayal of the mother on the stage, whose part Mrs. Catsleigh played to perfection. Her "I adore children" was simply irresistible, not only to the child adored, but to the child's mother, the way to whose heart the speaker of those words knew so well how to travel. It must not be inferred that Mrs. Catsleigh did not like children, or that she was a hypocrite; she was really fond of little ones, provided they behaved well and she was not in a bad temper, but, whenever she wanted a favor, she knew just how to approach the particular person from whom she felt, in the special circumstances, it could most readily be obtained.

Dr. Maxwell was surprised, and not quite glad, to see her domiciled with Mrs. Kittenscomb and Alicia, as he did not feel her to be quite a suitable companion for those ladies; she was too selfish and capricious to be safely entrusted with persons of such tender fiber as these two ladies; but, as was invariably the case after a course of treatment with Professor de Montmarte, persons hitherto weak and nerveless grew strong and able to carry their own burdens and steer their bark safely even in perilous shallows.

As the eight days of the voyage rolled quickly by, and the shores of America began to appear in sight, not one of the party who had been so happy in Europe felt in any way sorry to return to their old homes, and take up afresh the thread of time-honored duties. When the steamer had landed at the New York pier, and the party at 312 Sycamore Avenue was again what it was two months earlier, and Mr, and Mrs. Templeton were talking of hastening to Vermont, it seemed as though all that had been crowded into a few eventful weeks could only be a dream—one of those sweet, restful, inspiring, happy dreams, from which the dreamer awakes with a sense of strength renewed and new strength gained, at peace with Heaven, himself and all mankind.

Dr. Maxwell was quite unable to go to Saddlerock, but Mrs. Kittenscomb, proving herself an efficient manager of household affairs, and Mrs. Catsleigh rising to the occasion as a really valuable assistant in domestic management, Mrs. Finchley consented to pay a week's visit to the Templeton homestead, where a most enthusiastic welcome was accorded her by the good mother of Onesimus. That kind faithful woman won her way to Mrs Finchley's kind heart at the first instant of their meeting; and as she saw how devoted the newly-married couple were to each other, and how Lydia flew to the arms of her generous mother-in-law, the hearts of all rejoiced in the consummation of one of those rare unions on earth, to which the words truly apply—

"Those whom God has joined together
No earthly power can ever sever."

CHAPTER V.

THE NEW GOSPEL IN THE OLD PULPIT.

No more need sorrow drape the soul
At prospect of unending doom,
The universe is filled with love,
Death disappears, and lo! the tomb
Once freighted with most dark despair,
Now seems a silent, placid bed,
Whereon the wearied members lie;
While from the arching blue o'erhead
Bright angels with sweet voices chant
Songs of new life which ne'er shall end,
Warbling their carols beautiful
Concerning time, whose stream doth bend
Toward the fair circle of that heaven,
Where all God's children find a home,
However widely they have strayed,
Beneath the blue of heaven's broad dome;
God knows no lost and sees no dead,
All live by His true spirit led.

Once more it was Sunday morning, the bell was ringing in the belfry of the Saddlerock Baptist church, when nigh on 10:30 o'clock, a crowd was pouring in through the wide opened doors, to the already well filled edifice. Choice flowers and evergreens, together with an extremely attractive musical program, had been provided to add beauty to the occasion when a devoted circle of friends welcomed back its beloved pastor from his summer tour in Europe, and at the same time extended its warmest greetings to his fair young bride. Mr. and Mrs. Templeton looked very impressive and earnest as they entered the church together. The minister appeared deeply impressed with the new sense of intense obligation to withhold nothing from his hearers of the new light which had been vouchsafed to him; his wife was a trifle tremulous at thought of the new life of work and responsibility which lay before her. They were both grave, but serenely happy; not only were they more than contented with and in each other; they could see far beyond the narrow horizon of domestic bliss, and scanned the broad fields of universal helpfulness to humanity, now stretching distantly before them.

Saddlerock was, on the whole, a conservative and somewhat benighted place; its people, with few exceptions, read little and reasoned less, though some minds of more than average brightness were to be found twice each Sunday in the Baptist church, as well as in the literary and debating society which assembled in the vestry every Wednesday evening after the prayer-meeting. The greatest obstacle in the way of religion in the neighborhood, was the pastor of the adjoining township, the Rev. Veeshus Mewle, a man of no more intelligence or moral excellence than "Mr. Dyceworthy," the Lutheran pastor whom Marie Corelli has drawn with such a faithful hand in her magnificent production, "Thelma." This conceited but utterly unprincipled wolf in sheep's clothing had taken advantage of Mr. Templeton's absence to berate him, and malign his character to the members of his church, and all under the assumed pretext of "duty, painful, sad duty, but duty nevertheless."

Having resorted to the lowest cunning in his efforts to steal a march on Mr. Templeton and place his own nephew in the Saddlerock pulpit, this "pious, elect, and godly" man had announced, "Wolves in the clothing of sheep," as the topic of his discourse the previous Sunday evening, and to secure an audience, he had engaged the brass band of the village "at great expense," to play for nothing and accompany the fine vocal efforts of six young ladies who were announced as having studied in Italy for three years, under the best masters, but who had never left America. The tricks of a nefarious trade were, in Mr. Mewle's opinion, "glorifying God and hastening the salvation of souls."

Had it not been for his recent experiences in Paris, and his consequent knowledge of the utter folly and even wrong of recognizing evil sufficiently to let it trouble us, Mr. Templeton, who was (by inheritance from his mother) very sensitive, notwithstanding his depth and determination of character, would have been pained and grieved at the knowledge of such hostility manifested by a brother minister. As it was, he saw in Mr. Mewle the representative of a mendacious theology, as well as of a dishonest social practice. Feeling he could no longer fraternize either with such a man or with his opinions, and that the time had come for him to strike out boldly in opposition to the theories he had once blindly advocated, it was with a firm, uncompromising tread that Mr. Templeton ascended the pulpit stairs, and after conducting the devotional exercises with far more than his old time earnestness and simplicity, preached a grand, simple, eloquent sermon (if so friendly and conversational a style of delivery could be said to resemble preaching), from the text, "What went ye out for to see, a reed shaken by the wind?"

Taking his start from the comparative degree of truth revealed to the world by John the Baptist, and the superlative measure of enlightenment dispensed by Jesus, Mr. Templeton compared the twilight glimmerings of the old theology with the glorious blaze of heavenly radiance now bursting upon the world, though entirely unsuspected by the multitude, and but poorly understood or even anticipated by the foremost workers in the vineyards of reform. How many are there, even among social and religious agitators, who have the least conception of what the new industrial order will be? The present state of the world is everywhere tottering to its fall, but a new earth is about to be evolved, in which righteousness will abide and be made manifest, and toward this new era of universal peace and good-will every effort of the most ignorant and misguided is being directed by a power holding the reins behind the veil, and in a manner far beyond present human ken.

As no village in America, and scarcely one in Europe today, can be so utterly behind the times as to feel nothing of the impending mental revolution, Mr. Templeton knew he would be striking a responsive echo in the intellects and hearts of all his auditors,—many of whom were working men and their families,—if he gave them a brief outline of Prof. de Montmarte's management of his property in the south of France. As he expatiated upon the blessedness of co-operation and the cursedness of monopoly and competition, many of his hearers longed to depart from the time-honored decorum of a place of worship, and applaud lustily. As it was, not daring to kick over the traces of eclesiastical decency, they gave their minister that animated, whole-souled attention, expressed in illuminated countenances and rapt interest which makes a speaker's duty one of the most delightful upon the earth.

Passing from this topic to themes more transcendental, he gave some little account of the marvels he had witnessed in Paris; then spoke of London; related the incident of Signorina Ferranita's bringing Miss Carroll to the front after she had been snubbed by snobs and dismissed by a truckling manager, and then warmed up with kindly allusions to the work of Mr. Martindale Fisher-Bennett, the son of the orthodox pastor who was his predecessor in the place where they were then assembled.

The discourse was a wonderful mosaic of narrative and argument, intensely alive with the warmest and truest sentiiment. Mr. Templeton never used to preach in that strain. He formerly delivered didactic homilies or moral essays, always used notes, and sometimes read from manuscript; but, since his wonderful Parisian experience, he spoke quite impromptu and from exalted inspiration.

As the large congregation slowly left the church, many were the comments upon the preacher's change of style. All agreed that he was marvelously eloquent and thrillingly impressive. Every broad, liberal-minded one among them was delighted, both with his sentiment and oratory. There were, of course, some of the old stagers who were fearful lest he was on the high road to Unitarianism or Spiritualism, and felt it to be their "painful duty" to construct labored notes during the afternoon to hand to him before the evening service, imploring him not to depart from the old standards.

Two or three of Mr. Mewle's particular friends could scarcely walk quickly enough in their eager earnestness to discuss Mr. Templeton's "blasphemy" with that "dear man of God," with whom they regularly partook of cold mutton and pie every Sunday at 1 p. m. Mr. Mewle's face beamed with satisfaction, and he chuckled all over as he was assured by his intimates that the Baptist Union would expel Mr. Templeton ignominiously—that all that was necessary to "kick him out of the church of God" was to persuade him to have some of his discourses published and revised by his own hand. These heretical documents, which he would acknowledge as thoroughly authentic, would be more than enough to remove the "blasphemer," and install the Rev. Tarantulus Mewle (nephew of the Rev. Veeshus Mewle) in his stead. With these "pious" ends in view they schemed and plotted through the peaceful hours of a lovely Sabbath afternoon, completely ignorant of the fact that their Sabbath-breaking was an offense infinitely more heinous in the sight of heaven than even the bull fights at Seville, which, disgraceful to relate, occur on Sunday afternoons in the open square in front of the Cathedral, and that in a country professedly Christian and Catholic.

By 7 o'clock in the evening Mr. Templeton's church was again crowded, more so than in the morning. His sermon had created a sensation, and many who looked upon orthodox religion as a humbug were very anxious to hear him on "The Old Fetters and the New Faith," which he had announced at the close of his morning discourse as his topic for the evening. The church was thronged almost to suffocation. Companies of workmen, who never attended a place of worship, were present with their wives and elder children; and numerous visitors from surrounding hamlets availed themselves of the moonlight evening to hear a prophet who had been reared among them, but only just achieved notoriety. The lights and flowers, the inspiring music and exquisitely touching prayer, all prepared the minds of the throng to appreciate what the minister was about to say before he uttered it, so that when he came to the delivery of his discourse every mind, with scarcely an exception, was prepared to drink in some of the copious instruction which fell so finely from his evidently inspired lips.

Fixing his expressive eyes upon the sea of upturned faces, without apparently regarding any one in particular, the preacher commenced in firm, well-modulated accents:

"My friends, this day is indeed an auspicious one in my history. I have resolved to leave the Baptist Union, for though I am a firmer believer in divine revelation than when I addressed you three months ago, I cannot longer remain as a representative of a denomination whose avowed tenets are not in accordance with the findings of my soul. I trust I am still a Christian, but I am no longer a Baptist, nor can I leave one sect to join another, as all sectarianism now appears to me as a dwarfing of the soul's liberty, and a protest against that true catholicity, which is the infallible seal of the church of God. Do not think from these words that I am on the threshold of Rome, Greece, or England; for, though I believe in apostolic succession, and in "one Lord, one faith, and one baptism," my eyes have been opened to the inner meanings of things, the outer forms of which previously appeared to me their all. We are, I am convinced, at the commencement of a mighty revolution—not like that of France in the last century, when the deposition of religion and enthroning of vaunted reason coincided with belligerent cruelty of the most astounding and horrible type, but a revolution to be affected solely through the operation of the spiritual element in man—a force which uses moral suasion and intellectual appeal as its only weapons. I have been thinking deeply of late on the subject of divine revelation, and I can no longer believe that it is intermittent or exclusive. The Scriptures teach me plainly that inspiration is free as air and sunshine to all who receive it. If we remain in darknass it is on account of willful blindness on our part.

"You may wonder what I think of the hundreds of millions of "heathen," as we have been disposed to call the great bulk of Asiatics and Africans, for whose conversion to technical Christianity we have many of us expended much time, means and labor. My present conviction is that they are as safe as we, in the embrace of all-encompassing divine love. Christ to me is no longer a restricted Savior, dwarfed in his abilities by the extent of our contributions or the zeal of our missionaries. The Holy Spirit appears to me now as an all-persuasive emanation of divine love and wisdom, breathing with the sovereignty ascribed to it by Calvin, but with all the impartiality for which the Universalists of a century ago contended so manfully. Were this church nominally Universalist, I might remain its pastor and preach my convictions, but even then I should feel the bondage of a sect, though an unusually broad one. As it is, I must be free to speak and write as I feel, for there is not, in my estimation, a greater crime, if one so great, as compromise with conscience.

"My dear young wife, who comes among you as my companion and helpmeet in all things, is one with me in all my sentiments and ambitions; she and I, together with my dear mother, have resolved to form the nucleus of an unsectarian society here in Saddlerock, so, though I resign my pastorate of this church, I hope to remain and work with you.

"Let the Baptist church of this place choose a minister according to its will—one whose views harmonize with the confession of faith—and, though he and I cannot agree theologically, if he will allow it, we can co-operate philanthropically. Henceforth I belong to humanity, and not to any sect. I feel that those who would reach the masses of the great unchurched must carry a gospel to the people unhampered with the dogmas of any body of people who place uniformity of belief before the practice of virtue. I am not among those who see nothing but error in the sects, nor am I one who anticipates a decadence of faith or dearth of religious life in the next generation. Religion has been under a cloud, from which it is now rapidly emerging; and, while man's faith in God will grow brighter, his opinions concerning God must radically change. Evolution to my mind, is not inconsistent with the most fervid piety and simple trust in omniscient, omnipotent goodness; but evolution cuts the ground finally from under the old view of man's fall and subsequent redemption. Jesus is more to me now than he ever was before, not as an atoning sacrifice, but as a spiritual power, leading men to righteousness by the mighty power of his boundless love and wisdom. I cannot advocate uncertain dogmas, nor can I care what creed a man professes if he be sincere—at the same time, agnosticism to me is no gospel. Affirmative spiritual truth is the joy of my life, the satisfaction of my intellect, the object of my inmost affection. I believe in miracles now more than I ever did, but I have learned to refer them to the operation of unchanging law, not to its suspension; by law I do not mean a blind, self-existent necessity, but, on the contrary, the immutable order of the Universe, expressive of God's changeless power.

Proceeding in this strain for fully an hour, taking up, point by point, the leading doctrines of the Christian religion, Mr. Templeton led his hearers by a series of logically successive steps to the crown of his argument, which burst upon them as a thoroughly rational, though deeply spiritual view of the atonement. His words on this subject were as follows:

"And now, my friends, we reach the apex of our pyramid, the foundation of which is the perfect square of absolute divine equity. How blindly and foolishly have men been prating through the centuries of an opposition between the attributes of the Almighty. God's attributes are distinct the one from the other, but never can one be opposed to another, or God himself would cease to be; for, whatsoever is at variance with itself, by such variance is brought to destruction.

"Mercy and justice are eternally inseparable; God is love and wisdom. Divine Love is recognized by us when we are confronted with mercy in the scheme of providence; Divine Wisdom is displayed to us when justice meets our view. Justice and mercy are in truth, as man and wife, when the two are no more twain, but one spirit. This sublime verity however, is inconceivable by us until through inward purity, purity of affection, desire, aspiration and WILL, we attain to the glorified condition of those who see Eternal Good in all. Jesus as a perfect, living, breathing, working exponent of the Divine Character, as he traveled over the earth, perpetually emanated virtue as a flower exhales fragrance. This elixir of life, potent to heal all disorders of men's moral, mental and physical condition was the power by which he brought sinners to repentance, cast out unclean demons, and healed all manner of bodily infirmities. But what shall we say of those who, while professing to teach in his name, revoke his express decision, and attribute to charlatanism, delusion or the devil, every manifestation of spiritual power akin to the phenomena occurring in his own presence and that of his original disciples? When did he say that the power to heal and dispossess the mind of unclean influences should be confined to one century, and that the age of miracles should pass never to return?

"When, as a student at college, I studied eclesiastical history, I was often so shocked at the records of gross immorality in the church of the first three centuries, even among the highest dignitaries, that I felt like throwing up my studies and renouncing all idea of the ministry as my field of activity; but consolation invariably came to me with the inward assurance that Christ's perfection, not the weakness of his professed followers, is to be our guide and anchor, and thus through 'many a conflict, many a doubt,' I clung as it were, to the hem of the garment of the Spotless One and realized how weak are all human props, how breakable if not broken all finite reeds. Now a new light has come to me in the shape of an added revelation. During my sojourn in France, I have seen the power of the spirit demonstrated, I have witnessed Christ-like works performed, and not only have I been a privileged spectator of cures wrought in others; I have personally felt the blesing descend upon my most unworthy self, not only in the opening of my interior vision and the unfolding of my intellect, but also in the strengthening of my frame. I am to-day a far stronger and healthier man than when I last addressed you, but though I agree with the Christian Scientists in their cardinal premises and central claims, I cannot join their ranks, as I neither render allegiance to pretentious individuals, nor do I consider it necessary to deny the existence of the material universe, because I believe implicitly in the absolute sovereignty of spirit.

"Believe me, dear friends, atonement or reconciliation is necessary to salvation present and to come, but it is our acquaintance with truth and obedience to the divine voice which speaks as the Holy Spirit in our own inmost nature, that constitutes the reconciliation. Next Sunday I shall speak in the morning on, "Why men believe in original sin," and in the evening on, "In what sense is Christ our Savior?" Between now and then the deacons and trustees of this church must decide whether those sermons are delivered in this edifice, or whether I shall accede to the request of some unsectarians who wish to organize an entirely sectless society, which can meet for worship, praise, and exhortation in our commodious Town Hall."

As may be expected, such sentiments could not fail to excite great and varied comment when expressed by a man whose orthodoxy had formerly been sound, and who was still the duly installed pastor of a Baptist society; nevertheless, so progressive is the general trend of modern religious thought, that quite a considerable number of members declared there was nothing whatever to which they intended to take exception in Mr. Templeton's position. The almost unanimous verdict was that he was a far better preacher than formerly, that his young wife was a jewel of a woman, and they were not going to unsettle their minister and run the risk of breaking up their congregation and getting a most undesirable occupant for the pulpit, because Mr. Templeton's views had expanded and he no longer could preach the weird old doctrines of infinite wrath and everlasting damnation. The trustees and deacons held a private, special meeting that very evening in the vestry, and with one exception, voted to refuse Mr. Templeton's proffered resignation, and as to the Baptist Union, if it expelled them as a congregation, they owned their church property and could worship God better perhaps, outside sectarian limits than within the pale of an exclusive denomination.

Mr. Mewle was furious; his denunciations of Mr. Templeton became so acrid and ungentlemanly, that even his own friends began to take sides against him; and then when he began to wail and whimper and appropriate to himself the blessing promised to those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, the mask fell completely off in the presence of many of his old admirers.

* * * * * * *

It is a fair morning—a Monday morning, and the preacher is not "blue," he is never "blue" nowadays. All is couleur de rose. It is nine o'clock on the Monday morning, following the second Sunday of his ministrations since his return to Saddlerock. A pleasant party are discussing the subjects nearest to all their hearts, as they linger over the remains of a simple but delicious breakfast. They are seated in a charming room overlooking wide pasture lands, with towering hills not far distant. Mrs. Finchley, Mrs. Templeton Sr., Onesimus and Lydia Templeton, constituted a group once seen, never to be forgotten; such rest, such peace, such harmony, seldom prevail in any earthly household. They are talking over matters in New York, of a wonderful cure of typhoid fever, and another of total paralysis of the lower limbs just accomplished by Dr. Maxwell, through the agency of spiritual electricity; they are also talking of Zenophon and the marvelous progress he is making as a student of electrical therapeutics, under the worthy doctor's kindly supervision, and of the strange fate which befell Mrs. Catsleigh after one week's sojourn under Dr. Maxwell's roof. Count Katolowynski returned to New York, proposed to her and married her the same day. On the day following, as Countess Katolowynski, she left 312 Sycamore avenue, and with her husband sailed back to Europe. Having lost control of Zenophon, the Count was determined to secure as his subject, this singular lady, who yielded at once to his mesmeric fascination, declared herself passionately in love with him, and glad to follow him to the ends of the earth, his title and fine appearance being no mean considerations in her eyes. Beaming with satisfaction, she answered the questions in the marriage service without the slightest tinge of embarrassment. Her effusiveness at parting with Mrs. Finchley was melo-dramatic in the extreme; that good woman could not feel glad to see her married to so adventurous a fellow as the handsome Count, still there was much that was congenial in their natures, and let us hope they may have at least as much happiness as they deserve in their new life together.

The lessons taught the Count by Heloise had evidently been to his profit; and it is a noteworthy fact that no one ever is brought into the atmosphere of a truly spiritual person without reaping lasting advantage.

Mrs. Pushing had just returned from Newport, where she had taken a class in Christian Science, at $25 per student. Fory-three students had paid her that amount during the summer, so she had managed to meet expenses, though on her return to New York she anticipated much greater success financially. She missed Miss Hockmeir fearfully, and was exasperated beyond words when she found Mrs. Catsleigh, whom she hoped to secure as her assistant, had married and departed for Europe. Mrs. Pushing had endeavored to secure as her assistant a Miss Sparrowcliffe, but that lady preferred to reside in Boston, where she became secretary of the Grimalkin College of Spiritual Science, the chief teacher in which institution was Mrs. Wolf Katzenheimer, who taught public classes at $3 per student, and whose printed lectures sold at five cents each.

As during the past four years our many characters have not been idle, we shall, if the demand justifies, publish a sequel to this story, in which the spiritual-electric system of healing will be far more accurately and elaborately defined than in the foregoing pages.

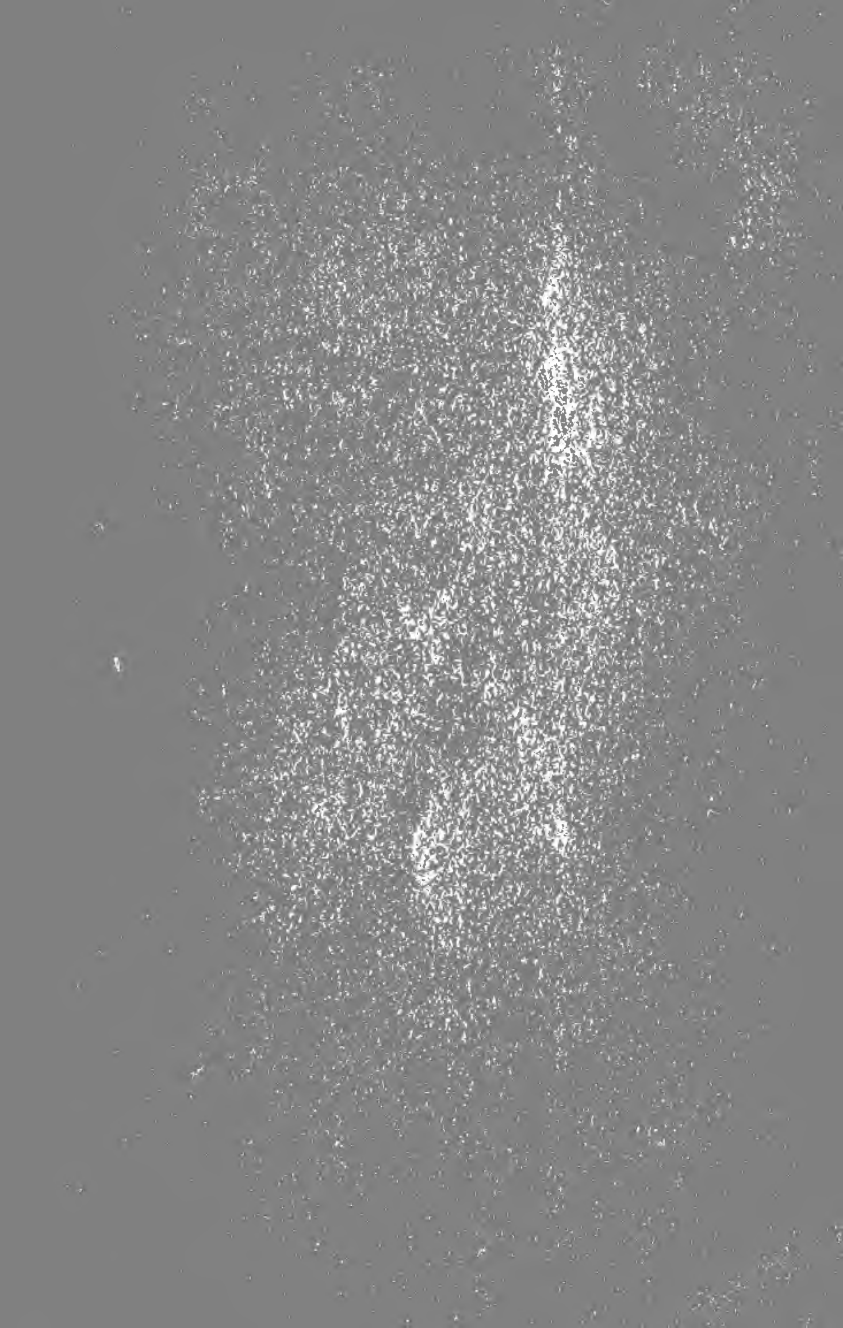
As the reader parts company with our heroes and heroines, let him remember they are all characters in real life, but so dressed as not to betray confidence, or invite unwelcome attention to individuals, some of whom love retirement far more than publicity.

The author, who has acted but as recorder and amanuensis, assumes no responsibility for the words put in the mouths of the characters. The reader must decide for himself how far the theories they severally advance are tenable.

This story is a novel, and as a work of fiction it goes to the world; but the author knows by personal experience that in this, as in many other instances, "truth is stranger than fiction."

FINIS.

LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA



THIS BOOK IS DUE ON THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW

AN INITIAL FINE OF 25 CENTS

WILL BE ASSESSED FOR FAILURE TO RETURN THIS BOOK ON THE DATE DUE. THE PENALTY WILL INCREASE TO 50 CENTS ON THE FOURTH DAY AND TO $1.00 ON THE SEVENTH DAY OVERDUE.

FEB 24 1946

FEB 25 1946

LD 21–100*m*·7,'40 (6936s)

BP605
C6

Y.C | 00015

imus Templeton.

12'13.	Thomas.	JUV 25 1918
23 1917	Baker	JUL 25 1917
25 1946	Johnke	FEB 25

BP605
C6
688B

m-5,'13

THE PEOPLE'S HANDBOOK

OF

SPIRITUAL SCIENCE

W. J. COLVILLE'S

PRIVATE COURSE OF LESSONS FOR THE USE OF STUDENTS

BOSTON
BANNER OF LIGHT PUBLISHING CO.
204 DARTMOUTH STREET
1902

Class _____

Book _____

Copyright No. _____

COPYRIGHT DEPOSIT.

The People's Handbook

OF

Spiritual Science

W. J. COLVILLE'S

Private Course of Lessons for the Use of Students

BOSTON
BANNER OF LIGHT PUBLISHING CO.
204 DARTMOUTH STREET
1902

RZ401
C69

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
TWO COPIES RECEIVED
FEB. 27 1902
COPYRIGHT ENTRY
Feb. 27-1902
CLASS a XXc. No.
27853
COPY B.

Copyright, 1902,
By W. J. Colville

S. J. PARKHILL & CO., BOSTON, U.S.A.
PRINTERS

CONTENTS

LESSON I

PAGE

Old and New Schools of Healing and their Systems. Physical and Spiritual Methods . . 5

LESSON II

The Origin of Disease Metaphysically Considered; Subjective and Objective Causes 24

LESSON III

Positivity and Negativity; Self-Control and Self-Poise; Truth and Holiness or Wholeness . 42

LESSON IV

The Power of the Will. Divine Realization in Maintaining Health 54

PAGE

LESSON V

The Power of the Will, and Divine Realization in Maintaining Health 65

LESSON VI

Hypnotism, Sleep, Rest and Repose as Healing Agents 79

LESSON I

Old and New Schools of Healing and their Systems Physical and Spiritual Methods

In commencing a series of consecutive lessons we request the student to thoroughly digest the teaching conveyed in the first before attempting to study the second, and so on to the end of the series. We advisedly use the word healing in contradistinction from cure because to heal means to make whole, while to cure only signifies to care for or tend. Curing is good in its way and, like all lesser good, it is included in a larger blessing. Did we live in complete accord with the law of our existence there could be no pain for us to suffer, and no germs of disease could possibly invade our frames. Indeed, it is not going too far to say that the very bacilli or pathogenic germs which are often erroneously supposed to be causes of disorder are only effects of prior disturbances in human life. The microbean theory of disease is by no means new, for we read in the Talmud that one of the reasons why the Jew should not eat the flesh of swine is because that unclean meat contains a small insect corresponding to the trichinæ known to modern medical science.

Healing, or the science of health, has always occupied a prominent place in religious literature and nowhere more than in the Torah or Pentateuch do we find the strictest attention paid to every aspect of sanitary regulation. Health is a religious necessity; disease is irreligion. Sin and sickness are inseparable, and no better definition of sin can be found than "transgression of the Law." By Law we do not mean man-made enactments, but eternal and universal order. Sin and sickness enter and leave the world together. By sin we mean every sort of blunder and mistake voluntary and involuntary, therefore we do not raise the question whether the original producing cause of sickness was anything more than some error into which our remote ancestors in some manner involuntarily fell.

Physical methods of treating sufferers are not always wrong, but they are in every case inadequate to remove the cause of physical disturbance, and every student of mental practice must hasten to acquaint himself with the idea that disease itself (like health) is mental though the effects of both are physical.

Health is Order; Disease is Disorder. Let us now proceed to work from this accepted axiom. Order and health being the same; discord and disease being likewise synonymous, it is the work of every one who attempts to heal others to set to work to attain in his own life to those states of harmony toward which he wisely seeks to lead his neighbors. Health is so vast a word that it can only be defined as wholeness, which is properly identical with holiness. The New Testament writers, in recounting the marvellous works of healing with which the Gospel narratives abound, have very explicitly stated that people were made "every whit whole," a singularly forcible expression, one moreover which is susceptible of treatment from an evolutionary and educational standpoint. To be made whole is to be perfected, but absolute perfection pertains to the Infinite only; relative perfection is, however, the legitimate heritage of every living being.

Why should there be imperfection in any other sense than that of incompleteness? Fruit is naturally green, sour and hard before it has become sweet, luscious and beautiful; but there need be no devouring insect or unwholesome blight upon the vines because the time for rich clusters of grapes has not arrived. One of the very first steps to be taken toward qualification for the practice of mental or spiritual healing is to logically demonstrate the unnecessariness of disease.

We cannot say in the face of phenomenal evidences to its presence that disease has no terrestrial existence, but we can claim, and we do claim, that it has no necessary, inevitable, or invincible existence. Let this point be clearly taken by the student. There must be no discrepancy in statement, no discord between theory and practice. It will never do to say there is nothing whatever ailing a patient and then proceed to accept a fee for overcoming a state that never existed. There is no necessary disease, therefore all disease is vincible. They (apostles) shall heal all who are suffering regardless of the special variety of disorder which has afflicted the invalids who are brought to the notice of the apostles. Such is the teaching of the Gospel.

"The prophets who were before you" is a great saying, for the prophets were the only true and great healers among ancient Jews, and their successors are the only healers worthy of the name to-day. The oldest and the newest schools of healing are identical in doctrine and in practice, therefore the Bible student and the Vedantist may alike find proof of healing in the different books which each elects to study. The prophets who were the ancient healers were men and women who lived not only exemplary, but extraordinary, lives, and so entirely aloof from the common mode of life did they stand that by reason of their heavenly eccentricities they attained to so thorough a command over material conditions that they could easily accomplish many mighty works entirely beyond the reach of even the purest and wisest priests engaged in Temple service. In old Egypt in the very long ago the Therapeutæ were looked upon as a people who enjoyed singular communion with the divinities, and never does a modern physician take the Æsculapian oath without calling to the remembrance of all who know something of classic mythology the story of the Greek god Æsculapius who was the guardian divinity or special spiritual patron of all who practised occult and natural medicine.

Doctor Franz Hartmann, who has devoted much ability to a modern interpretation of the mediæval medical system of Paracelsus distinguishes very clearly in his treatise "Occult Science in Medicine" between five kinds of doctors, two of which are simply physicians, while the other three are healers to some extent in the physical sense of the term. Those who deal exclusively in so-called natural or botanic remedies are handling psychic agencies without their own knowledge, but they are so unaware of the occult elements in the vegetable products they manipulate as to be unable to see farther than the most external or superficial plane of Nature's manifestations. Those who are chiefly dependent upon their own individual good character for the work they accomplish are really mental practitioners, no matter under what technical flag they may ostensibly sail; while those who rely on purely spiritual power for success in their work belong to a category where their relation to the prophets of antiquity is easily discovered.

It is not our object in this course of lessons to call particularized attention to all the many schools of medical and mental practice with which the world has been flooded, only to present as vividly as possible the striking contrasts exhibited in method and the surprising unity in result of righteous treatment.

It is a well-known fact that Allopathy and Homœopathy are diametrically opposed to each other, alike in theory and practice. How comes it then that the self-same results frequently follow upon two courses of administration which no amount of verbal juggling can possibly harmonize? These two schools are both legal in the United States to-day, and though the term "Regular" is applied to itself by one of the schools, as though the other were irregular, the followers of Hahnemann are just as much protected by the State as are the "Regulars."

Outside of these two accepted schools, Eclecticism flourishes, and as it is the proud boast of the Eclectic that he combines the good in all systems, we can readily see that if he lives up to his profession he may do greater good than either of his less free-minded competitors.

Again, outside of recognized medical eclectics we find magnetists, medical electricians and all sorts of peculiar people advertising nostrums and professing to heal, sometimes by laying on of hands and often in far more eccentric fashion. These peculiar people all score some successes, all do some good, indeed all supply help in some mysterious cases of nervous derangement with which more ordinary persons have wrestled in vain.

Leaving the field of materia medica and allied (so-called) quackery, we enter another realm of workers, viz., the company of those who avowedly rely exclusively on mental means of cure; but here again we encounter serious differences, divergencies so great (as, for example, between Mrs. Eddy's system of Christian Science and the Mental Science taught by Mrs. Wilmans) that it seems impossible to reconcile such widely opposite ideas.

Knowing as we do that no single system monopolizes truth and that no one-sided advocacy of a fragment of a true philosophy of life can embrace the whole of efficient scientific teaching, we label our own philosophy Spiritual Eclecticism, awaiting the advent of a still better and yet more expressive term. Our students will find as they study our lessons that our range of reasoning is wide, but we are not led into contradictions because we do not wish to be exclusive. Only a wide, inclusive system of teaching can possibly steer clear of absurd contradictions, as all narrow views must sooner or later suffer by being brought into collision with actual facts and indisputable phenomena which severely shake though they do not entirely shatter them.

God is Omnipresent Life, Love, Wisdom. God being everywhere present at all times, we do not have to seek God in any special place or in any particular manner.

What follows upon this declaration? Surely nothing less than what Tennyson has called in his sublime poetry "Higher Pantheism" can satisfy the logical intellect which seeks to accept spiritual truth in a reasonable manner. Every thoughtful reader of the 139th Psalm must have grown familiar with the old Jewish thought of God at its highest and best, which one of England's poets laureate has re-expressed in somewhat altered form.

The ancient Psalmist sings, "If I ascend into heaven thou art there, if I descend into Sheol thou art there also." Heaven and Sheol are the two extremes, the highest and the lowest limits of finite thought and speech. God is in both. "I cannot flee from thy presence" is the summing up of the argument, the close of the meditation.

Tennyson converses poetically with a little flower which he has taken out of a crannied wall; he holds the tender blossom in his hand and says to it, "If I knew all about you, little flower, I would understand God as well as man." But though he knows something about the flower, though far from everything, he satisfies himself with affirming "All is love and all is law." This is only another version of David. True healers are not quibblers or pedants.

Pedagogy has no power to heal the sick, for the heart of healing-force is loving kindness, and the pedagogue when not actively cruel is often decidedly unkind. Cruelty is the active inversion of love; unkindness is the cold, clammy condition in which we are wellnigh destitute of affection, which is the fire of life.

Mental healers, in company with practitioners of all schools, have been hitherto desirous of confirming dogmas, of establishing cut and dried systems of formulated teaching; that has been their chief mistake. Every system needs humiliating whenever it vaunts itself as the only true system. No system is altogether true, for all our treasures are put into poor earthen vessels.

Accept God and do not seek to limit God, for limitation of the Divine is absurdity. Accept the goodness of the universe. Whatever is real is good, and whatever is indestructible is immortal. Every student needs to be well drilled here. You cannot teach, you cannot explain yourself, until you are clear as crystal on what you mean by the absoluteness of good. All the metaphysical practitioners are at one in their use of the phrase "All is good." It is a fundamental axiom, but it needs popular explanation equally with Pope's saying, "Whatever is is right."

We have now plunged into deep waters; we are at the heart of our theme. We must conjugate accurately Subsistere, Esse, and Existere, and not confound the terms. Subsistence and being are totally distinct from existence.

The whole difficulty confronted by honest people who are struggling with metaphysical declarations which seem obscure to them arises out of a failure to employ different words in a distinctly different sense. The great "Standard Dictionary" issued by Funk and Wagnalls, of New York, out of a vocabulary of something over three hundred thousand words contains about sixty thousand synonyms. This may be at present a convenience for the student, but ultimately we are certain that no such a book can exist as an accepted expositor of correct diction, for our interchangeable terms will grow fewer and fewer as we make progress in the direction of clear thought and, consequently, of clear, concise speaking. You cannot say to any one who may be suffering great pain, "You do not suffer," without arousing sharp and needless opposition in your student in many instances. Nothing can sound falser to one who is afflicted with fierce pain than the seemingly heartless and untruthful assertion, "You are in no distress whatever."

But even if such language be employed in mental treatment (we are not recommending its use), it is quite possible that the one who employs it in practice may be holding to a great idea which is completely in accord with the purest and most truthful teaching. There are two of every one of us: a higher and a lower self. The higher ego is the teacher, or healer, the lower being the pupil, or patient. Now, if we clearly understand that there are two selves in every one of us, and that it is the province of the healer, or doctor, to address the inner, or higher, self and call upon it to address the outer, or lower, self, there is no real inaccuracy in such an affirmation as "You are well," even though the subordinate self is very far from well. It is not always easy, or even possible in every case, to explain everything to an invalid during the term of his sickness, therefore the path of wisdom is to speak your strongest convictions silently in any terms you please, but when you are using oral suggestion, confine yourself to such language as will not grate upon the sensitive ears of the patient.

We now come to consider the respective uses of different modes of mental suggestion. We will place Silent Suggestion in the first rank, because a great deal more can often be said silently than aloud.

Whenever we think, we mentally speak. The Greek logos can be translated by will and thought as well as by word, and even when word is the given translation, the mental word must be conceived of as prior to its physical expression. When we think, we necessarily discover that our thoughts are in form, and these forms are of two varieties, viz., forms of mental speech, or silent language, and forms of objects which we may call mental pictures which we see with the "mind's eye." When you are giving a mental treatment to yourself or to another, you must make a mental picture of the ideal state which you desire to express, or else repeat to yourself or to the other such words and sentences as seem to embody the desired mental pictures in equivalent forms of speech.

The theory of silent treatment is that mental pictures are transferable and that words uttered in silence are mentally communicated from one person to another without the aid of any material agent such as we can ordinarily discern. The mesmeric theory of animal magnetism, or Reichenbach's view of odyllic force, may be correct or otherwise, but we do not need it for our purpose. That there is a psychic and an electro-magnetic radiation of force from the active centre of human consciousness especially at work in giving a suggestive treatment is highly probable, but all we need to be convinced of is that there is some means whereby mental impressions are communicated from the active thought-centre of a mental telegraphist to the receptive thought-centre of one who is en rapport with the telegrapher.

Wireless telegraphy, as illustrated in Marconi's celebrated system, offers many valuable hints concerning the means whereby thoughts can be sent from one brain to another. There certainly are discharges of psychic force when mental treatments are sincerely given. Though there is no warrant for supposing that the healer is an operator and the patient a subject in the old use of those terms, we cannot doubt that the one (healer) can be correctly described as a sender, and the other (patient) as a receiver. Sending and receiving being perfectly agreeable words, suggesting naught of coercion on one side and submission on the other, we employ them in all our lessons.

It is not difficult to conceive of a certain chord-setting in one brain awakened to more than average activity while a similar and, therefore, naturally corresponding chord-setting in another brain may be unusually dormant. Whoever gives a silent mental treatment successfully causes the chord-setting which is especially inactive in the brain of a depressed invalid to commence vibrating synchronously with the corresponding centre which in his own brain is particularly active.

Silent contact often accomplishes more than speech, because conversation often serves to dissipate energy over a wide territory and whatever gains in diffusiveness is apt to lose in concentration. Our very highest and deepest thoughts and feelings are beyond utterance; the utmost that we can utter is much less than we inwardly apprehend; thus there is a valid justification for silent suggestion at this point alone, viz., the question of intensity.

If you do not feel that a silent treatment suffices, or if it does not seem real to you, then it is right and indeed necessary for you to employ oral or visual suggestion to render your work intelligible to yourself, and though it is impossible to discover (in all cases) how far a patient realizes a treatment, it is always imperative that whoever gives one should feel intensely the power of the treatment he or she is seeking to administer. Whenever you give a silent suggestion you must make yourself realize its potency before seeking to impress another with its value, and this realization brings us to the need of faith, a word which always needs clear definition. Before you attempt to inspire a patient with confidence in the efficacy of your work or system, you must believe firmly in it yourself. Confidence is highly contagious at all times and in all circumstances.

When in Europe during the Middle Ages people believed unfalteringly in the efficacy of the king's touch, the Divine right of kings was undisputed. The king believed in himself as God's representative, and the people whom he touched regarded him as a divinely appointed messenger. Very likely, some certain king may have been a sickly and dissolute man, but the populace revered the kingly office, not of necessity its immediate incumbent. If they received no benefit from the king's person, they, by an auto-suggestive process, put themselves into a mental attitude whereby they became receptive to the universal healing elixir which, though omnipresent, enters into us and circulates through us only to the extent that we are open to receive it and place no obstacles in the way of its free circulation within us. All the absurdities and repulsiveness of mediæval medical practice were just so many props on which superstitious people leaned; these practices have their less offensive successors to-day in bread pills, colored water, hypodermic injections of warm water, etc., all of which are paltry external aids to suggestion and to concentration of thought upon the idea of health or harmony.

Silent treatment when carried sufficiently far becomes absent treatment, which is far more wonderful still than simply silent treatment and arouses increased scepticism in many quarters. How can you treat people you have never seen? is a very common inquiry, the adequate answer to which involves much deeper study of human nature than is ordinarily attempted. T. J. Hudson and a few other exceptional modern writers have written books in exposition of the method of telepathy, but for at least nine hundred and ninety-nine persons out of every average thousand explanations fail to elucidate the stupendous problem. Sir William Crookes's theory of brain waves and universal ether suggests a reasonable solution, but only one in the thousand is usually capable of following a difficult scientific interpretation.

We are wise when we are satisfied to begin with facts and then theorize upon them, in preference to starting with theories and then seeking facts to confirm them. It is an undeniable occurrence (frequently being everywhere repeated) that many persons distinctly feel and know much concerning what is occurring at a considerable distance from their material whereabouts. This knowledge is sometimes conveyed in sleep and comes in form of dreams and visions; but it often invades our waking consciousness and startles us at midday with its intense vividity. We do not know what to make of it until we have received confirmation of its truth through ordinary channels.

To attribute everything uncommon to either imagination or coincidence, as many people do, is to take a simpleton's refuge in two unexplained words which leave the question exactly where we found it. In the strictly scientific usage of those words they may prove adequate, though in their popular acceptance they only afford refuge for an ignoramus. Imagination is mental imaging, and mental imagery frequently suffices to bring about marvellous and wholly unexpected changes in the physique which is in direct correspondence with the psyche which does the imaging. Coincident phenomena are merely events which are contemporary, and while it often happens that one person thinks of something at apparently the same instant with another, there may have certainly been the lapse of some fraction of a second during which intelligence has been flashed from one intellect to another. People who are in much natural sympathy with each other can often do the very best telepathic work together without any previous acquaintance or preconcerted arrangement; but where these necessary psychic elements are lacking, or present only in small degree, results are generally difficult and dubious.

Though we are not prepared to deny that there is a psychical side to everything, and that therefore those who employ physical remedial agents are doing some measure of mental good in many instances, we are never prepared to grant that the lower can do as much good as can the higher method; consequently we claim for spiritual therapeutic systems vastly more than for materia medica. Furthermore, as we cannot entirely dissociate intelligence from matter in any instance or deny that spirit can and does pervade and permeate the entirety of the universe, we have banished such words as "insentient" and "dead" from our vocabulary. What genuine scientist is prepared to speak of "dead" or "insentient" substance if called upon to give a final analysis of his idea of substance.

The following Table of Gradation is found helpful by many students and may prove of service to all. The seven-fold expression of life is acknowledged by all students of Theosophy. The seven planes in Man, and in the Universe which contains us all, may be thus literally and at the same time symbolically stated.

(1) A. Red. Mineral Kingdom or realm.

(2) B. Orange. Vegetable Kingdom or realm.

(3) C. Yellow. Animal.

(4) D. Green. Animal-Human (seat of all earthly propensities).

(5) E. Blue. Mental-Human (seat of intellectual consciousness).

(6) F. Indigo. Moral-Human (seat of all moral aspiration).

(7) G. Violet. Spiritual-Human (seat of intuitive perception of Divinity).

Octave. White. Perfect Unit. Divine Life. Universal. Infinite.

As it is both possible and profitable to introduce music and color into the objective as well as on the subjective side of healing ministry, we advise all students to make use of tones and colors according to their comprehension of tone and color significance; they will thereby greatly add to their efficiency and ability to reach successfully great varieties of cases. If it be conceded that all the lower planes are simply fractional expressions of the higher, we can easily steer clear of every vestige of bigotry and intolerance, for it is as though one child could discriminate between only two sounds and colors, while his elder brother or sister could as easily distinguish between three or four or even a still larger number of notes and hues. If you have only one-seventh of something and your neighbor has two, three, four, five or six sevenths of the same thing, he can of course do already proportionately more than you can, but there is no reason whatever why you should not attain unto the same elevation in your own experience.

It may not be true that alleged mental methods of treatment are completely right ones, but they are more right than the lesser and lower methods which they effectively supersede. What the lesser cannot do, the greater does and does easily.

In the light of the foregoing, the student is prepared to take a rational survey of all methods of practice now in vogue and equally of those which, though once popular, have long since fallen into disuse. It cannot be that what was once a veritable healing balm is now worthless; but it is true that the confidence of the people is often transferred from one centre of activity to another. Thus schools arise and fade, but the good that is in them all abides perpetually.

This age being preëminently one of renascence and of rediscovery, we are witnessing the steady rehabilitation in somewhat new garments of many an antiquated curiosity in the therapeutic as well as in every other field. Our wisest course must ever be to cling to the very highest we at present comprehend and still let our motto be forevermore, EXCELSIOR.

LESSON II

The Origin of Disease Metaphysically Considered

Subjective and Objective Causes

To simplify all that could be said on the origin and nature of disease so far as to condense volumes into a single word, it is only necessary to remember that disorder is the term universally regarded as descriptive of all unhealthy or abnormal conditions of mind or body. Order and health are one; disorder and disease are one also. Disease is not the polar opposite, but the contradictory of health. Active evil cannot be the absence, but must be the inversion of good; in like manner, disorder is not simply a negative condition, but is a state induced by the misuse, either knowingly or ignorantly, of some one or more of our faculties or powers. It is quite true that darkness is only the absence of light, and cold the absence of heat in many instances, but this is only the strictly negative side of a great subject which needs positively affirmative treatment ere we can so elucidate our position as to make it intelligible to the multitude.

Chemists speak of sixty-four primary substances or chemical elements (some declare in favor of a still larger number), but no chemist, so far as we are aware, ever speaks of any one of these sixty-four or more primaries as being bad, evil, corrupt, or, indeed, anything other than good and useful. Still, we often hear of poisonous ingredients, and, further, of miscompounded prescriptions and of many mistakes made by inexperienced or careless pharmacists resulting in grave danger to those who are the victims of such mistakes. There need be no poisons in the world and there will be none when we have reached the long-promised Golden Age. But looking closer into the subject we are led to change the expression and say Golden State in preference to Golden Age, because age suggests a period of time just so near and just so far distant, while state conveys the correct impression of a condition to be reached, not by passing of time, but by our own intelligent activities. There is so much of truth in even the garbled forms of all chemical teachings which are accessible to the general reader, for, both figuratively and literally, transmutation is a word of mighty import and one which evolutionists even of the materialistic schools are not averse to using.

The ideal condition of the human body and of regenerated society is spoken of as the result of a transmutative process. The "old serpent" has been "taken up," and when elevated, can be no longer a rock of offence or cause for stumbling. Sin, sickness and death are said to have entered the world together, long ago in Eden, and when humanity is fully redeemed from the ancient curse there will be no more sin, sickness and death. This is an extremely important point to emphasize, because, while there is very much of truth in the famous saying quoted by so many metaphysical practitioners, "There is neither sin, sickness nor death in real being," it is easily possible to confuse rather than enlighten, and at the same time to arouse much unnecessary antagonism in your theory and practice also, by saying that sin, sickness and death have no existence in the material universe.

It can never be necessary to commit a sin against charity, but such sin we are sure to commit if we persist in declaring that all illnesses are due to wilful infractions of Divine or natural order. The general confession in the Book of Common Prayer of the Anglican and American Episcopal churches contains a sentence upon which many avowed Mental Scientists have commented most adversely; but in our judgment such animadversion is altogether unnecessary if people would only stop to define the words and endeavor to get back of obvious expressions to the underlying thought of their authors. "We have done those things which we ought not to have done," coupled with the kindred acknowledgment, "We have left undone those things which we ought to have done," must lead logically to what follows in the general confession, "and there is no health in us." What can such a sentence mean? Rightly interpreted, it is by no means as irreconcilable with the idea of intrinsic human nobility as it may at first appear. Health means wholeness, perfect order, complete symmetry of mind and body; there can, therefore, be no perfection so long as we are guilty of faults of commission or of omission, even though we may frankly state that mistakes and errors in judgment are not to be classed with wilful trangressions of the moral code.

"Sin is the transgression of the Law." We talk vainly, ignorantly, stupidly, of breaking the Law. Once for all let it be known and accepted as a truism, that no one ever has broken or ever will, for no one ever can, break the Law, but whosoever resists the Law or throws himself even ignorantly against it gets broken. The Law violates its antagonist, but it is never violated. It is essentially necessary that we shall all see this plainly, for unless we see it we can have no comprehension of how it comes to pass that sin, sorrow, sickness, and all manner of distresses are in a world the substance of which is all good, pure and everlasting, the incorruptible expression of infinite and eternal Divinity.

The subjective, or interior, side of disorder must ever be its primary side; the objective, or apparent, physical symptoms which we commonly call disorders are not diseases, properly speaking, but only the results of final ultimates thereof. Doing and leaving undone are usually looked upon as altogether physical acts; offences and negligences which meet the external eye, or assail one or the other of the five animal senses. To do and to leave undone must be construed mentally, or we have no base or foundation for any moral fabric.

The Sermon on the Mount and all the Gospel teachings abound with forceful applications of the subjective theory of order and disorder. On the bright side we are told of a poor widow who put two small coins into the treasury, and of her it was said she had contributed more than all they who had thrown in precious nuggets of gold and imposing talents of silver. On the dark side we are are told that those who are in the love of any offence and commit it in their hearts are guilty of it.

Many people professed to be scandalized at the portrayal of "Lady Sybil" in Marie Corelli's "Sorrows of Satan," because the most awful portions of that amazing novel struck at the root of a corrupt tree and did not spare gilded infamy. Swedenborg had long before told us that a man is his affections, and that love or the will (the two being identical) must determine every one's station in the world of spirit. It is not pleasant to hear unpalatable truths, but why should truth at any time be other than palatable? If the law of the universe is such that Nature makes sewers and drains to carry off impurities, and brings forth scavengers to inhabit earth and air and sea, yea, and to dwell in human blood also, to remove abominations, what right have we to vilify the microbe, to execrate the pathogenic germ, or to curse bacteria?

All the attempted cleaning of the outside of our cups and platters is a wretched farce. We ought to be brave enough to face the music, and instead of taking refuge in inoculation or compulsory vaccination or lymph, or some sort of animal extract, we should cleanse the interior of our temples from all defiling thoughts; for by such means only can we cleanse our Augean stables and do Herculean work successfully. It is not drinking, chewing, smoking or aught else external which does the most vital injury to the community; it is the mental state back of these foolish, ignorant and often harmful practices that needs to be attacked and overcome.

Occult science is a marvellous eye-opener, and every true Gospel preacher is a genuine occultist, for occultism deals with causes before it seeks to tamper with effects. We must be clear upon the most vital of all points, viz., the supreme importance of the inner life of thought, emotion, imagination and desire as the source whence all external conditions are either wilfully precipitated, or automatically projected. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" and "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he" are two rigidly scientific statements. Directly we understand that heart stands unmistakably for the centre of feeling, no matter whether that centre be literally or organically in the brain or in the heart, we grow clear on the subject of our affections.

Speaking physiologically, we do not hesitate to say that the brain is the entire body in miniature, and that from it as a complete centre and from its various sections as sub-centres every part of the widely extending organism, even to the points of the extremities, must be supplied by constant inflow of vitality. Whatever deranges the affectional centres in the brain induces degeneration of the heart. Thus, all heart difficulties and dangers are primarily traceable to disorderly or repressed affections. It is indeed difficult, though not impossible, at the present day to trace every local or functional aberration in every person to some specific mental discord in the psychic and thence in the physical love-centres of that particular person; but to the inner eye of the penetrative seer, these are only two broad generalizations, possible when we are seeking to account for manifest abnormalities.

At the beginning of this lesson, we drew attention to two kinds of evil. The negative sort may be dismissed as simply absence of good; the positive variety being inversion or perversion of good. Timid, easy-going people whose favorite motto is apt to be, "Anything for a quiet life," are certainly not very much addicted to gross mental vices, i. e., they are not generally avaricious to any great extent, nor are they strongly revengeful or vindictive. As a whole they live comparatively innocent and harmless lives, so far as their own volitional conduct goes. But extreme timidity being in itself a vice — even though largely a negative one — these weak-minded, weak-willed, easily-led persons are, in consequence of irresoluteness, easily led to do dastardly deeds at the bidding of those stronger than themselves. Such persons are constantly yielding to something closely akin to adverse hypnotic or mesmeric influence, often to influences unknowingly exerted upon them.

Contagion and infection are two words of extremely extended application, and it is with the mental side of the meaning of these terms that the student of mental healing has practically to deal. Affections are always primal causes, and though no one may be in the affection of a physical malady, i. e., no one may desire to suffer from a painful illness, thousands are in love with the errors which induce physical disturbances, though totally ignorant of the connection between their loves and the effects thereof.

Among mental states which lead to disastrous consequences, the love of ease at the expense of right is extremely common. Suppose, for example, that we are secretly and silently indulging some thought of unkindness or encouraging some jealous feeling toward a neighbor, we may be, all unconsciously to ourselves, rendering ourselves liable to the contagion of a disorder which first enters the world as a direct result of erroneous affection we are entertaining. Were we to cast out that base feeling and entertain a diametrically opposed impulse, we should thereby so transform the plastic substance of our bodies that we should become supersusceptible, or immune. The disorderly condition of the atmosphere in our immediate surrounding might continue, but we should be no longer in correspondence with it, having passed into a totally different realm of correspondency. We can never afford to be unmindful of Swedenborg's masterly declaration, "Thought gives presence, love yields conjunction." We are conjoined only with what we love, but we are in the presence of whatever we think about; thus are we continually bringing before us mental images the exact reverse of what would be well for us to imagine.

To counteract these unpleasant and hurtful images it is necessary to gain a degree of control over imagination and memory seldom attempted because rarely believed possible. Memory and imagination are largely inseparable; they are companion faculties, though it may of course be argued that memory deals altogether with retrospect, while imagination is continually looking forward. Though we may have weakly yielded to many unwholesome impressions in the past, or up till now, we are under no sort of necessity to go on yielding to similar impressions from now onward. To-day is always an accepted time. We can reverse our mental pictures and gain new power over the contents of our mental art galleries, and this we must do if we would enjoy health in the future which we have not enjoyed in times past.

No one really believing that disease is necessary and inevitable can make any progress toward effectually vanquishing it until he has come to take an entirely reverse view of human possibilities. Just so long as we live in what Fletcher and other useful writers have called "fear thought," we shall be liable, at any time, to suffer from unknown and seemingly accidental causes; but directly we have come to a realizing sense of our ability to choose whether we will subject ourselves to floating influences, we shall begin to take our health into our own hands and commence steering our barks where formerly we allowed them to drift with the current regardless of whither the stream was flowing. We must first get on to the solid rock as concerns right affection.

Our second great step will be to get on to solid ground as concerns our expectation. Will first, understanding next in order. We will take it for granted that every reader of these lines sincerely wishes to enjoy health in the fullest meaning of that majestic word, but how few (if any) of us know, to any great extent, how to gain possession of this inestimable boon. We have been so long subject to erratic influences from all around that chart and compass in our own hands is quite a new experience.

We first close the door against disorderly interior influences by opening our inmost selves to those particular interior goods to which the evils we desire to be delivered from are diametrically opposed. "Whatsoever things are excellent, think on these things," and we must add, think definitely on that particular excellent thing which, in your present crisis, you feel you stand most in need of. Though it is quite true that we are not irredeemably conjoined to errors we do not love, we are held often for a long time by the fascination of fear in close presence with what we hate.

It is never safe to advise young students or any immature persons to contemplate disorderly conditions, thereby endeavoring to lock them down. All really safe advice concerns the strictly affirmative side of mental practice. Meditation on a desired goal helps us toward that goal, while fear of not reaching it prolongs our journey thither and causes us to wander with uncertain steps in a howling wilderness. Though it is always highly essential to thus generalize upon the topic of mental causation before proceeding to particulars, it is quite natural that if particular aspects of so great a subject are omitted, students not unreasonably cavil at the omission.

One of the chief difficulties at this late day in human history is to trace to-day's sufferings to a far yesterday's transgressions, and particularly is this the case when, as often happens, a most amiable, sweet-tempered, pure-minded person is afflicted with some chronic distemper which rigid sticklers for the law of correspondence cannot but attribute to some offensive form of sin for origin. Deafness, blindness and a host of other afflictions, both partial and complete, acute as well as chronic, must have originated, according to Swedenborg and other seers, with some wilful turning away from Divine love and wisdom. But these estimable people who are now suffering the consequences of this ancient deflection or original sin are in no sense wilfully opposed to truth and goodness and are in no way desirous of turning away from inner light and heavenly music.

Here we confront the tremendous problem of heredity, with which all the sages of the world have wrestled, and with which many a conscientious philosopher is struggling still. "Parents have eaten sour grapes and children's teeth are set on edge" is a biblical metaphor often quoted; but is it right that this should be even if it is the case? This is a very solemn question continually being raised, and to answer it is no easy task. The whole justification for the theosophic doctrines of karma and reincarnation seems to lie in the claim that they and they alone can settle this problem. Annie Besant's "Ancient Wisdom," Sinnett's "Growth of the Soul" and many other books written in similar strain enter elaborately into these questions, and to many minds they approximately answer them.

Granting now that the theosophical solution of this immense problem may be the true one, the query next presented is what should be our attitude toward the effect of our sins committed in previous lives supposing we are now paying a penalty for them. Here let it be interjected that all consequences must be regarded as educational and remedial if we would deal equitably with ourselves and others, and justice to one's self as well as to others is a necessary virtue. If I am reaping what I, in company with others, have sown, if I belong to a certain family of souls, and I and my companions are reaping the direful effects of false and foolish sowing in a scarce remembered past, what must I do to change the current of tendency and so grasp hold of the reins that, instead of being driven henceforth by "adverse karma," I may become a maker of excellent karma for my own and others' reaping in time to come?

Here mental healers score their completest philosophic victories, for it is only through a clear understanding of karma, or the law of sequence, that the "golden mean" can be reached, and a doctrine promulgated which, while steering entirely clear of the dangerous rocks named pessimism and fatalism, refuses to deny any demonstrable fact concerning heredity which science and experience may reveal. As there are distinctly two of every one of us — a higher and a lower self — we can safely say that we inherit on our lower side what cannot possibly reach us on our higher. It being useless to deny the temporal existence of weakness and errors on our earth-born side, and it being the height of folly to mourn over aught that is irrevocable, the true healer sets to work to direct the mental gaze of all who are in any way afflicted, from past to future, from dust to spirit, from carnal to celestial.

We are at our highest and best incapable of sinning or desiring sin. Sickness and death — fruits of error — are only ephemeral vanities, real to that sense which perceives them, but unreal from the standpoint of the soul, which is above them. Sunrise and sunset are appearances on earth, but they are non-existent phenomena to that astronomical perception which transcends immeasurably the view-point of the terrestrial beholder. In like manner, all dust-born afflictions are of the old Adam only, and being peculiar to the transitory sense-nature of humanity, they do not, for they cannot, invade the sanctuary of our real being. This is not speculative idealism, but a practical foundation on which to raise a rock-based temple of abiding knowledge.

Suggestion is impossible unless there be one who makes a suggestion and one who receives it, and as auto-suggestion is a very general term at present, all who use it intelligently are bound to practise according to premises already laid down in this lesson. I speak to myself. I who speak am a spiritual entity ; the self spoken to is a subordinate who must be made to carry out the commands of the superior officer.

In the true order versus disorder of human expression, the essential will is the general of the industrial army; intellect is captain, while the obedient soldiers are all the propensities included in the lower self. It is in the middle region of intellect that false beliefs are centred, and they must be driven from their entrenchment there. in order that there may be no further consequence of their presence in the flesh. Good will must act through right understanding. False belief is the cause of innumerable ailments the existence of which is totally opposed to the desires of the proper will.

We inherit beliefs, tendencies, liabilities, everything, in short, but disease itself. This inheritance is a fact, and as such it has to be met and dealt with scientifically. How shall we then set to work to eradicate tendencies which need eradication, and to conquer weaknesses over which we must rise victorious unless we are weakly submissive to an adverse fate which will crush us unless we conquer it? A distinguished London physician has told some ladies of our acquaintance that some children are "demons in the womb," and by so saying has greatly disturbed some sensitive people who are altogether too ready to accept pessimistic utterances without the necessary "grain of salt." The ancient tale of Jacob and Esau declares that twin brothers fought before their birth and were bitter antagonists through the greater part of their lives, though they at length became friends.

We must not ignore the fact of disagreeable tendencies when engaged in scientific reasoning or philosophical discussion, but the one altogether right way to effectually dispose of difficulties is (while admitting their transitory existence) to affirm bravely and persistently our own inherent power to overcome them.

There are three great classifications of disorder: First, disorders arising from hereditary taint and weakness; second, disorders due to our active follies in the present existence; third, disorders springing from weak and careless submission to the beliefs and conditions of people about us. If, in consequence of your own mistakes in a previous life, or because of the follies of your parents or remote ancestors, you are beset with weaknesses and burdens which threaten to overwhelm you, you should at once brace yourself for the occasion and, while acknowledging the fact of your immediate environment, laugh in the face of obstacles, and tell your difficulties that you are here to vanquish them, not they to conquer you. If this attitude be taken toward all distressful surroundings, the whole subject of karma and heredity ceases to terrify or dishearten you, because you are now in the victor's instead of the slave's position of thought.

There can be no greater mistake than to oppress yourself with the burdensome thought that because "such is my karma," I must therefore bend my back to a constant burden and allow fresh troubles to be heaped upon me. From whatever side one is most disposed to view this most complicated subject, it is always necessary to declare that some real good is being worked out for yourself and others through the direct agency of the very conditions in which you are this moment placed; but the outworking of this good is to be accomplished by heroic rising above these obstacles, never by weak submission to them.

If one member of a family has inherited a dipsomaniac and another a consumptive tendency, it is useless to tell the drunkard that he can conquer his weakness, but his consumptive sister must of necessity succumb to tuberculosis. The intelligent Mental Scientist must say plainly to so afflicted a pair, "You can both conquer." It would be a good exercise for one to treat the other. Let the brother suggest to his sister that her lungs are strong and her entire breathing apparatus perfect, while she suggests to him that his will is quite sufficient to conquer the temptation which is still assailing him as a member of a family into which that particular sort of weakness has gained an entrance.

We must forget, i. e., forego our connection with the past and affirm our instant relation with omnipresent goodness so as to vanquish hereditary tendencies of downward grade. You are now able to do as you please is in itself a powerful and highly useful suggestion both for silent and oral usage. Sickness brought on by our own active indiscretions can be conquered in a precisely similar way, and it is becoming increasingly clear to all practical mental healers that the attitude to be taken toward all weaknesses is virtually the same. It helps many students to be told that we never treat diseases, but we speak to human beings and suggest to them their ability to live the best lives they wish to live henceforth, and as they set new causes in motion, new effects will of necessity follow.

We find that everywhere the prevalent desire is to be in the fashion and to imitate others, but the vapid thought behind the idiotic saying, "Oh, anything for a quiet life," is a most fertile source of manifold disasters. To be healthy in the present state of society one must be in many respects decidedly unfashionable, just as were the Jews of Europe, during the Middle Ages, who enjoyed remarkable freedom from plague in its most virulent forms when it mowed down anti-Semitic trucklers to base prevailing customs like chaff before a whirlwind.

It is absolutely essential to health that we should steer clear of all those silly practices and inane beliefs which cause even the school-boys of the present period to be characterized as "bundles of nerves." Neurotic distempers are the most prevalent of all classes of diseases to-day, and shattered nerves are almost entirely due to a pitiable lack of honorable self-assertion. Be yourself and forget your grandfather makes a good adage. "Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father." Why not, seeing that Abraham was so excellent a man? Because we have all one Father, and until we understand what it is to acknowledge practically the universal parenthood of Deity, we shall flounder about in the miry ditch of inherited and contracted disorders.

Such diseases as are commonly attributable to outside influences which occasion accidents, etc., are seemingly in a position by themselves; but even these do not baffle the teacher of mental therapeutics, for though it be an obvious fact that people slip, fall, and break their bones at present, therefore surgery is still required; not only will mental treatment prevent and subdue inflammation and greatly accelerate recovery, but as physical falls are in a last analysis clearly traceable to mental unsteadiness, all education which tends to help people to a state where they will prove firmer, more self-reliant, perspicuous and individually stronger, cannot fail to save them from numberless so-called accidents otherwise unpreventable. Mental Science can make no progress among people who are wedded to idols, or too lazy to do any thinking of their own. Palliative mental measures can generally be employed; pain can be relieved by the most rudimentary phases of mental treatment, but it will return unless the patient is educated to understand that his own thought in the future must be higher than in the past.

It is surely meet for all intelligent people to reason thus with themselves. The same cause invariably produces the same effect; therefore, if we continue thinking as our forefathers thought, we shall perpetuate and propagate their limitations with attendant and consequent sufferings; but if we change our rate of vibration, re-polarize ourselves inwardly and thence outwardly, we shall set a current of force moving in a new direction, and though always reaping as we sow, our reaping must be different from what it formerly was because the seed sown now is of a fresh variety.

If it be claimed (as it often is) that climate and many other external influences induce disease, and that these agencies are beyond our control, we have only this answer to give: Climate will treat us differently when we take a new mental attitude as regards it. Many people to whom London fog in November had always been a serious menace have, in consequence of their acceptance of the fundamental proposition of Mental Science, so changed their own susceptibility that they now thrive where they once languished. The same remark applies equally to heat, cold, rain, surrounding activities, noises of all descriptions, and the company in which one may be compelled to move.

Change your attitude toward conditions and they are changed toward you. Then will come, in due course, yet higher changes for you, and you will eventually create your own environment through further understanding of the Law.

LESSON III

Positivity and Negativity; Self Control and Self Poise; Truth and Holiness or Wholeness

---

In this lesson we will endeavor to set at rest a question which has long perplexed many who have been adversely influenced by one-sided statements concerning positive and negative. Every magnet, as we well know, must have two poles — positive and negative. Therefore, as both are essential to the constitution of a magnet, it would be manifestly absurd to call one good and the other evil. They are alike good, but their functions are radically different. By means of our negative pole we draw into ourselves whatever we absorb and eventually assimilate, until it becomes a portion of our mechanism; by means of our positive pole we exercise jurisdiction or command over the forces of existence which are all around us. Were we altogether positive we should be so enclosed in a wall of contracted selfhood that nothing could approach us to hold any converse or communion with us; and were we altogether negative we should be such a bundle of ever-fluctuating impressions as to lack everything worthy to be named self-conscious individuality. Attraction and repulsion are terms commonly employed in this connection, but in consequence of the disagreeable associations connected with the second word, some Mental Scientists have eliminated it from their vocabulary as a word of misleading and pernicious import. We confess to no liking for it, and considering the thought generally attached to it we can well wish it good riddance. Just as operator and subject (old mesmeric terms) are set aside by modern suggestionists in favor of the much better and far more expressive terms sender and receiver, we can well afford to dispense with attractive and repulsive, and substitute receptive and distributive.

We are all properly pupil teachers, for we learn while we teach and teach while we learn. Influx and efflux are necessarily corollary and we must inspire and respire continually. To give and to receive are equally necessary and desirable, for in a final analysis of reception and donation we cannot continue to give unless we are perpetually receiving; neither can we continue to receive unless we are constantly giving forth. There is nothing niggardly in a true view of life. There is absolutely no advantage accruing from stinginess or parsimony on any plane of life's innumerable expressions, therefore we must overcome the false beliefs and weakening fears which have so long oppressed the race concerning fatigue, exhaustion, loss of vitality, etc., etc. It does many people immense good to meditate alone and earnestly upon the significance of "twelve basketfuls of fragments" collected after a large multitude had eaten to their full capacity, according to a delightful Gospel story. Earth, air and sea contain illimitable wealth; nature is boundlessly opulent, and though it is wise to be economical, it is never right to be stingy and afraid. Economy of strength means consecration of energy. All force is good in itself, but good accrues to us perceptibly only to the extent that we use wisely such amounts or measures of force as are now at our disposal. On the one hand we are continually dependent upon force external to ourselves; sunshine, air and soil are typical examples. On the other hand we are hourly under the necessity of acknowledging inherent capacity within ourselves which enables us to become harmonically related with universal environment.

There are two schools of philosophers now addressing the public, the one insisting that we must place dependence solely upon Divinity without, the other contending that we should think of Divinity as exclusively within. These two half truths need cementing into unity, and until they are cemented we shall have no philosophic system which can adequately explain the facts of existence. The seeds buried in earth unfold from within and accrete from without; fruits and blossoms are results of this dual action. Let each individual contemplate an entity as a twofold being whose negative pole should always be turned inward or upward to receive, while the positive pole is turned downward or outward to impart. We are all living in a middle region; there are influences from above and from below continually besetting us. To those above we should stand as pupils, to those below we should act as masters. Right polarization is essential to holiness, wholeness, or health, which are three words of identical import. Hyper-sensitive people are unduly negative; stubborn and stupid people are unduly positive. We must deliberately set to work to polarize ourselves according to our will, affirming with conviction, "I am negative to that alone to which it is my will to be negative." Then take the opposite affirmative which is equally expressive, "I am positive to all toward which it is my will to be positive." These two asseverations, if faithfully persisted in, will prove of intense talismanic power. Knowing, as we do, how many highly nervous and delicately organized people find what they call their "mediumship" a burden to them, but knowing also that sensitiveness in even an extreme degree can be directed so as to prove a priceless blessing, we are willing to encourage its scientific exercise while protesting against its promiscuous abuse.

The greatest drawback to success in self treatment for the vanquishment of unhealthy limitations is found in the deep-seated belief of multitudes that will carries with it no adequate or commensurate ability to carry its purpose into effect. How very often people are heard to say, "I would if I could," when the true statement is, "I will and I can." The former saying is a pitiful and most illogical, as well as a thoroughly depressing, confession of imaginary weakness. The latter is a strong, wise affirmation rooted in intelligence and capable of bringing forth the most desirable effects. People need incessant drilling on the genesis, nature and ability of their own will, and unless teaching is given in accordance with the radical inculcations of Mental Science in this respect, all such expressions of self-government or self-control are windy utterances bereft of all logical consistency. I can only control myself to the extent that I perceive that I and myself are two; I am I and it is mine. If I am superior to it, I may control it, but apart from a clear distinction between it and me, self-control and all kindred terms are practically meaningless, and to a great many people they are meaningless just because a failure to discriminate between the higher and lower planes of our humanity. Holiness, which is equivalent to wholeness, signifies symmetry, equilibrium, or equipoise; thus the true synonym of holiness is harmony, and with this again health is synonymous.

